Under these circumstances their lordships were appealed to to give special leave to appeal, and Mr. Haldane, on behalf of the petitioner, was fully heard on the 5th of November last. The only ground susceptible of argument urged by the learned counsel was that whereas some of the courts were open it was impossible to apply the ordinary rule that where actual war is raging the civil courts have no jurisdiction to deal with military action, and that where acts of war are in question the military tribunals alone are competent to deal with such questions. The question was as fully argued before their lordships by the learned counsel as it could have been argued if leave to appeal had been given; and their lordships did not think it right to suggest any doubt upon the law by giving special leave to appeal where the circumstances render the law clear. They are of opinion that where actual war is raging acts done by the military authorities are not justiciable by the ordinary tribunals; and that war in this case was actually raging, even if their lordships did not take judicial notice of it, is sufficiently evidenced by the petitioner's own petition and affidavit. Martial law had been proclaimed over the district in which the petitioner was arrested and the district to which he was removed. The fact that for some purposes some tribunals had been permitted to pursue their ordinary course is not conclusive that war was not raging. That question came before the Privy Council as long ago as the year 1830. In Elphinstone v. Bedreechund, 1 Knapp P. C. Rep. 316, the Supreme Court at Bombay had given a large sum as damages against the appellant for the seizure of certain treasure at Poona. During the time of the seizure no actual hostilities were carried on in the immediate neighbourhood of Poona, but the great battle of Kirkee had been fought and Poona had been taken possession of by the British forces. The treasure was seized on the 17th of July, 1818. At Poona some courts had been open from the previous February, and it was argued, and held by the Bombay courts, that it must be held to be a time of peace and that the military authorities were responsible in damages for seizure of the treasure. To this the Attorney-General, Sir James Scarlett, replied that a military commander may allow the usual courts of justice that existed in the country before the invasion to continue their jurisdiction upon such subjects as may not be reserved for the consideration of the commander, but this does not deprive the commander of his power or free the country from military government. Lord Tenterden, in giving judgment, said: "We think the proper character of the transaction was that of hostile seizure made, if not flagrante, yet nondum cessante bello, regard being had both to the time, the place, and the person, and consequently that the municipal court had no jurisdiction to adjudge upon the subject," and the judgment was accordingly reversed. The truth is that no doubt has ever existed that where war actually prevails the ordinary courts have no jurisdiction over the action of the military authorities. Doubtless, cases of difficulty arise when the fact of a state of rebellion or insurrection is not clearly established. It may often be a question whether a mere riot or disturbance, neither so serious nor no extensive as really to amount to a war at all, has not been treated with an excessive severity, and whether the necessity for the intervention of the military force was necessary; but once let the fact of actual war be established and there is a universal consensus of opinion that the civil courts have no jurisdiction to call in question the propriety of the action of military authorities. The framers of the Petition of Right knew well what they meant when they made a condition of peace the ground of the illegality of unconstitutional procedure. For these reasons their lordships advised his Majesty to refuse leave to appeal.

GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF WEST HAM UNION v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Amalgamation of part of parish with another parish—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61)—Poor Law Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 54).

Where a pauper has acquired a settlement in a parish, and subsequently by an order of the Local Government Board, made under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, as amended by the Poor Law Act, 1879, part of another parish has been amalgamated with the former parish, the parish does not thereby cease to exist, and the pauper's settlement is not lost.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (49 W. R. 443, [1901] 1 K. B. 720) affirmed.

Appeal by the Guardians of the West Ham Union from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Darling and Channell, JJ.) upon a case stated by the London Quarter Sessions on an appeal from the order of justices of the County of London, whereby it was adjudged that the place of the last settlement of one Elizabeth Heritage, a pauper lunatic confined in the Claybury Lunatic Asylum belonging to the London County Council, at Woodford, in the county of Essex, was in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, and whereby the Guardians of the West Ham Union were ordered to pay to the treasurer of the said asylum for the maintenance of the pauper. The case is reported in 49 W. R. 443, [1901] 1 K. B. 720.

Elizabeth Heritage was born in Stephenson-street, Canning Town, in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, on or about the 11th of February, 1852, and resided at 40 and 42, Barking-road, in the parish of West Ham, for about seventeen years, until August, 1888. She resided at the above address in such circumstances, during the whole of the seventeen years and in each of such years, as to render her irremovable from the parish in which such residence took place.

By an order of the Local Government Board dated the 24th of August, 1886, and made under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, as amended and extended by the Poor Law Act, 1879, it was ordered that all that part of the parish of Wanstead which was included in the borough of West Ham should cease to be part of that parish and should be amalgamated with the parish of West Ham.

The said address at which Elizabeth Heritage so resided was situate in the parish of West Ham as constituted previously to the date of the said order, and not in any part of the parish of Wanstead. Heritage left the parish of West Ham in August, 1888, and did not thereafter acquire a settlement in any other parish. She was afterwards found in the hamlet of Ratcliff in the Stepney Union, in the County of London, and was sent therefrom to the said Claybury Lunatic Asylum.

By an order of two justices of the County of London dated the 14th of February, 1900, Heritage was, under section 290 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, adjudged to be chargeable to the County of London. On the 15th of May, 1900, the London County Council procured from two justices of the County of London an order adjudging her to be settled in the parish of West Ham. The quarter sessions reversed the order on the ground that Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union, 46 W. R. 309, [1898] 1 Q. B. 594, applied not only to a parish which was divided, but also to a parish to which part of another parish was added.

The Divisional Court reversed the order of quarter sessions, holding that the addition of a portion of the parish of Wanstead to the parish of West Ham did not destroy the old parish of West Ham, and that the settlement of the pauper remained unaffected.

The Guardians of the West Ham Union appealed.

Horace Avory, K.C. (J. C. Earle and Lewis Richards with him), for the Guardians of West Ham.—A parish loses its entity whether it is divided into two or more parishes, or whether part of another parish is added to it. The old parish is destroyed and the settlements in it are gone. The principle is that it is unfair to the inhabitants of the added portion of the parish to make them chargeable with the maintenance of the paupers in the parish to which the part is added. The last of the cases upon the point is Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union, and the principle of that case covers the present case.

Macmorran, K.C., and F. F. Daldy, for the London County Council.—The decisions show that, where a parish is destroyed, the settlements acquired in it are gone: Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton, 3 Q. B. 215; Reg. v. Inhabitants of Hunnington, 5 Q. B. 273; Stourbridge Union v. Droitwich Union, L. R. 6 Q. B. 769, 19 W. R. C. L. Dig. 58; Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union. The judges who decided the later cases did not approve of the principle of the earlier decisions, but said that as they had stood so long they could not overrule them. That principle ought not to be extended to the case of an addition to an existing parish. The parish is not destroyed by the addition: Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum, 9 Q. B. 241. The word used in the order of the Local Government Board in the present case, following the language of section 1 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, is "amalgamated," which excludes the idea of the destruction of the parish.

Horace Avory, K.C., in reply.—In Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum, two entire parishes were united into one by a special Act of Parliament, and it was held right, by reason of the two parishes having themselves obtained the Act authorizing the union, that the united parish should bear the burden of maintaining the paupers formerly borne by each parish.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case raises the question whether the pauper has lost her settlement in the parish of West Ham, or whether it remains unaffected by what has taken place. The facts are that the pauper was born in the parish of West Ham, and resided there for a number of years. She therefore acquired a settlement in that parish, and never acquired a settlement in any other parish. Subsequently by an order of the Local Government Board made under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, as amended and extended by the Poor Law Act, 1879, a small part of the parish of Wanstead was added to the parish of West Ham. The question thus arises whether the pauper's settlement in the parish of West Ham has been destroyed by reason of that addition to the parish. The Divisional Court has held that the settlement in the parish of West Ham has remained unaffected by the change. It is contended that that decision is wrong, as being inconsistent with a long line of cases beginning with Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton and ending with Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union. These cases decided that where a pauper had acquired a settlement in a parish, and that parish was divided into two or more different parishes, inasmuch as the entity in which the pauper had acquired a settlement had ceased to exist, the settlement also ceased to exist and was gone. The judges who decided the later cases do not seem to have approved of the principle upon which the earlier cases had been decided, but they said that as the decisions had stood for so long they could not be overruled and must now be accepted as law. It is said that the principle of those decisions covers the present case. It is to be observed that the parish of West Ham has not been divided up and new parishes substituted in its place. It cannot be contended that its identity has been destroyed in that way. All that has happened is that the parish has acquired an accretion from the parish of Wanstead, and when one looks at the legislation and the order under which the addition has been made to the parish it does not seem to me to have the same effect as the division of a parish into a number of new and different parishes. That part of section 1 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, under which the order was made necessitates no division of the parish, but gives power to cut off a bit of one parish and add it to another. Even if I were not assisted by authority, I should be of opinion that such an addition would not alter the identity of the parish, and that both parishes would remain. That at once takes the case out of the line of decisions which say that, as the identity of the parish is gone, the settlements acquired in it are gone too. The case, however, is not without authority. In Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum, two parishes were united, and it was held that the settlements acquired in each parish before they were united still remained. It is said that the effect of so holding in the present case will be to compel the inhabitants of that portion of Wanstead which has been added to the parish of West Ham to assist in supporting the paupers which were settled in the old parish of West Ham, and that that will create an injustice. That may be so, but precisely the same objection could have been urged in the case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum. An attempt was made to answer that by saying that in the St. Martin, New Sarum case the union of the two parishes was effected by the consent and at the instance of the two parishes. I do not know whether the order in the present case was obtained by the consent and at the instance of the two parishes affected. There is this, however, in common to both cases, that what has been done in each case has been done under statutory powers. The case, in my opinion, falls outside the line of authorities which say that a settlement acquired in a parish, which has been subsequently divided into new parishes and thus destroyed, is gone with the parish, and there is no authority to prevent us from holding that a mere accretion to a parish, whether by virtue of an Act of Parliament or from some natural cause, does not destroy the identity of the parish. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There can be no doubt that the case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton and the other cases which followed it must be accepted as law. I cannot think, however, that those decisions are wholly satisfactory, and the principle on which they were decided ought not to be extended to other cases where the facts are of a different character. It is argued that logically those decisions cover the present case. Even if that were so, it has been pointed out by Lord Halsbury in a recent case (Quinn v. Leatham, ante, p. 139, [1901] A. C. 495) that it is often misleading to be guided by the strict principles of logic in coming to a decision upon English law. It does not therefore follow that the present case must be decided in the same way as Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton was. But it is unnecessary to pursue that topic further, because it is clear that the real ground upon which Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton was decided was that the old parish had ceased to exist by being subdivided up into a number of new parishes. The reason for that decision does not exist in the present case. Upon the facts stated in the present case I have come to the conclusion that the parish of West Ham has not been destroyed, but continues to exists, though a part of another parish has been added to it.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree with Lord Lindley when he said in Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union that the court in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton put a very narrow construction on the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12. That case decided that where a parish was divided under the powers of that Act, it ceased to exist, and consequently the settlements acquired in it ceased to exist also. The judges in the later cases, though with faltering steps, followed that decision. The decision was founded on the presumed intention of the Legislature that the old parish should disappear. In the present case there is no such intention. The order of the Local Government Board did not apparently contemplate the wiping out of the parish of West Ham, but treated it as a still existing parish with which part of another parish was amalgamated.

Appeal dismissed.

GORDON v. LONDON, CITY, AND MIDLAND BANK (LIMITED).

GORDON v. CAPITAL AND COUNTIES BANK (LIMITED). (a.)

Banker—Bill of exchange—Cheque—Crossed cheque—Receipt of payment for customer—Agent for collection—Crediting customer in account—Crossing of cheque by banker—Draft by branch bank on head office—Cheque drawn on other branch of collecting bank—Conversion—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 60, 82.

In an action for conversion it appeared that the plaintiff's clerk stole a number of drafts payable to the plaintiff's order, and, after putting on them forged endorsements of the plaintiff's signature, paid them into a branch bank of the defendants, where he had an account. The majority of the drafts were cheques drawn on other banks, and were crossed before they were received by the defendants. Some of them were cheques drawn on other banks, but were not crossed when received by the defendants.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Others were drafts signed by the manager of another branch of the defendants' bank and addressed to the defendants' head office. Others were cheques drawn on other branches of the defendants' bank. The defendants crossed all the drafts, whether they were crossed before or not, and placed the amounts at once to the clerk's credit. In nearly every case the clerk added his own endorsement.

Held, that the defendants were liable in respect of all the cheques drawn on other banks, not being protected by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882; for, by giving credit to the clerk at once, they acted not as agents for collection for a customer, but as holders of the cheques for value.

Held, also, that the defendants could not, by crossing the cheques which were uncrossed when they received them, acquire for them the protection of section 82.

Held, also, that the defendants were liable in respect of the drafts addressed by the branch manager to the head office; for such drafts were not cheques at all, and on that ground the defendants were not protected by section 82.

Held, also, that the defendants were not liable in respect of cheques drawn on other branches, being protected by section 60.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in two actions tried before Bucknill, J., and a jury.

The first action was brought to recover damages for conversion by the defendants, the London, City and Midland Bank, of 116 cheques, the property of the plaintiff; or alternatively for £2,067 16s. 11d., money received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiff.

The second action was a similar action brought against the Capital and Counties Bank in respect of thirty-two cheques.

The facts of the first case were as follows:

The plaintiff, who carried on business in Birmingham under the style of Gordon & Munro, had employed one Alfred Jones for about ten years as a ledger clerk, whose duty it was to take the business letters from the letter-box daily and place them on the plaintiff's desk. When customers remitted cheques to the plaintiff it was his (the plaintiff's) custom to enter the same in his cash-book and pay them into his bank, but when he was absent from business Jones was authorized to open the letters and to put on one side all cheques and remittances until the plaintiff returned. Jones had no authority to endorse any cheques in the plaintiff's name, or to deal with them in any way.

Between August, 1895, and February, 1899, Jones stole from letters which had been received through the post at the plaintiff's office a great number of cheques, and, having endorsed them in the name of his employer, took them to the defendants, who had a branch at Sparkbrook, Birmingham, where Jones, who carried on business on his own account as "Jones & Co.," had an account.

One hundred and sixteen cheques were so paid in by Jones. The amount for which the cheques were made payable was £2,067 16s. 11d.

The cheques so paid in consisted of eight classes, which were as follows: (1) Cheques which were drawn on banks other than the defendants' bank, payable to the order of the plaintiff's firm, and which, when received by the defendants, were not crossed. (2) One cheque payable to bearer, drawn on a bank other than the defendants' bank, and not crossed when received by the defendants. (3) Bankers' drafts, addressed to the defendants' head office in London, signed by R. J. Henn, the manager of the defendants' Leamington branch, as such manager, requiring the head office to pay on demand on account of the branch a sum of money to the order of the plaintiff's firm, which drafts were not crossed when received by the defendants. (4) Cheques drawn on branches of the defendants' bank other than the Sparkbrook branch, payable to the order of the plaintiff's firm, and crossed before the defendants received them. (5) Cheques drawn on bankers other than the defendants' bank, payable to the order of the plaintiff's firm, marked "not negotiable," and crossed before the defendants received them. (6) Cheques drawn on banks other than the defendants' bank, payable to the order of the plaintiff's firm, and crossed before they were received by the defendants. This class included the bulk of the cheques in respect of which the action was brought. (7) Cheques drawn payable to bearer on banks other than the defendants' bank, and crossed before they were received by the defendants. (8) Orders addressed to a bank other than the defendants' bank for payment of money to the plaintiff's firm conditional on the signature and presentation of a subjoined receipt for the same, and crossed when received by the defendants.

From July, 1895, to November, 1897, the account of Jones as "Jones & Co." was in credit. In October, 1898, Jones took a partner into his business, and a new account was opened with the defendants at the same branch, in the name of "Jones, Blackbam, & Co." From November, 1897, to February, 1899, the account of Jones, whether as "Jones & Co," or as "Jones, Blackham, & Co.," was from time to time overdrawn. The practice of the defendants with regard to all the cheques paid in by Jones was as follows: When Jones brought the cheques to the bank with the forged name of "Gordon & Munro" endorsed thereon, he added also the name of Jones & Co., or Jones, Blackham, & Co., as the case might be, the bank requiring the security of such endorsement. The defendants crossed the cheques (whether they were crossed before or not) by stamping them "The London and Midland Bank (Limited), Sparkbrook, Birmingham, to Head Office, London," the object and effect of which was to make them payable to or through the head office only. The defendants at once credited Jones with the amounts of the cheques in account, and allowed him to draw against the cheques before they were cleared. The cheques drawn on other banks were presented by the defendants, who received payment of the amounts. The cheques which were drawn on the defendants' own bank were collected by the ordinary book-keeping process of debit and credit at the head office and the amount placed to the credit of the Sparkbrook branch.

The facts of the second case were in almost all respects similar to those of the first case, except that all the cheques in the second case were drawn like those belonging to class 6 in the first case, and there was no evidence that the defendants insisted on Jones putting his own endorsement on the cheques, though in most instances he did so endorse them.

The defendants in each case, while denying liability, paid a sum of money into court.

At the trial the jury found that the payment in of the cheques by Jones was not made in such circumstances as to put the defendants on inquiry, and they added the following rider: "We wish to express our opinion that more care is desirable on the part of banks in general in respect of cheques of this character."

All other questions were by agreement left to Bucknill, J.

On further consideration the learned judge held that all the stolen cheques were received by the defendants from Jones as his agents to collect on his behalf, and that they received the amount on collection for his benefit, and not on their own account. He held that the plaintiff could recover the value of the cheques which were drawn on other banks than the defendants in favour of "Gordon & Munro or order," and which were, when paid in, uncrossed, the defendants not being protected by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, on the authority of Bissell v. Fox, Cababé & Ellis, 395, 51 L. T. Rep. 663, 33 W. R. Dig. 11. He also held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the value of a cheque payable to Gordon & Munro or bearer" not drawn on defendants' bank and uncrossed when received by them, being of opinion that, on the authority of Fine Art Society v. Union Bank of London, 35 W. R. 114, 17 Q. B. D. 705, and Kleinwort, Sons, & Co. v. Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris, [1894] 2 Q. B. 157, the defendants had converted it to their own use. He accordingly held that the defendants were liable with regard to the cheques in classes 1 and 2. With regard to the cheques in class 3 he held that the defendants were protected by the provisions of section 60 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, they having paid them in good faith and in the ordinary course of business. With regard to class 4 he held that they were protected by sections 60 and 82. And with regard to classes 5, 6, 7, and 8, and all the cheques in the second action, he held that they were protected by section 82 on the authority of Clarke v. London and County Banking Co., 45 W. R. 383, [1897] 1 Q. B. 552.

The defendants having substantially succeeded in each case, judgment was entered for them.

The plaintiff appealed in each case, asking for judgment or a new trial.

Section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, enacts as follows: "Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment."

COLLINS, M.R.—These two cases raise questions of considerable difficulty and complication. The plaintiff, who traded under the firm name of Messrs. Gordon & Munro, had a clerk named Jones. Jones opened an account, in the first case, at the defendant bank, the London, City, and Midland Bank, and after opening that account he began a series of dealings with cheques made payable to Gordon & Munro, in most instances to their order, which came into his custody as the plaintiff's clerk. He took the cheques into his own possession, he forged the signatures of the plaintiff's firm on the back of the cheques, and took them to the bank, having in the majority of instances first crossed them, if they were not crossed before. The bank thereupon credited him with the amounts in his account, and he drew on his account as and when he required money. The evidence shows that during two years Jones's account would have been in debit if it had not been for these cheques. The plaintiff, as the true owner of the cheques, brings this action against the defendants for conversion, and the question is whether the defendants, who are primâ facie liable, because the forged endorsements gave them no title to the cheques, are protected from liability by any of the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act. The cheques were drawn in different ways, but the great majority of them were drawn by persons on banks other than the defendant bank, and were drawn to order, and at the time that they were paid into the bank were crossed, and also bore the endorsement of Jones.

Two questions were left to the jury—first, whether there was anything in the circumstances of the case which ought to have put the defendants on inquiry as to Jones's title to the cheques; secondly, whether the defendants had been guilty of negligence. The jury answered the first question in favour of the defendants—viz., that there was nothing to put them on inquiry, and they were not asked the second question. The case was fairly summed up by the learned judge, and the question being one of fact for the jury, I think there is no ground whatever for disturbing the verdict.

I now come to the question of law. Section 24 of the Bills of Exchange Act enacts that, where a signature on a bill is forged or unauthorized, the forged or unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative, and no right to retain the bill or to give a discharge therefor or to enforce payment thereof against any party thereto can be acquired through or under that signature. The defendants seek to protect themselves against the effect of that section by relying on the provisions of section 82, which enacts as follows: "Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment." Before the legislation as to crossed cheques, a banker dealing with a cheque drawn on any other bank than his own was unprotected against the risk of the endorsement being a forgery. He had to take the risk, and, if he dealt with a cheque bearing a forged endorsement, he was liable to an action at the suit of the true owner. The legislation in respect of crossed cheques, by enacting that such cheques shall not be paid except to a banker, throws upon bankers the duty of collecting and receiving payment of all such cheques, and at the same time it gives them protection against the liability they might incur in such collection and receipt of payment. But it was not to be expected that the protection should go beyond that which is incidental to the performance of the particular duty so imposed upon bankers. Accordingly, so far as regards all other cheques except those that are crossed, bankers are unprotected.

The evidence shows that the defendants, when they received cheques which were drawn on other banks and were crossed, immediately credited Jones in account with the amounts without waiting to see whether they would be paid or not, and that in most instances they insisted on having, and in fact had, Jones's own endorsement on the cheques. In all those cases I think that they did not merely receive the cheques for Jones and receive payment of them for him, and that, therefore, they are outside the protection of section 82. Where they took Jones's endorsement, there can be no question about it, for they thereby became holders for value with a right of action against the drawers, and what they did was altogether outside the necessities of collection. But I prefer to rest my decision on the larger principle that the protection of the section ought to be limited to what is necessary for the purpose of carrying out that duty which the Legislature has imposed on bankers. The defendants here chose to treat these cheques as cash before they carried them to their destination, and they credited the customer with them at once as if they were cash. Where bankers deal with crossed cheques in that way, instead of merely conveying them to the bank on which they are drawn and receiving the money from that bank for their customer, I think they are not receiving payment for a customer, but for themselves. I should have held the law to be so if the matter had been free from authority. But the decided cases all support my view. [His lordship referred to Matthiessen v. London and County Bank, Bissell v. Fox, Great Western Railway Co v. London and County Banking Co., and Clarke v. London and County Banking Co. Unless the defendants come strictly within the terms of the section which gives protection they are unprotected. But in giving their customer credit for the amount of the cheques immediately they were paid in they did something which was outside the section. The giving credit could not assist them in collecting the cheques. The authorities clearly show that the giving of credit in account constituted the bankers holders for value. [His lordship further referred to Lacave & Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais, [1897] 1 Q. B. 148, 45 W. R. Dig. 8; Ex parte Richdale; and Royal Bank of Scotland v. Tottenham.] That decides the main point in both cases in favour of the plaintiff.

There are also some subsidiary points. There were a number of cheques in the first action which were not crossed when they were presented to the defendants, but were afterwards crossed by the defendants themselves. It is true that the Bills of Exchange Act by section 77, sub-section 6, allows a banker to whom an uncrossed cheque has been sent for collection to cross it himself, but that does not apply here, for here the defendants began by dealing with a cheque which was not within the protection of section 82, and they did not purge the conversion by afterwards trying to collect it. The plaintiff accordingly succeeds as to class 1 also. Then there was one cheque drawn payable to bearer, which constituted class 2. With regard to this the plaintiff conceded that he could not succeed, the defendants being protected by section 31. Class 3 consisted of drafts drawn by one of the defendants' branch banks on another branch. The defendants claimed that they were protected with regard to these by section 60. The plaintiff contended that they were not cheques within the Act, and therefore outside the protection. Inasmuch as they are not drawn by one person on another, I am of opinion that they are not cheques. Primâ facie they are not cheques within the definition of a bill of exchange in section 3, sub-section 1; nor are they brought within the definition by section 17 of the Revenue Act, 1883. The plaintiff therefore succeeds as to this class also.

Class 4 consisted of crossed cheques drawn on one branch of the defendants' bank and presented to another for collection. Entries were made in the books of the latter branch in favour of the customer who presented the cheques, and entries were made in the books of the former branch whereby the amounts were credited to the other branch. It was argued that the defendants, having paid these crossed cheques otherwise than to a banker, had violated section 79 of the Act, and were therefore unprotected. On the other hand it is clear that, if the cheques had not been crossed, the defendants would have been protected by section 60. I think on a fair construction of the Act we may say that these cheques, though they were paid by the defendants to themselves, were paid by a bank to a bank, and therefore the requirements of section 79 were satisfied. In respect of class 4, then, the defendants succeed.

Class 5 consisted of cheques which were marked "not negotiable." I think the only argument founded on this difference was that it afforded an additional ground for drawing the inference that the defendants, in dealing with these cheques as they did, and becoming the holders of them, were acting outside the scope of section 82. The plaintiff therefore succeeds as to this class also.

With regard to class 7 the plaintiff has abandoned his claim, and no question now arises thereon. The case with regard to class 8 seems to me to be decided by what I have said as to classes 5 and 6.

With regard to the second action I wish to observe that, in my opinion, the fair reading of section 82 is that its protection cannot be limited to the mere receipt of the money by the banker. I think the protection covers the whole transaction of receiving payment—viz., the receiving of the cheque, the crossing of it with his own stamp, and all the necessary dealings with it down to its payment by the bank upon which it is drawn. But I think that the defendants in this case, as in the first case, did not act merely as the agents of their customer for collection. The appeals succeed in the main, and must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will deal first with the cheques comprised in class 6, and the cheques which are the subject of the second action. It is not disputed that, if it were not for the provisions of section 82, the defendant banks would be liable to the plaintiff as the true owner of those cheques: see Arnold v. Cheque Bank and Fine Art Society v. Union Bank of London. Section 82, following section 12 of the Crossed Cheques Act, 1876, is framed as if the liability of the banker arose only by reason of the receipt of payment of the cheque. It seems to me, however, that, in order to give effect to the intention of the Legislature, the section must be construed as covering every act which is necessarily incidental to the transaction of receiving payment. The only question is whether the defendant banks received payment of these cheques for a customer. In class 6 of the first case every cheque was endorsed by Jones himself, in order that the bank might have the security of his name, and the amount was at once placed to his credit. I draw the inference that there was an agreement between the bank and Jones that the cheques should not merely be collected by the bank for him, but that the bank should become holders of the cheques. In the second case the cheques were also credited to Jones at once, and from the fact that he on several occasions drew against the cheques immediately I think that the same inference ought to be drawn. On the authority of Ex parte Richdale and Royal Bank of Scotland v. Tottenham I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on the ground that the defendants made themselves holders for value of the cheques. And I think this applies equally to those cheques which were not endorsed by Jones.

I now come to the other classes of cheques in the first case. As to class 1, it is argued that the defendants, by crossing the cheques after they received them from Jones, brought themselves within section 82. I cannot agree with that argument, because I think the Legislature only intended to protect bankers when they were collecting crossed cheques as agents for a customer; and here the defendants were not acting merely as agents for a customer. As to class 2, there is now no question. As to class 3, I agree that these drafts were not cheques within the meaning of the Act, and that section 17 of the Revenue Act, 1883, does not avail the defendants in this respect. As to class 4, it is argued that the defendants are protected by section 60, which protects a banker who pays a bill drawn upon him payable to order on demand in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, although it bears a forged endorsement. By section 73 the provisions of the Act applicable to a bill of exchange payable on demand are to apply to a cheque except as otherwise provided in Part III. of the Act. I see nothing in this part of the Act to take the case out of section 60, and therefore I think that with regard to class 4 the defendants are protected. As to class 5 I think the defendants are not more protected than they are with regard to class 6. As to class 7 no question now arises. As to class 8, those drafts are not really cheques at all. I agree that both appeals should be allowed.

BRITISH ELECTRIC TRACTION CO. (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

*Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Lease—Bond, covenant, or instrument, being the only or principal or primary security for any annuity—*Ad valorem duty—Covenant relating to the matter of the lease—Lease of tramways by municipal corporation to electric traction company—Covenant to pay additional rent for repair of demised premises—Covenant to purchase electrical energy from corporation—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 4, 77 (2); First Schedule.

By an indenture made between a municipal corporation and an electric traction company in pursuance of section 19 of the Tramways Act, 1870, the corporation demised to the company the right of user of certain tramways for a term of years. The indenture provided for the payment by the lessees of an annual rent of £3,250. It further provided for the payment by the lessees of an annual sum of £900 for the repair of the demised premises. It further provided that the lessees should pay the corporation an annual sum of £4,000 *for the supply of electrical energy. Held, first, that the instrument was chargeable with ad valorem stamp duty on the total sum of £3,250 plus £900, *the latter sum being in the nature of additional rent. (a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ., upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

On the 24th of January, 1900, an instrument was presented on behalf of the British Electric Traction Co. (Limited) to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under the provisions of section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

The instrument was an indenture, dated the 23rd of January, 1900, and made between the Corporation of Croydon of the one part and the British Electric Traction Co. (Limited) of the other part. It contained a recital that the corporation were empowered by the Tramways Act, 1870, s. 19, with the consent of the Board of Trade, and subject to the provisions of the said Act, to demise the right of user of the tramways referred to in the indenture and the right of demanding and taking tolls in respect of the same; and a recital that the corporation and the company had agreed to execute a lease to that intent.

By clause 1 the corporation granted and demised unto the company the right of user, for the purpose of conveying passengers and small parcels only, of the said tramways, together with the right of demanding and taking tolls and charges in respect of the same with certain reservations.

By clause 2 these rights were granted to the lessees for the term of twenty-one years from the 1st of January, 1900, for their exclusive use, subject to a power reserved to the corporation to determine such term in certain events.

Clause 3 provided for the payment during the term of the clear rent or sum of 6½ per cent. on the cost of purchase, reconstruction, electrical equipment, rolling stock, agreed extensions, and other works carried out by the corporation, part of which amount was ascertainable at the date of the indenture and amounted to £3,250 per annum.

By clause 4 there was a provision that the lessees should further pay, as from the date of a certificate of the Board of Trade authorizing electric traction, the sum of £100 per annum per mile of road along which the tramways were laid in lieu of repairing roads and maintaining tramways, which sum was not to be less than £900 per annum.

By clause 5 a further uncertain sum was reserved as rent in certain contingencies.

Clause 6 provided for the determination of the lease at the option of the corporation, the option being exercisable at the end of a period of five years from the commencement of the term in certain contingencies and thereafter at the end of any subsequent period of five years.

Clause 24 provided that the corporation should not without the consent of the lessees grant any right to any other person or corporation over the tramways.

Clause 27 provided that the lessees should purchase all electrical energy required for the purpose of the tramways from the corporation.

Clause 30 provided that the lessees should as from the date of the certificate of the Board of Trade authorizing electric traction pay the corporation at the rate of 2d. per Board of Trade unit for the supply of electrical energy supplied by the corporation during the continuance of the lease, with a provision that so long as the corporation duly supplied the energy reasonably required by the lessees for working the said tramways the minimum sum which should be payable in any one year should be £4,000, and contained a further provision for revision of the price charged at the end of the second year from the date of the certificate of the Board of Trade authorizing electric traction. The instrument fixed no time within which the certificate was to be obtained.

Clause 33 provided that the corporation should repair and maintain the roads on which the tramways were placed.

Clause 42 provided for the determination by the lessees in certain contingencies of their obligation to purchase electrical energy from the corporation.

Clause 44 gave a special power of distress in the event of non-payment of any of the rents or moneys thereby made payable, except the payments to be made for or in respect of electrical energy.

The lease was expressed to be made in pursuance of the Tramways Act, 1870.

It was contended by the lessees that the instrument fell to be charged under the head of "Lease or Tack" in the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891, under sub-head 4—viz, "of any other kind whatsoever not hereinbefore described," and was liable to a duty of 10s. only.

The commissioners held that in respect of the provisions other than those contained in clauses 5 and 30 the instrument was chargeable, under sub-head 3 of the above-mentioned head, as a lease "for any indefinite term . . . of heritable subjects where the consideration . . . moving to the lessor . . . consists of any money, stock, or security," and was therefore liable to ad valorem duty at the rate of 5s. on every £50 on the rent of £3,250, plus £900—namely, of the sum of £20 15s. They also held that it was chargeable with the fixed duty of 10s. in respect of the rent mentioned in clause 5, which was at the date of the indenture unascertainable, and further in respect of the minimum sum of £4,000 per annum mentioned in clause 30 was chargeable, under the head "Bond, Covenant," &c., sub-head 1, in the same schedule, with £105, being 2s. 6d. per cent. on the minimum sum multiplied by twenty-one, the number of years during which the same might have been payable if the tramways had been electrically equipped and the certificate of the Board of Trade obtained on the 1st of January, 1900, and if the corporation had made no default in the supply of electrical energy during the continuance of the lease.

The questions for the court were whether the instrument was chargeable with the several sums of £20 15s., 10s., and £105, and, if not, with what duty the instrument was chargeable.

Section 77 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, enacts as follows: "A lease made for any consideration in respect whereof it is chargeable with ad valorem duty, and in further consideration either of a covenant by the lessee to make, or of his having previously made, any substantial improvement of or addition to the property demised to him, or of any covenant relating to the matter of the lease, is not to be charged with any duty in respect of such further consideration."

On the hearing of the special case the Divisional Court were divided in opinion. Kennedy, J., held that the sums of £900 and £4,000 were not chargeable either as rent or under the head "Bond, Covenant, or Instrument," and that the stipulations as to the payment of those sums were "covenants relating to the matter of the lease" within section 77 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that, therefore, those sums were exempt from the payment of duty in addition to that charged on the rent. Phillimore, J., held that both sums represented rent, and ought therefore to be taken into consideration in assessing the ad valorem duty with which the instrument was chargeable as a "lease or tack." Phillimore, J., having withdrawn his judgment, the judgment of the court was entered in accordance with the opinion of Kennedy, J.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: The question in this case is what stamp duty is payable upon a certain instrument executed between the Corporation of Croydon and the British Electric Traction Co. (Limited). The learned judges in the court below differed in opinion. Kennedy, J., decided against the Crown, while Phillimore, J., decided, in the main at all events, in its favour. The latter learned judge withdrew his judgment, and the Crown now appeals.

The instrument in question purports to be a lease from the corporation to the Traction Co. By clauses 1, 2, and 3 it was witnessed that, in consideration of the yearly rent and other payments thereinafter reserved, and of the covenants, conditions, and agreements thereinafter contained, the corporation did thereby grant and demise unto the lessees the right of user, for the purpose of conveying passengers, &c., of the tramways delineated and described in the plan annexed thereto for a term of twenty-one years, yielding and paying yearly the clear rent or sum of 6½ per cent. on the cost of purchase, &c., on the 1st of January, the 1st of April, the 1st of July, and the 1st of October in every year. The amount of the rent payable under this clause has been agreed at £3,250, and the lease has been stamped with an ad valorem stamp based upon that figure. The dispute between the parties arises upon two other provisions. First, under clause 4 of the agreement, which provides as follows: [His lordship read clause 4.] As to this the Crown contend that further ad valorem stamp duty is payable as upon rent of £900 per annum. The other point arises under clauses 27 and 30 of the agreement. [His lordship read clauses 27 and 30, and also clauses 42 and 44.] It is contended by the Crown that the contract of clause 30 for the payment of £4,000 per annum is subject to stamp duty as a "bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever, being the only or principal or primary security for any annuity (except upon the original creation thereof by way of sale or security, and except a superannuation annuity), or for any sum or sums of money at stated periods, not being interest for any principal sum secured by a duly stamped instrument, nor rent reserved by a lease or tack": see schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. Failing that, they say that it is rent, and subject to further ad valorem stamp duty as such.

The Traction Co. contend that, in accordance with the judgment of Kennedy, J., they are excused from any further duty in respect of either the covenant for the payment of £900 per annum under clause 4, or of £4,000 per annum under clause 30, by the provisions of section 77, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891. [His lordship read the sub-section.] And they say that the effect of this sub-section is to create an exception in favour of a lease chargeable with ad valorem duty, as this is an exception to the provisions of section 4 of the Stamp Act, which is as follows: "Except where express provision to the contrary is made by this or any other Act, (a) an instrument containing or relating to several distinct matters is to be separately and distinctly charged, as if it were a separate instrument, with duty in respect of each of the matters; (b) an instrument made for any consideration in respect whereof it is chargeable with ad valorem duty, and also for any further or other valuable consideration or considerations, is to be separately and distinctly charged, as if it were a separate instrument, with duty in respect of each of the considerations." On the other hand, the Crown contend, as I have already said, that as to £900, under clause 4, it is to be treated as rent and as such swelling the ad valorem stamp duty. While as to the £4,000 their primary contention is that, though in the lease, it relates to a distinct matter and is to be charged as if it was a separate instrument under section 4, and that, inasmuch as if it had stood alone in a separate instrument it would have been subject to stamp duty as a "bond, covenant, or instrument, being the only, &c.," so equally it is now stampable as such, notwithstanding the fact that it is contained in the lease. Their alternative contention, which was very faintly pressed, is, I have already said, that the £4,000 may be treated as rent.

First, then, with respect to the claim in respect of £900, under clause 4, at first sight, having regard to the form of the words used, it looks to me as if it was assumed that a liability had already been imposed on the lessees to repair the road and maintain the tramways, and that the effect of the provision is to commute that liability for a money payment to the corporation to take upon themselves the duty of repairing instead of leaving the lessees to do it, and if this were the true view of the position I should be disposed to agree with Kennedy, J., that it falls within the provision of section 77, sub-section 2, exempting a lease chargeable with ad valorem duty from paying a duty in respect of the further consideration arising upon that covenant. It is a fact, however, that by the General Tramways Act the liability for these repairs is imposed on the corporation itself—a liability from which it cannot escape by demising the tramways—while there are certainly no express provisions in the lease throwing the obligation of repairing upon the lessees. Construing the clause, therefore, in view of this fact, it seems to me in substance to be what the Attorney-General contended it was—viz., a stipulation for additional rent payable to the lessors by reason of their undertaking to keep the demised premises in repair, and it is to be noted that under clause 44 this sum, as well as the rent of £3,250 above-mentioned, is made recoverable by distress. Therefore, I accept the contention of the Crown on this part of the case.

As to the £4,000, which is, under clause 30, the minimum sum payable by the lessees for the supply of electric energy by the corporation, I do not think that this sum can be properly described as rent. It is not in fact rent, it is a sum payable for electric energy to be supplied just as gas, or water, or any other commodity might be supplied, and the parties themselves do not pretend to treat it as rent, and have expressly excepted it from the provision as to distress in clause 44. On the other hand, I do not think it can be treated as a distinct matter falling outside the exception of section 77, sub-section 2, which relieves "any covenant relating to the matter of the lease" from "any duty in respect of such further consideration." It is one of the covenants in the lease, and it seems to me to relate to the matter of the lease, within the meaning of that section. If there were an express covenant to draw the supply of electric energy from the corporation for the purpose of using it on the tramway, I think it would be a covenant touching and concerning the thing demised within the strict rules applicable to covenants running with the land, just as much as a covenant to take all the beer to be consumed on the premises of a particular public-house from the lessor: see Clegg v. Hands, 38 W. R. 433, 44 Ch. D. 503. And the covenant to pay £4,000 as a minimum sum is really ancillary to the main provision and a security for its performance, and even though technically such a covenant might not be capable of running with the land, I think the words of the section "any covenant relating to the matter of the lease" ought to receive a wider interpretation. I think the object of the Legislature was to relieve from charge all covenants fairly within the scope of the lease and being part of the consideration for the lease, and I think the covenant in question fairly comes within the exemption which the Legislature intended to bestow. This reasoning, if correct, disposes equally of the alternative view of Phillimore, J., which was not pressed by the Crown, that the consideration is "money, stock, or security." For these reasons I think the contention of the Crown fails as to the £4,000 either as grounding a claim for stamp duty as a bond or covenant or as being rent. The result is that the Crown succeeds as to the claim for stamp duty on the £900, but fails as to the claim for stamp duty on the £4,000.

PARKER v. W. F. STANLEY & CO. (LIMITED). (a)

Light—Ancient lights—Prescription—Purposes requiring special quantity of light—Abandonment—Mandatory injunction.

Although less than twenty years have elapsed since an ancient light has been used for a business requiring a special quantity of light, and although such business could not have been carried on but for the enlargement of the ancient light, which enlargement was made within that period,

Held, nevertheless, that the light, so far as ancient, must not be substantially interfered with, and that the court would take into consideration the nature of the business.

Warren v. Brown, ante, p. 97, [1902] 1 K. B. 15, discussed.

The plaintiffs in this action were photographers carrying on business at 288, High Holborn.

The lights in question were those in a one-storey extension of the plaintiffs' premises to the back, which extension was divided into three portions for the purposes of their business, called respectively the gallery, the studio, and the dark-room.

(a) Reported by J. F. CARR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1890, when the plaintiffs' tenancy began, each of these portions had been for some time lighted by a skylight. But soon after that time the skylight in the studio was removed and the whole roof glazed, thus including in its glazed area the space occupied by the old light.

Up to 1884 a building stood on the defendants' land to the west of these lights, but from 1884 to 1900 the land formerly occupied by such building was vacant. In that year the defendants began to build on their land and the plaintiffs complained that the building which they had erected caused a substantial interference with their light as compared with the building which had stood in 1884, and claimed a mandatory injunction for the removal of so much of the defendants' building as caused such interference.

For the defence it was pleaded that there was no substantial interference, and that so far as the dark-room was concerned the right to light had been abandoned. It was also contended that as the business of photographers had not been carried on for twenty years in the premises, the plaintiffs were entitled to no more light than was necessary for its reasonable use for the purpose for which it had been previously used—viz., a restaurant.

The defendants' building was higher than the building which had occupied the site down to 1884. At the time of the issue of the writ it had reached to about the same height as the old building, and was subsequently completed.

Jenkins, K.C., Colt, and Coltman, for the plaintiffs.—We can, of course, only protect that part of the glazed roof in the studio which represents the old light. As to the abandonment, it is not proved. Evidence of non-user which might prevent a right arising is not enough to prove abandonment. It is not necessary to show prescriptive title to a special amount of light: Lazarus v. Artistic Photographic Co., 45 W. R 614, [1897] 2 Ch. 215; Warren v. Brown, ante, p. 97, [1902] 1 K. B. 15. We are entitled to a mandatory injunction, for the damage is speculative and the defendants continued their building with full notice of our intention to claim it: Aynsley v. Glover, 23 W. R. 457, L. R 10 Ch. App. 283; Home and Colonial Stores v. Colls, 83 L. T. 759, 49 W. R. Dig. 55.

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and P. Wheeler, for the defendants.—We admit that the plaintiffs' lights are ancient. The defendants could not have known that the light was required for special purposes. Until the enlargement of the skylight it would not have been possible to have taken photographs in the studio. The plaintiffs can be in no better position than the previous occupier, who did not want special light for his business.

FARWELL, J.—This is an action for a mandatory injunction to give effect to rights of ancient lights. The defendants do not contend that the lights in question were not ancient in 1890, and I find accordingly. Since 1890 the plaintiffs have carried on on the premises the business of photographers. The lights concerned are two windows, or rather skylights, in what are called the studio and the dark-room. I will deal first with the dark-room. It follows from the finding of fact that the plaintiffs would have to prove release of those rights by acts showing an intention to abandon them. The use of the room as a photographic dark-room in the manner described in the evidence is not such an act, for the obstruction used was not sufficient to exclude all light, and the prospect of using the dark-room for some other purpose in the future was contemplated. I find that there has been substantial interference with the dark-room lights.

As to the studio, when the plaintiffs took the premises it had a window placed across the apex of the roof like a saddle, the roof itself being in a continuous line with the rest of the building. The plaintiffs glazed over the whole of the roof so that the new glass roof covers the space formerly occupied by the old windows. There was a cone of light which came over the defendants' old building to the old window of the plaintiffs' premises.

Less than twenty years ago there was a building on the west which obstructed the light to that window. The building was irregular in outline and the defendants have filled up the interstices and have in my judgment materially obstructed the access of light to the old window. The plaintiffs carry on business as photographers, for which a special light is most important and is reasonably required. It has now been held by the Court of Appeal that a man is entitled to have his light not interfered with, but "the right would not be interfered with if there were no substantial diminution of the light such as to cause substantial damage to the tenant or owner. And in considering what would be a substantial diminution and substantial damage, it is held that the proper point of view is to pay regard, not to what some person having fantastic or peculiar views might choose to regard as a substantial diminution or as substantial damage, but to the views of persons of ordinary sense and judgment And, in particular, in considering whether a house has been substantially injured it is proper to have regard to the ordinary user by way of habitation or business to which the house has been put, or might reasonably be supposed to be capable of being put": Romer, L.J., in Warren v. Brown. In that case special light was required for a particular business which had not been enjoyed with that business for twenty years. Wright, J., found that there had been no obstruction except to the particular business carried on, and dismissed the action. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision and held that, as substantial damage to the light had been proved, there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

It follows therefore that the plaintiffs are entitled to complain because they are injured in the particular business which they carry on. I am clear on the evidence that there has been such substantial diminution of the light as to interfere with their business as photographers. Mr. Wheeler argued very ingeniously that as the photographic business has been made possible only by enlarging the window, which was done less than twenty years ago, I ought not to take into consideration the particular business carried on. But the plaintiffs are entitled to the cone of light passing over the defendants' building through the old aperture subject to the qualification of the rule, called for convenience the rule of give and take. They are only entitled to the light reasonably required for the use of the premises for ordinary business if ordinary business is carried on or for a special business if a special business is in fact or could reasonably be proposed to be carried on. The plaintiffs cannot ask for more than a reasonable man can require. As photographers they were well within their rights in opening new windows, and it is quite impossible to take the new lights into consideration upon the question of the reasonable light required for the business. The plaintiff's press for a mandatory injunction. There is substantial damage proved, certainly more than £50 or £100 if it could be assessed in money, but it is, beyond that, exceedingly difficult to assess in figures. The defendants went on building after the writ was issued and after receiving a warning that a mandatory injunction would be sought. They had just about reached the height of the old building at the time the writ was issued. I therefore grant a mandatory injunction and make the declaration asked for.

When in an action for infringement of a patent the plaintiffs offer no evidence and the action is dismissed with costs, the court will not hear evidence that the defendants' particulars of objections were reasonable and proper, and will not grant a certificate under section 29, sub-section 6, of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to that effect.

In this action for infringement of a patent the defendants had delivered particulars of objections in the usual course. Upon the action coming on for hearing,

A. J. Walter, for the plaintiffs, offered no evidence, and applied to have the action dismissed.

T. Terrell, K.C. (Jenkins, K.C., and Frost with him), for the defendants, applied for a certificate under section 29, sub-section 6, of the Patents Act, 1883, that the particulars of objections were reasonable and proper. These particulars were reasonable and proper on the face of the documents, and, therefore, upon the authority of a note in the Annual Practice, 1902, p. 922, mentioning a case decided by Stirling, J., in chambers, a certificate should be granted.

FARWELL, J., pointed out that in the case mentioned in the Annual Practice the action was discontinued and not dismissed. He held that Mandelberg v. Morley, 43 W. R. 266, was a binding authority upon him, and refused the application for a certificate.

Company—Debentures—Registration—Extension of time —Winding up—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), ss. 14, 15.

An order under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1900, extending the time for the registration of debentures should be made without prejudice to rights acquired prior to the actual time of registration.

In re Joplin Brewery Co. (Limited), ante, p. 75, [1902] 1 Ch. 79, and In re Spiral Globe (Limited), ante, p. 187, followed.

Semble, the order will, except under very exceptional circumstances, always be made in this form.

In October, 1898, this company was incorporated, and on the 4th of November following the directors passed a resolution sanctioning the issue of fifty-five debentures of £100 each. Fifty of these debentures were issued prior to the 1st of January, 1901, but the remaining five were not issued to the applicant, Mr. Edgar Davis, until July, 1901. These five debentures were never registered in accordance with section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900.

On the 16th of October, 1901, the company passed an extraordinary resolution for a voluntary winding up. This summons was taken out under section 15 of the Act on the 21st of November, 1901. It appeared that the applicant had not originally registered his debentures owing to a misapprehension of the meaning of the Act of 1900, having been (as it proved, wrongly) advised that these debentures formed part of a series issued in accordance with a resolution which was the only thing to be registered, and that, as that resolution was passed in 1898, there was nothing that required registration under the Act.

Peterson, for the applicant.

Stewart Smith, for the liquidator, was not called upon.

BUCKLEY, J., said that this charge was created in July, 1901, and as it had never been registered under section 14 of the Act of 1900, was as against creditors and the liquidator void. The applicant now desired to have the time for registration extended, and asked that such registration might operate retrospectively as from a date prior to the winding-up resolution, and that the order might be made without the insertion of the condition imposed in the Joplin Brewery case, ante, p. 75, [1902] 1 Ch. 79, and in the Spiral Globe case, ante, p. 187.

If the registration were allowed in the form asked the rights both of the holders of the other fifty debentures and of the unsecured creditors would be prejudiced, and the court ought not to make the order in such a form as to prejudice their rights. The wording of section 15 of the 1900 Act was wider than that of the corresponding section of the Bills of Sale Act, and although the omission to register in this case was neither accidental nor due to inadvertence, it was due to the "other sufficient cause" that the applicant had been advised that registration was unnecessary, and therefore fell within this section. He considered that the case was entirely governed by the principle laid down in the two cases of Crew v. Cummings, 36 W. R. 908, 21 Q. B. D. 420, and In re Parsons, 41 W. R. 468, [1893] 2 Q. B. 122, decided under the corresponding section of the Bills of Sale Act, and followed in the Spiral Globe case. On the liquidation the rights of all creditors attached, and he could upon no principle take away their strict rights. An innocent creditor who has neglected to complete his security cannot be allowed to take away the rights of other innocent creditors.

He would add that except under very exceptional circumstances the order would always follow the form adopted in the Joplin Brewery case, and that in a case where the winding-up had commenced that could do nobody any good, and it was idle to apply for an order extending the time for registration. Under the circumstances he would make no order, and the applicant must pay the costs.

HELYAR v. BECKETT. (a.)

Infant—Tenant for life—Rents and profits—Testamentary guardian—Trustees of will—Power of sale— 12 Car. 2. c. 24, s. 9—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 42.

Trustees who are appointed trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and, therefore, where the tenant for life is a minor, have the statutory authority to exercise on behalf of the tenant for life the power of sale vested in him under those Acts, are not, thereby, "trustees with the power of sale" under section 42 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, so as to entitle them to enter into possession of the land and receive the rents and profits under that section.

This was an originating summons taken out on behalf of an infant by his next friend and guardian against the trustees of his father's will asking for a declaration that the testamentary guardian was entitled, during the minority and for the benefit of the infant, to the possession of and to receive the rents and profits of the testator's real estate.

By his will dated the 21st of February, 1900, the testator, Colonel Charles Welman Hawker Helyar, appointed the defendants to be his executors and trustees, and also appointed them to be trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882-1890.

He appointed his cousin, Caroline Grace Fane Fane, to be the guardian of his children during their respective minorities and declared that she should be entitled to reside at his house, Poundisford Lodge, near Taunton, free of rent, rates, and taxes, so long as she should be acting as guardian, but so nevertheless that such dwelling-house should during her occupation be kept by her as a home for his children. He then devised Poundisford Lodge and all his real estate in the parish of Pitminster to his trustees to the use of his eldest son Vincent during his life with divers remainders over in strict settlement. The will then proceeded: "If my trustees shall enter into possession of the said hereditaments or any undivided share thereof during the infancy of a tenant for life or tenant in tail, under this my will, and such tenant for life or tenant in tail shall die during infancy, then, and in such case, the accumulations (if any) arising during such infancy shall be held upon such trusts as the same would be held upon if the same were capital arising from the sale of the said hereditaments under the Settled Land Acts."

The testator died in July, 1900, and left surviving him five children, including the eldest son Vincent, all of whom were infants.

The defendants entered into possession of the rents and profits of the estate.

Mrs. Fane, however, as guardian of the eldest son Vincent, claimed to be entitled during his minority to receive the rents and profits for his benefit under section 9 of 12 Car. 2, c. 24. The trustees refusing to account to her, this summons was taken out.

Hughes, K.C., and H. W. Horne, for the plaintiff.—Mrs. Fane is entitled, under 12 Car. 2, c. 24, s. 9, to receive the rents and profits of the estate during the minority of the eldest son as a person to whom the custody of such child or children hath been or shall be so disposed or devised who shall and may take into his or their custody to the use of such child or children the profits of all lands, tenements, and hereditaments of such child or children . . . till their respective age of one-and-twenty years, or any lesser time, according to such disposition aforesaid." She has been appointed testamentary guardian under the will, and she is entitled to possession.

Younger, K.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the trustees and executors.—The defendants have been appointed trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, they therefore are "trustees of the settlement," and under section 60 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, may exercise the powers of the tenant for life during his minority; this includes the power of sale vested in the tenant for life, they are therefore "trustees with power of sale of the settled land" under section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and are entitled to the possession of the land and the receipt of rents and profits under that section. Under section 42 the powers of trustees are well defined, while those of testamentary guardian over the property of the infant are by no means certain: Gardner v. Blane, 1 Hare 381.

Hughes, in reply.—The statute of Car. 2 has not been repealed, and the plaintiff is undoubtedly entitled under it; the 42nd section of the Act of 1881 was not intended to displace the testamentary guardian, but only to provide a substitute where none had been appointed. The defendants have no power of sale and are therefore not within section 42.

JOYCE, J.—This is a case of the construction of a will of a testator who died in July, 1900. The will contains a specific devise of his Pitminster estates to the use of his infant son during his life with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, and the testator appoints the defendants to be the executors and trustees of his will, and also trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, but not expressly for purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. He also appoints his cousin, the plaintiff Mrs. Fane, guardian of his infant children during their respective minorities, and declares that she shall be entitled to live at Poundisford Lodge free of rent, rates, and taxes during that period. Later in the will is contained the following clause: [His lordship read the clause set out above, and continued:] It cannot be denied that that clause would have have been an apt and proper clause to be inserted in the will if the testator had expressly appointed his trustees to be trustees for purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881; it exactly fits the later sub-section of that section, and in particular I notice in sub-section 5 (iii.) that "if the infant dies while an infant . . . then where the infant was under the settlement tenant for life or by purchase tenant in tail," the trustees are to stand possessed of the accumulated fund ". . . on the trusts (if any) declared of the accumulated fund of the settlement." Now, that is exactly what this clause provides for, and I have no doubt that the draftsman of the will was under the impression that he had by the instrument appointed the trustees to be trustees for the purpose of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 42, and the clause in question was probably inserted as a common form used in such cases. But the trustees were certainly not expressly appointed trustees for the purposes of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and the mere indication of the intention of the draftsman cannot be treated as equivalent to such an appointment. The result is that these gentlemen were not appointed trustees for the purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing Act. Then it is said that, being trustees under the Settled Land Act, 1882, they were really by virtue of section 60 of that Act trustees for the purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing Act By section 60 of the Settled Land Act, where a tenant for life or a person having the powers of a tenant for life under that Act is an infant, or an infant would, if he were of full age, be a tenant for life or have the powers of a tenant for life under the Act, the powers of the tenant for life under the Act may be exercised on his behalf by the trustees of the settlement. Now what is the meaning of the expression "the trustees of the settlement" there used? By section 2 (8) it is defined to mean the persons who are by the settlement declared to be the trustees for the purposes of the Act. The defendants are therefore trustees of the settlement under section 60. But are they "trustees with power of sale of the settled land" within section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881? In my opinion, after carefully considering the sections, they are not. Under the Settled Land Act the power of sale is vested in the tenant for life, and none the less because he is an infant. All that the trustees have is the statutory authority to exercise on behalf of the tenant for life the power of sale which is vested in him. In other words, the mere fact that the trustees are trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, and therefore "trustees of the settlement" under section 60, does not make them trustees for the purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. That being so I am prepared to make a declaration that the defendants are not trustees for the purposes of or under section 42, and that Mrs. Fane as guardian of the infant appointed by the will is entitled during his minority to receive the rents and profits of the property in question by virtue of the Act of Car. 2.

PEARKS, GUNSTON, & TEE (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. RICHARDSON (Respondent). (a.)

Justices—Summons under the Food and Drugs Act—Service of summons—Defendant a limited company—Sale of Food and Drugs Acts—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 57), s. 62.

A service of a summons under the Food and Drugs Acts on a limited company is only valid if served in the manner prescribed under section 62 of the Companies Act.

Case stated by justices.

The appellants are a limited liability company and carry on business at 6, Bayer-street, Golden-lane, in the city of London, which is their registered office. Among the branch offices is one at 15, High-street, Canterbury. The respondent is an inspector under the Sale of Foods and Drugs Acts.

On the 1st of June, 1901, the respondent went to the appellants' shop in Canterbury and purchased a pound of butter.

He preferred against the appellants an information under section 3 of the Sale of Foods and Drugs Acts charging them with selling butter to their knowledge injurious to health.

The summons was handed to the appellants' assistant in their shop at Canterbury.

The appellants appeared by their solicitor and alleged that the summons should have been served in accordance with section 62 of the Companies Act, 1862, at the registered office of the appellants in London, and that the service at the shop in Canterbury was not a legal and proper service, and that the justices had no jurisdiction to entertain the information.

The justices overruled the objections and held that the summons had been properly served. The appellants' solicitor therefore took no further part in the proceedings.

The appellants were convicted, but a case was stated on the legality of the service.

Macmorran, K.C. (Bonsey and Ricardo with him), for the appellants—The summons was not duly served. The proper method to serve a company is under section 62 of the Companies Act. The Summary Jurisdiction Acts do not apply to service on a company. [He referred to Newby v. Von Oppen, 20 W. R. 383, L. R. 7 Q. B. 273; Wood v. Anderston Foundry Co., 36 W. R. 918.] The invalidity of the summons was not cured by the appearance of the solicitor merely to protest.

The respondent was not legally represented.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case I am of opinion that in the absence of any direct legislation or of any rule of practice lawfully made, the service of such a summons upon a company should be in the manner prescribed by section 62 of the Companies Act, 1862. It is not without importance that in the Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 25), special provision is made by section 94, sub-section 4, for serving a summons or other proceeding on the society. There is no doubt that writs and other proceedings must be served on a limited company in the manner required by section 62 of the Act of 1862, and there seems to be no reason why a difference should be made in regard to criminal proceedings. Certainly in criminal matters the practice should not be more lax than in civil proceedings. I am therefore of opinion that this summons was not properly served. But then it is said that as the defendants did appear the informality was cured, and that the magistrates had jurisdiction to deal with the matter. But the defendants' solicitor merely attended to take the point that the summons was not properly served, and at once withdrew from the case when his objection was overruled. I am clearly of opinion that when a defendant merely appears in order to raise the question of the invalidity of the summons, and takes no further part in the case, that is not such an appearance as will operate as a waiver of the objection to the service.

In my opinion the magistrates had no jurisdiction to entertain the question and the conviction must be set aside.

DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

Conviction quashed.

By sections 12 and 16 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, it is provided that a husband may take criminal proceedings against his wife concerning property claimed by him, if such property shall have been wrongfully taken by the wife when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband.

On the trial of a charge by a husband against his wife for feloniously stealing certain moneys, goods, and chattels belonging to him when she was about to leave or desert him, it is not necessary that the indictment should contain averments that she was the wife of the prosecutor, and that she had taken the articles when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband.

Case stated by the chairman of the Glamorganshire Quarter Sessions for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

The prisoners, Sarah Eliza James and Thomas Johnson, were tried on an indictment the first count of which was as follows: "That Sarah Eliza James and Thomas Johnson, on the 5th of October, 1901, at the parish of Pontypridd, in the county of Glamorgan, did feloniously steal, take, and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made, certain moneys, to wit, three pounds, and a deal box, a sewing-machine, a quilt, two sheets, a waistcoat, a cruet, two pictures, two ornaments, a table-cloth, a tray, two plates, and three glasses, of the moneys, goods, and chattels of John Thomas James." There was a second count which charged the prisoners with having received the said money, goods, and chattels, well knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen.

The prisoners severally pleaded "not guilty."

It appeared from the evidence at the trial that Sarah Eliza James was the wife of John Thomas James, and that Thomas Johnson was a lodger in his house, and that on the day in question the wife had, while her husband had been induced by Johnson to accompany him to Cardiff, removed the articles in question from her husband's house and deserted him, and subsequently joined Johnson, in whose possession the articles were found.

The female prisoner appeared as a witness and stated that she was the wife of the prosecutor.

At the close of the evidence, and before the case was put to the jury, counsel for the prisoners submitted that the indictment was insufficient against the wife for want of an averment that she was the wife of John Thomas James, and that she had taken the articles when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband, so as to complete the statement of an offence under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 12 and 16.

The chairman held (1) that the allegation was not necessary to the form of the indictment, and (2) that if it was, the objection should have been taken before plea and not afterwards, and he directed the jury that it was necessary before they could find the wife guilty that they should be satisfied that the property was wrongfully taken by her when she was about to leave her husband.

The second count was withdrawn.

The jury found both prisoners guilty of larceny.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: Firstly, whether it is essential that an indictment against a married woman for stealing the goods of her husband should aver that she was his wife and wrongfully took the goods when about to leave him. Secondly, whether objection to the want of such averment can be successfully made by a wife who has pleaded to the indictment.

Lloyd Morgan, for the prisoners.—The indictment is insufficient. The question in this case arises under section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which section is extended by section 16. In The Queen v. Streeter, 48 W. R. 702, [1900] 2 Q. B. 601, it was held that the stealing by a woman of her husband's goods did not amount to a felony either at common law or by virtue of the Larceny Act, 1861, but was only made criminal by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 12 and 16. There was, therefore, a new statutory offence created, and this indictment, charging, as it does, simple larceny, is insufficient, since directly it was proved that the prisoner was the wife of the prosecutor the offence charged was disproved. The indictment ought to have stated that the prisoner was the wife of the prosecutor, and that she took the goods when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband. In Hales' Pleas of the Crown (1736), vol. 2, p. 170, it is laid down as follows: "An indictment grounded upon an offence made by Act of Parliament must by express words bring the offence within the substantial description made in the Act of Parliament, and those circumstances mentioned in the statute to make up the offence shall not be supplied by the general conclusion contra formam statuti." In this case the indictment does not bring the offence charged within the description in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882: Steel v. Smith, 1 B. & Ald. 94 (see judgment of Lord Ellenborough, C.J.).

Albert Parsons, for the prosecution.—The indictment is good. In the case of The Queen v. Streeter the point as to the sufficiency of the indictment was not taken, that case is therefore not an authority on the present case. The offence here is that of larceny, and is created by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. The proviso in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is not a definition of the offence; it merely gives an answer to the defence which might be set up that the prisoner was the wife of the prosecutor: see judgment of Lord Abinger, C.B., in Thibault v. Gibson, 12 M. & W. 88, at p. 94. [Counsel also referred to The King v. Hall, 1 T. R. 320, and to Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, bk. 2, c. 25, s. 113.] It is not necessary to allege in the indictment that the husband and the wife were living apart at the time of the offence.

Lloyd Morgan replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., and LAWRANCE, WRIGHT, BRUCE, and DARLING, JJ.) was read by Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—At common law a wife could not steal her husband's goods, and now she can only be convicted of larceny by virtue of the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 12 and 16: see Reg. v. Kenny, 25 W. R. 679, 2 Q. B. D. 307. By the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 12, "Every woman, whether married before or after this Act, shall have in her own name against all persons whomsoever, including her husband, the same civil remedies, and also (subject as regards her husband to the proviso hereinafter contained) the same remedies and redress by way of criminal proceedings, for the protection and security of her own separate property as if such property belonged to her as a feme sole . . . Provided always that no criminal proceeding shall be taken by any wife against her husband by virtue of this Act while they are living together as to or concerning any property claimed by her, nor while they are living apart as to or concerning any act done by the husband while they were living together concerning property claimed by the wife, unless such property shall have been wrongfully taken by the husband when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, his wife." By section 16, "A wife doing any act with respect to any property of her husband which, if done by the husband with respect to property of the wife, would make the husband liable to criminal proceedings by the wife under this Act, shall in like manner be liable to criminal proceedings by her husband."

Criminal proceedings can only be instituted by the husband against the wife if the wife and husband are not living together at the time the criminal proceedings are taken, and even then they can only be taken concerning an act done by the wife at the time when they were not living together concerning property of her husband, unless such property shall have been wrongfully taken by the wife when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband. We think it is clear that in the case of an indictment against the wife for stealing the goods of her husband, upon proof that the husband and wife were living together at the time when the criminal proceedings were taken, a good defence would be established; and so, if the act relied upon as constituting larceny were proved to have been done by the wife while the husband and wife were living together, there could be no larceny unless it could be proved that the property had been wrongfully taken by the wife when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband. But the question to be determined is whether the conditions imposed by the proviso contained in section 12 and incorporated into section 16 are conditions which must be proved by the prosecution to exist in order to establish the offence, or whether the offence may be established without regard to the conditions, in the absence of any evidence offered by defendant of facts which would establish a ground of defence under the proviso. If compliance with the conditions is a necessary ingredient in the offence, then we think statements alleging compliance with the conditions are an essential part of the indictment.

In Thibault v. Gibson Lord Abinger, C.B., said: "I believe it is a well-established principle that in all cases where proceedings are taken against a party for the recovery of a penalty under a statute, if there be any exception in the clause which gives the penalty exempting certain cases from its operation, the declaration or information must shew that the particular case is not within the exception. But where it comes by way of proviso in a subsequent part of the Act it is not necessary to notice it in the declaration or information, but it is matter which the defendant must allege as a ground of defence." In the same case Parke, B., after quoting a passage from 1 Wms. Saund. 262 (a), much to the same effect as the passage cited from Lord Abinger, at page 95, proceeds as follows: "In all cases of exception where it comes by way of proviso in a subsequent section, the exception must be noticed by the party who relies on it, and I have some doubt whether the same rule does not also hold even where the exception comes by way of proviso in the same section, although it will not be necessary to decide that point at present."

In the case of Rex v. Jarvis, 1 East., 643, note, at p. 646, note, Lord Mansfield, C.J., says: "It is a known distinction that what comes by way of proviso in a statute must be insisted on by way of defence by the party accused; but where exceptions are in the enacting part of a law it must appear in the charge that the defendant does not fall within any of them." In the same case Denison, J., at p. 647, note, says: "There is a known distinction between exceptions in a statute by way of proviso (which need not be set forth), and those in the purview of the Act." And in the same case Foster, J., says: "Where negatives are descriptive of the offence, there they must be set forth."

In Chitty on Pleading (4th ed.), vol. 1, p. 322, the law is thus stated: "It is material, however, in all cases that the offence or act charged to have been committed or omitted by the defendant appear to have been within the provision of the statute, and all circumstances necessary to support the action must be alleged. . . . Where a person is exempt from a penalty under certain circumstances by a proviso in a statute, and not in the body of it, the plaintiff need not state that the defendant is not within the exemptions, for that is merely matter of defence to be shown by the defendant; but where the exception is contained in the enacting clause, it must be negatived in the declaration, and where an Act of Parliament in the enacting clause creates an offence and gives a penalty, and in the same section there follows a proviso containing an exception which is not incorporated with the enacting clause by any words of reference, it is not necessary for the plaintiff in suing for the penalty to negative the exception; and in this respect there seems a material difference between a proviso and an exception."

In Steel v. Smith the head-note is to the following effect: "Where an Act of Parliament, in the enacting clause, creates an offence and gives a penalty, and in the same section there follows a proviso containing an exemption which is not incorporated with the enacting clause by any words of reference, it is not necessary for the plaintiff, in suing for the penalty, to negative such proviso in his declaration." In that case Bayley, J., said at p. 99: "I cannot say that the proviso is part of the same sentence; for if it had been omitted the preceding sentence would have been entire." In the same case Abbott, J., said: "There is a technical distinction between a proviso and an exception, which is well understood. All the cases say that if there be an exception in the enacting clause, it must be negatived, but if there be a separate proviso it need not."

It is true that the last two quotations refer to declarations in civil actions; but the principles applicable are the same, although, no doubt, the principles will be applied with greater strictness in criminal than in civil proceedings.

In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, bk. 2, c. 25, s. 113, (3rd ed.) vol. 2. p. 343, there is this passage: "It seems agreed that there is no need to allege in an indictment that the defendant is not within the benefit of the provisos of a statute whereon it is founded, and this hath been adjudged even as to those statutes which in their purview expressly take notice of the provisos; as by saying that none shall do the thing prohibited, otherwise than in such special cases, &c., as are expressed in this Act."

We think the substance of the authorities is this: That it is not necessary for the prosecution to negative a proviso, even though the proviso be contained in the same section of the Act of Parliament creating the offence, unless the proviso is in the nature of an exception which is incorporated directly or by reference with the enacting clause, so that the enacting clause cannot be read without the qualification introduced by the exception. Thus in an indictment on a statute which enacts that if any person shall put off any milled money whatsoever unlawfully diminished, and not cut in pieces, for a lower rate than its nominal value, he shall be guilty of felony, it is necessary to state in the indictment that the money was not cut in pieces: Rex v. Palmer, 1 Leach, 102.

In the present case sections 12 and 16 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, must be read together, and the enacting clause in section 12, when read in connection with section 16, makes the wife liable to criminal proceedings by her husband, subject to the proviso contained in the latter portion of section 12. But the conditions imposed by that proviso do not affect the quality or character of the offence. They merely introduce matters which may be pleaded by way of defence, and we think they are not matters necessary to be negatived in the indictment. For these reasons we think the indictment good, and that the conviction should be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

CASH (LIMITED) v. JOSEPH CASH. (a.)

Trade name—Same name—Goods of same class—Misleading the public—Injunction—Form of order.

A person cannot be absolutely restrained from carrying on business in his own name, he can only be restrained from carrying on business in his own name without taking reasonable precautions to prevent his business or goods being confounded with those of another person.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. The facts were these:—

In the year 1895 the plaintiff company were incorporated for the purpose of purchasing the business and goodwill of the old-established firm of Messrs. J. & J. Cash, of Coventry, manufacturers of ribbons, frillings, and other textile goods.

The defendant, Joseph Cash, was one of the vendors and became one of the directors of the company. As part of their purchase the company bought also the exclusive right to use the names of "J. & J. Cash" and "Cash's frillings," and it was agreed that the vendors should be the first directors of the company and should not be allowed to resign for five years after the incorporation of the company except by consent, and that none of the directors should, whilst director, without the consent of the other directors, either solely or jointly with any other person or company, directly or indirectly, carry on or be concerned in the business of manufacturers of ribbons, frillings, tapes, or other textile goods, or permit his name to be used in connection therewith except as a member or director of the company.

By a deed of the 1st of December, 1898, the company released the defendant, Joseph Cash, from his engagement not to resign his directorship within the five years, and the defendant thereupon resigned his directorship.

In May, 1899, the defendant commenced to form a limited company called "J. & J. Cash (Limited)," for the purpose of carrying on at Coventry a similar business. The plaintiff company thereupon protested and the defendant gave an undertaking not to proceed with the company.

Subsequently the defendant commenced to carry on the same kind of business at Coventry by himself alone, but under the name of "Joseph Cash & Co," and to sell frillings, woven names and initials under the names of "Cash's frillings," &c.

The plaintiff company thereupon brought this action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from carrying on business under the name of "Joseph Cash & Co." or under any name in which was included the word "Cash" as part thereof, or under or in any other name or manner calculated or likely to deceive the public, and for other consequential relief.

Kekewich, J., held that the defendant was not entitled to sell frillings (the article principally in dispute) as "Cash's frillings," and accordingly granted an injunction restraining the defendant from selling frillings, woven names and initials under the name of "Joseph Cash & Co.," or under the name of Cash, or under any other name so as to deceive the public into the belief that they were the goods of the plaintiff company.

The defendant appealed.

Hugo Young, K.C., and O. Leigh Clare, for the defendant, while submitting to an injunction, contended that the injunction as granted went too far; and that he was entitled to sell frillings, &c, as part of his business and to use in connection with those articles a name which was his own name.

They referred to Reddaway v. Banham, 44 W. R. 638, [1896] A. C. 199; Turton v. Turton, 38 W. R. 22, 42 Ch. D. 128; Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896.

Warrington, K.C., and Sargant, for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendant was not entitled to use his name in such a way as to mislead the public into the belief that his goods were the goods of the plaintiff company.

After the argument had proceeded for some time it was agreed between the parties that the injunction granted by Kekewich, J., should be varied as follows: "That the defendant Joseph Cash be restrained from selling any frillings or woven names or initials, not manufactured by the plaintiffs, as Cash's frillings or Cash's woven names or initials, and from carrying on the business of a manufacturer or seller of frillings or woven names or initials under the name of the Joseph Cash & Co. while not in partnership with any other person, and from carrying on any such business either in the name of Cash or under any style in which the name Cash appears, without taking reasonable precautions to clearly distinguish the business carried on and the frillings and woven names and initials manufactured or sold by the defendant from the business carried on and the frillings and woven names and initials manufactured by the plaintiffs; and from carrying on any such business under any name or in any manner so as to mislead or deceive the public into the belief that the business of the defendant or the frillings or woven names or initials manufactured or sold by him are the business of or the goods manufactured by the plaintiffs, or that the defendant is carrying on the business formerly carried on at Coventry by Messrs. J. & J. Cash, the vendors to and predecessors in business of the plaintiffs."

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said: Now that the form of injunction has been agreed upon and the matter disposed of I wish to say a few words on the case. It may be that a trade is of such a nature that the products of that trade associated with a particular trade name have become almost indissolubly connected with the business carried on by the particular manufacturer who has created that particular business. But even though that may be so, and even though the nature of the trade has to be taken into consideration in an action for an injunction, there never has been a case yet where an order has been made restraining a man altogether from carrying on in his own name a particular trade. Every decision up to the present time has been limited to restraining him from carrying on a trade which has thus become so identified with the business of another person without taking the steps which any honest man would wish to take to prevent his goods from being confounded with the other person's goods which have become so identified with the name. In my judgment the order of Kekewich, J., went too far, and the order which we now make goes as far as it is possible to go.

STIRLING and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Master and servant — Employers' liability — Accident — Compensation — Contractor — Person employed by contractor in coal mine—Conditions of employment—Liability of mine owner—"Workman"—Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), s. 10—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 8.

A contractor agreed with a colliery owner to sink a shaft in a pit at a certain sum per yard. The contractor employed and paid the workmen engaged in the sinking operations. The workmen, before entering on the work, signed certain conditions prescribed by the colliery owner for the regulation of persons employed, directly or indirectly, at the colliery. One of the workmen employed by the contractor, while engaged in the work, was killed by an accident owing to the negligence of the colliery owner. In an action by the personal representative of the deceased against the colliery owner to recover damages under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880,

Held, that the signing of the conditions by the deceased did not make him a workman in the employment of the colliery owner within the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and that the action would not lie.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (49 W. R. 491, [1901] 1 K. B. 756) affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Channell, JJ.), reversing the judgment of the St. Helens County Court judge: reported 49 W. R. 491, [1901] 1 K. B. 756.

The action was brought by one Terence Fitzpatrick, under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and Lord Campbell's Act, to recover damages from the defendants, who were colliery proprietors, for the death of his son, who was killed while engaged in sinking a shaft at one of the defendants' pits.

The defendants had entered into a contract with one Morris, a "sinker," whereby the latter agreed to sink the shaft at so much per yard, and to provide all the labour and engine winders. The deceased was employed by Morris, who paid him 6s. a day as wages. He had, before entering on the work, signed a "record book" kept by the defendants at their colliery and containing the following conditions:

"Record book of persons employed on the conditions undermentioned:

"Conditions of employment at the collieries and works of Richard Evans & Co. (Limited) . . . for all persons employed at the collieries or works, directly or indirectly.

"The owners of the said colliery and works are hereinafter called the 'employer.' . . .

"(1) The persons directly employed at the colliery are engaged for an indefinite period, determinable upon fourteen days' notice. The employed undertake to work on each working day, Saturday included (if required), and the employer undertakes to employ them on such days, except in the event of accident, repairs, breakdown, or bad trade. The wages to be paid weekly.

"(2) This contract shall remain in force and operate as a contract between the workman and the owner for the time being of the colliery so long as the workman continues to be employed at the colliery, notwithstanding any change in the members for the time being constituting the employer's firm.

"(3) All usual and customary terms and regulations which obtain or exist with respect to the employment of workmen and all other persons employed at the colliery, whether expressed in writing or not, shall be and remain in full force and effect as part of the contract between the employer and the workman or other persons employed.

"For miners and contractors only:

"(4) Every miner and contractor employed at the colliery shall, upon engaging any drawer, workman, or other person to work under him, require such drawer, workman, or other person to obtain a copy of these conditions from the officer whose duty it is to provide such copies, and inform such drawer, workman, or other person that they are the conditions under which persons are employed at the colliery, and such miner, drawer, or workman, or other persons respectively shall be bound by such conditions.

"For drawers and persons working under contractors only:

"(5) Every drawer employed by any miner, and every workman or other person employed by a contractor at the colliery, shall, at the request of such miner or contractor, obtain a copy of these conditions from the officer whose duty it is to provide such copies, and such drawer, workman, or other person shall in consideration of being employed at the works be bound, both as between himself and the miner or contractor and between himself and the owner, by the terms of these conditions."

At the trial Morris said in his evidence that if the certificated manager of the mine had given him an order relating to the work he would have obeyed it, and would have expected his own workmen to do so. The deceased was killed by an explosion caused by an escape of gas. It was objected on behalf of the defendants that there was no evidence that the deceased was a "workman" in their employment within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The county court judge left the question to the jury, who found that the deceased was a workman in the employment of the defendants, and that the defendants were guilty of negligence causing his death, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff. The county court judge entered judgment for the plaintiff. The Divisional Court held that there was no evidence that the deceased was in the employment of the defendants, and entered judgment for them. The plaintiff appealed by leave, but died since the service of the notice of appeal, and by an order of the court the appeal proceeded in the name of the plaintiff's legal personal representative.

Montague Lush, for the appellant.—The test whether the relation of master and servant exists between two persons is whether the power of control over the workman is vested in the person alleged to be the master: Donovan v. Laing, Wharton, & Down Syndicate, 41 W. R. 455, [1893] 1 Q. B. 629. The questions who pays the wages, who hired the workman, and who can dismiss him, are mere elements in considering who has the real control. The jury here were entitled to say upon the conditions of employment issued by the defendants that the deceased was in the employment of the defendants as their servant. It is a question of fact in each case, and there was evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find as they did. The case comes within Brown v. Butterley Coal Co., 53 L. T. Rep. 964, 34 W. R. Dig. 118 In Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal and Fire Brick Co., [1898] 2 Q B. 588, 47 W. R. Dig. 125, the control over the workman was given by statute and not by contract, as in the present case. Rigby, L.J., left open the question of contractual control: see p. 605. Further, the evidence given by Morris as to his workmen and himself obeying the orders of the manager of the mine was evidence upon which the jury could find that the defendants exercised the real control over the workmen engaged by Morris, and that therefore the deceased was in their employment.

He also referred to Ruth v. Surrey Commercial Dock Co., 8 Times L. R. 116.

Ruegg, K.C., and S. H. Leonard, for the defendants, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M R.—In my opinion the decision of the Divisonal Court is right. We have to decide whether there is any evidence that the deceased was a workman in the employ of the defendants. It is clear that Morris, who employed the deceased, was an independent contractor. That in itself distinguishes this case from Brown v. Butterley Coal Co., where, as far as can be gathered from the report and as was pointed out in Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal and Fire Brick Co., the court seemed to have based their judgment upon the ground that the "butty" man was not an independent contractor, and that therefore the men engaged by him were not in his employment as distinguished from the employment of the colliery owners. The evidence in the present case makes it clear that Morris was an independent contractor who had undertaken to sink the shaft, and who had employed men for that work. Those men, no doubt, were to look for guidance in certain matters to the defendants. There were certain conditions prescribed by the defendants in force in the colliery. Those conditions created privity of contract between the men working in the mine and the defendants, but they were only in regard to certain specified matters, and did not convert the employment of the men by Morris into an employment by the defendants. The result is that the deceased was employed by an independent contractor, and at the same time he came under certain obligations to the defendants, which, however, did not make him their servant. The cases upon the question run somewhat fine, and it is often difficult to say that there is no evidence to go to the jury of the existence of the relation of master and servant. But one must look at the facts fairly, and it does not do to say that a mere scintilla of evidence is sufficient to allow the case to go to the jury. The fact that in this case there was for some purposes privity of contract between the deceased and the defendants is not of itself evidence to go to the jury that he was in the defendants' employment. There may be a number of important facts which, when taken together, would amount to evidence of the existence of the relation of master and servant, but it may not be equally true that one of those facts, taken by itself, would amount to such evidence. This case seems to me to be covered by the decision in Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal and Fire Brick Co. An attempt was made to distinguish that case upon the ground that the conditions there were imposed by statute. But where conditions for the regulation of those working in a mine are well known, and a workman comes and works in the mine under them, he is bound by them, and if he thereby enters into relations with the mine owner which involve some control by the mine owner over him while so working, the case is just the same as if he were working under conditions to which he expressed his assent by signing them. I can see no distinction between the two cases. Each case of this class must be decided upon its own facts. In the present case I can see no evidence which could properly have been left to the jury to show that the deceased was a workman in the employment of the defendants. I will only add that the evidence given by Morris that he would have obeyed an order relating to the work given to him by the manager of the mine, and that he would have expected his workmen to do so also, does not carry the case further, and does not amount to evidence that the deceased was in the employment of the defendants. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion for the reasons given by the Divisional Court and by the Master of the Rolls.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There was, no doubt, a contract between the deceased and the defendants by reason whereof the deceased came under an obligation to obey the defendants' directions in certain cases. That in itself, in the circumstances of this case, was no evidence that the deceased was in the employment of the defendants. It is a question of fact in each case, and in this case there was no evidence to go to the jury that the relation of master and servant existed between the defendants and the deceased. I cannot think that the piece of evidence given at the trial by Morris, and referred to by the Master of the Rolls, amounted to any evidence at all of that relation.

Appeal dismissed.

HUNT v. LUCK. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Possession of tenant—Notice of lessor's title—Reasonable inquiry—Conveyancing Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 39), s. 3.

Possession of land by a tenant affects a purchaser with knowledge only of the tenant's rights, and not with knowledge of the lessor's title.

An inquiry of the tenant to whom the rent is paid is not an inquiry which ought reasonably to be made by a purchaser, so that, by reason of his omission to make such inquiry, he is not affected either by virtue of section 3 of the Conveyancing Act. 1882, or of the law as it stood before the passing of that Act, with constructive notice of anything he might have learned if such inquiry had been made.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported 49 W. R. 155, [1901] 1 Ch. 45).

The plaintiff's husband, Dr. Hunt, was the owner of certain freehold property at Wimbledon, consisting of twenty-seven cottages, twenty-five of which were let to weekly tenants, and two to yearly ones. In the year 1896 he resided at Hastings, and was on terms of intimacy with one W. M. Gilbert. Dr. Hunt was an old man in feeble health, but the court found as a fact that he was not insane, and was capable of managing his affairs.

By a deed dated the 31st of March, 1896, and made between Hunt of the first part, and Gilbert of the second part, Hunt conveyed part of this cottage property to Gilbert by way of gift.

By another deed dated the 10th of October, 1896, and made between the same parties, in consideration of the sum of £12,000 (the receipt of which Hunt thereby acknowledged), Hunt conveyed the whole of this cottage property to Gilbert.

There was no evidence that the money was, as a matter of fact, paid, but Hunt continued to receive the rents of the property up to the time of his death, and his widow, the plaintiff, continued to receive them after his death.

The rents were paid by the tenants to Woodrow, a house agent at Wimbledon, who remitted them to the landlord. Gilbert subsequently mortgaged the property to the defendants, Sayer, Slater, & Hodgson, and on the mortgage, the title deeds, which had been deposited by Gilbert at his bankers to secure an overdraft, were handed over to the defendants.

While negotiating the mortgages the defendants Sayer, Slater, & Hodgson employed a valuer named Woodhams to value the property. When doing so, it was alleged that he inquired of the tenants to whom they paid their rents, and was told that it was to Woodrow; he, however, did not see Woodrow, nor inquire of him on whose behalf he collected the rents.

Hunt died on the 10th of June, 1898, and letters of administration with the will annexed were granted to the plaintiff.

Gilbert died on the 6th of September, 1898. By his will the defendant Luck was the executrix of his will and also his residuary legatee and devisee.

The plaintiff did not deny the genuineness of the two mortgages, but claimed that Dr. Hunt's signatures to the two deeds of the 31st of March and the 10th of October, 1896, were forgeries, or that Dr. Hunt, if he signed the deeds, did not understand what he was doing.

By section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882: "(1) A purchaser shall not be prejudicially affected by notice of any instrument, fact, or thing unless—(i.) it is within his own knowledge, or would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him; or (ii.) in the same transaction with respect to which a question of notice to the purchaser arises, it has come to the knowledge of his counsel, as such, or of his solicitor, or other agent, as such, or would have come to the knowledge of his solicitor, or other agent, as such, if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent."

Farwell, J., held that, even if the alleged fraud had been committed, the mortgagees were not affected with either actual or constructive notice of Dr. Hunt's title, and being purchasers for value without notice, their title must prevail, and the action must be dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed.

W. F. Webster (Upjohn, K.C., with him), for the appellant.—A purchaser is affected with notice if he neglects to make reasonable searches and inquiries which he ought to make in his own interest. An inquiry to whom the tenants pay their rents is a reasonable inquiry, and the omission to make it affects the purchaser with notice of all he would have learned if it had been made. It must be assumed that the inquiry would have been truly answered, and the mortgagees would therefore in the present instance have learned that the rents were paid to Woodrow who received them as agent for Hunt. [STIRLING, L.J.—No such inquiry is recommended either in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers or in Lord St. Leonards' book on Vendors and Purchasers.] Preston on Abstracts, vol. 3, p. 400, advises an inquiry to whom tenants pay rent.

In the course of the argument the following cases were cited: Ogilvie v. Jeaffreson, 8 W. R. 745, 2 Giff. 353; Mumford v. Stohwasser, 22 W. R. 833, L. R. 18 Eq. 556; Barnhart v. Greenshields, 9 Moo. P. C. 18; Bailey v. Barnes, 42 W. R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25; In re Alms Corn Charity, [1901] 2 Ch. 750.

Hughes, K.C., Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and Church, for the respondent, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion the judgment of Farwell, J., was quite right. Farwell, J., dealt with the case without reference to the provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, as far as I can see. But he does make a statement of the law as established by decisions prior to the Conveyancing Act.

I wish to say, speaking for myself, that if one is to determine the question here to-day with reference to old law, then I think that the conclusion of Farwell, J., was quite right. Farwell, J., after quoting the older authorities, says: "The right established by these two cases may be stated thus: (1) A tenant's occupation is notice of all that tenant's rights, but not of his lessor's title or rights; (2) actual knowledge that the rents are paid by the tenants to some person whose receipt is inconsistent with the title of the vendor is notice of that person's rights." Here I do not understand that anyone suggests, and, if it is suggested, in my opinion the suggestion is ill founded, that there was actual knowledge that the rents were paid by the tenants to some person whose receipt is inconsistent with the title of the mortgagor Gilbert. That is not suggested, in fact, and therefore we have to go back to the first of these rules. Now that rule means this, that if there is a purchaser or a mortgagee, and he has notice that the vendor or mortgagor is not in possession he must make inquiries of the person in possession—of the tenant in possession, and find out from him what his, the tenant's, rights are, and that if he does not choose to do so, then whatever title he gets as purchaser or mortgagee that title will be subject to the title of the tenant in possession.

Now that I believe to be a true statement of the law, and the only matter that I need allude to further is the case to which the attention of Farwell, J., was called after he had delivered his judgment in court, by the reporter, and that is the case of Mumford v. Stohwasser. Farwell, J., gave an explanation which comes to this, that in his judgment the passage in Mumford v. Stohwasser which seems to favour the idea that notice of the tenancy is notice of the title of the lessor was, if Sir G. Jessel said so, a slip of memory on his part. Sir G. Jessel did not profess to be laying down any law, he professed to be reciting the old-established and unquestioned law, and it is impossible to affirm that the proposition in this passage is right unless we are prepared to disregard the authorities, including the authority of the Privy Council, which show that notice of the tenancy has no operation whatever as affecting the question of notice of the title of the lessor of the tenant in possession. Of course, if you do make inquiries and get information, then you are affected by notice but not otherwise.

Now I propose just to say a word or two as to the Conveyancing Act, 1882. One has to look first at the definition clause. There you have in the definition clause, section 1, sub-section (ii.), "purchaser includes a lessee or mortgagee, or an intending purchaser, lessee, or mortgagee, or other person who for valuable consideration takes or deals for property." Now, the reason why it is necessary to quote that definition is because it is suggested that a purchaser for valuable consideration could only set up that he was without notice in the case where his vendor was in possession. The definition shows that under the Conveyancing Act that is not so, and I have my doubts whether it was ever so, although a decision of Lord Eldon's was cited which was said to favour that view.

Now, passing from that, section 3 deals with the question of notice. [His lordship read the section down to the end of clause (i.), and continued:] In my judgment the only inquiry which ought reasonably to have been made here by the intending mortgagee was an inquiry to protect himself against any right which the tenant would have in the subject-matter of the mortgage. I do not think that there is, for the purpose of ascertaining the title of the vendor, any obligation whatever to make these inquiries of the tenant for any other purpose but protection against the rights of the tenant. I only wish to add beyond that, that in my judgment on the facts of this case I do not think that, if this inquiry had been made, these matters as to the equitable title of Dr. Hunt and Mrs. Hunt would have come to the knowledge of the intending mortgagee. All that he would have learned, if he had made inquiries of the tenant, would have been that the tenant paid the rent to Mr. Woodrow, a local agent. In my judgment it is not right to say that the facts as to the equitable title of Dr. Hunt and Mrs. Hunt would have come to his knowledge by making those inquiries.

I have now looked sufficiently into the facts to see how far this matter really was carried out by the mortgagees personally or by their solicitors. In so far as it was carried out by their solicitors, the second clause of sub-section 1 of section 3 applies. [His lordship read the clause, and continued:] Here again nobody suggests that there was actual notice, and the observations I have already made apply with reference to what inquiries ought reasonably to have been made, with this addition, that really when one comes to deal with the question of what inquiries ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent it does seem to me that it would be a very strong thing to say that an inquiry ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent which is not advised in any of the standard text-books, and which is inconsistent with the decisions prior to the Conveyancing Act, and has no countenance from any decision subsequent to the Conveyancing Act.

I only wish to call attention further to sub-section 3 of section 3: "A purchaser shall not by reason of anything in this section be affected by notice in any case where he would not have been so affected if this section had not been enacted." I only call attention to that for the purpose of vouching what has been said in the course of the argument, that so far as this section 3 is concerned the practical result is that the law prior to the Conveyancing Act can only be used as a shield, and not as anything extending the law beyond the code-like definition in section 3.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have really nothing to add to the reasons which have been given by Farwell, J., and by my brother.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree. I cannot bring myself to hold that an inquiry ought reasonably to have been made, which is not usual, which has not, so far as we are aware, ever been recommended by any single text-book writer, and which has not even been suggested by any judge, except in that one passage of Sir George Jessel in Mumford v. Stohwasser. I think the decision is perfectly right and that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

YATES v. TERRY. (a.)

Practice—Assignment of debt—Garnishee summons—Second garnishee summons—Intervening right of assignee.

The defendant, being indebted to H. in the sum of £50 1s. 6d., was served with a garnishee summons attaching all debts due from him to H. to answer a judgment obtained against H. in the county court for £37 18s. 4d. H. then assigned to the plaintiff the sum of £16 17s. 8d. due to him from the defendant, and the plaintiff gave due notice of the assignment to the defendant. Subsequently the defendant was served with another garnishee summons in respect of a judgment obtained against H. in the same county court by another creditor for £21 4s. 7d. Thereupon the defendant paid into court the whole sum of £50 1s. 6d., appropriating the sum of £37 18s 4d. to the first judgment creditor, and the balance of £12 3s. 2d. to the second judgment creditor.

Held, that the defendant, after satisfying the first attachment, held the balance for the plaintiff, and had no right to appropriate the balance to the second attachment.

Judgment of Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ. (49 W. R. 112, [1901] 1 K. B. 102), reversed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) on an appeal from the Liverpool County Court: 49 W. R. 112, [1901] 1 K. B. 102.

The defendant Terry was the receiver and manager of a company in liquidation.

On the 20th of February, 1900, an order was made upon him by the Palatine Court of Liverpool to pay to one Henderson the sum of £50 1s. 6d.

On the next day a garnishee summons was served upon him in an action in the Liverpool County Court brought by one Jones against Henderson, in which Jones had recovered judgment for £37 18s. 4d. The garnishee summons was in the ordinary county court form. It called upon Terry to "show cause why an order should not be made upon you for the payment of the amount of the said judgment, or so much thereof as shall equal the amount of the debts due and accruing from you to the said William Henderson. And take notice that, from and after the service of the summons upon you, all such debts are attached to answer the said judgment, and that if you pay the said debts to the said William Henderson or otherwise dispose of them you will be liable to be committed for contempt."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 27th of February, 1900, Henderson assigned to the plaintiff Yates the sum of £16 17s. 8d., due to him from the defendant, and on the next day Yates gave the defendant due and proper notice of this assignment.

The defendant, considering himself bound by the garnishee summons, did not pay any money to the plaintiff.

On the 15th of March another garnishee summons was served upon the defendant in respect of a sum of £21 4s. 7d. by one Bielby, who had recovered judgment against Henderson in the same county court for that amount. Thereupon the defendant paid into court the sum of £50 1s. 6d., which he had in his hands, appropriating the sum of £37 18s. 4d. to the first garnishee, and the balance—viz., £12 3s. 2d. to the second garnishee. The two garnishees received out of court the sums appropriated to them respectively.

The plaintiff then brought this action on the assignment to recover the said balance of £12 3s. 2d.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The Divisional Court reversed the judgment of the county court judge and gave judgment for the defendant, on the ground that the first garnishee summons attached the whole of the moneys in the hands of the defendant due to the judgment debtor, and that the assignment by the debtor was invalid.

The plaintiff appealed.

Whitty, for the plaintiff.

Cuthbert Smith, for the defendant.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case judgment was entered for the plaintiff in the county court, but this was reversed by the Divisional Court, who gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff was the assignee of a debt which was due from the defendant to one Henderson. Prior to the assignment a garnishee summons had been served on the defendant attaching in his hands all debts due from him to Henderson to answer a judgment which had been obtained in the county court by one Jones against Henderson. After the service of that garnishee summons, and before the service of a second garnishee summons, the assignment which I have mentioned took place, and due notice of it was given by the plaintiff to the defendant. Then came the service of the second garnishee summons, which had been obtained by another judgment creditor. Thereupon the defendant paid into court the whole amount of the debt in his hands due to Henderson, and he appropriated a portion of that amount to satisfy the debt of the first garnishee creditor, and the remainder to satisfy the debt of the second garnishee creditor. It is clear that that was an appropriation which altogether ignored the intervening rights of the assignee. The county court judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to sue the defendant on his assignment, and to recover to the extent of the balance after the first judgment creditor had been satisfied. I think that decision is right.

It is argued on the part of the defendant that the first garnishee summons attached in his hands all moneys owing from him to Henderson, and that, while that attachment subsisted, it would have been wrong for him to appropriate any part of the fund in his hands except to satisfy that attachment, and that therefore the defendant was protected from an action by the plaintiff. That argument might have been tenable if the facts had been otherwise. But the defendant in fact dealt with the whole of the fund which was in his hands, appropriating part to answer the first attachment and the rest to answer the second attachment. In my opinion the defendant, after satisfying the first attachment, held the balance for the assignee, and he had no business to appropriate the balance as he did. He therefore remains under liability to the plaintiff. I think that the judgment of the Divisional Court should be set aside, and the judgment of the county court judge restored.

BARTHOLEMEW v. MENZIES. (a.)

Donatio mortis causâ—Subject-matter—Post Office Savings Bank deposit book.

A Post Office Savings Bank deposit book is capable of being given so as to create a donatio mortis causâ.

Originating summons.

This case involved the decision as to whether a Post Office Savings Bank deposit book could be given by way of donatio mortis causâ.

In February, 1901, Thomas Weston, who had been a butler in domestic service, was ill in a London hospital. He was at the time possessed of certain shares in a building society, and also of about £130 placed on deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank. He gave the key of a drawer in his bedroom to the defendant, Miss Menzies, to whom he had for many years been engaged, and asked her to get the certificates of the shares and his Post Office Savings Bank deposit book, and told her to keep them. She accordingly got the certificates and the bank book. Weston subsequently repeated his wish to the defendant that she should keep them. He died on the 1st of May, 1901, intestate, and letters of administration to his estate were granted to the plaintiff.

Miss Menzies claimed the shares and the money at the bank, and this summons was taken out for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court upon her claim.

His lordship held upon the evidence that there was a gift of the certificates and the book if they could be validly given by way of donatio mortis causâ.

J. A. Hay, for the plaintiff.

Lyttelton Chubb, for the defendant, submitted that there was a valid gift of both the shares and the deposited money.

J. H. Jackson, for the next-of-kin, referred to Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. sen. 431, and Moore v. Moore, 22 W. R. 729, L. R. 18 Eq. 474, as showing that the share certificates were not a valid gift.

The cases referred to in argument upon the question of the gift of the bank book appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

BYRNE, J., held that the share certificates could not be the subject of a donatio mortis causâ.

As regards the savings bank book his lordship gave judgment as follows: Since In re Dillon, 38 W. R. 369, 44 Ch. D. 76, it is well established that a banker's deposit receipt in a form showing the terms of the contract and being more than an acknowledgment for the receipt of money, is a good subject for a donatio mortis causâ. The question had not previously come before a Court of Appeal in England, although there had been, as stated by Cotton, L.J., in the last-mentioned case, a current of decisions in courts of first instance in England in favour of that view, and a decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, Cassidy v. Belfast Banking Co., 22 L. R. Ir. 68, 36 W. R. Dig. 88, to a similar effect. In the present case the question arises in reference to a Post Office Savings Bank deposit book, and, in considering whether or not this is a good subject of a donatio mortis causâ, the test appears to be whether or not the document, besides acknowledging the receipt of the money, expresses the terms on which it is held and shows what the contract between the parties is: see Moore v. Darton, 4 De G. & Sm. 517, and the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in In re Dillon. An examination of the savings bank book in the present case appears to me to show a fulfilment of the test; and, although every rule regulating the contract is not set out in the book itself, all the essential rules are. The book is not a mere receipt. It must, as stated on the face of it, be produced whenever any money is deposited or withdrawn, and it contains the terms of the contract as to payment of interest and withdrawal, as well as the other material terms of the contract between the depositor and the Savings Bank Department. Apart from authority pointing the other way, I should have considered it impossible after comparing the terms of the deposit receipts in the cases of In re Dillon and Moore v. Darton with the savings bank book to hold that the latter is not a good subject for donatio mortis causâ. The case in Ireland of M'Gonnell v. Murray, 3 Ir. R. Eq. 460 (which appears to be the only reported case dealing with a savings bank book), was relied upon as an authority to the contrary, and since the argument I have referred also to the case of Duckworth v. Lee, [1899] 1 Ir. R. 405, in the Court of Appeal in Ireland. The latter case dealt with the gift of an I.O.U., and had no reference to a savings bank book, and, consequently, the actual decision in M'Gonnell v. Murray did not come in question; but the general reasoning in M'Gonnell v. Murray, including an expression of disagreement with a dictum of Lord Romilly's in Hewitt v. Kaye, 16 W. R. 835, L. R. 6 Eq. 198, appears to have been treated with approval by some of the judges, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland expressly states that he sees nothing in the case of In re Dillon to shake the authority of M'Gonnell v. Murray. It is necessary, therefore, to consider carefully what the decision in M'Gonnell v. Murray actually was. It was not necessary to decide the point in the view the Master of the Rolls took of the facts; but it was, in fact, decided that the savings bank book in question in that case was not capable of being given mortis causâ so as to confer a right upon the donee to the amount of the deposit. The point there arose, not as to the book of a depositor under the Post Office Saving Bank Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 14), but as to the book of a depositor in a private savings bank governed by the provisions of the Savings Bank Act of 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 87), Acts which differ considerably in their terms. The only rules of the savings bank apparently relied on in M'Gonnell v. Murray are those set out at p. 463 of the report, and I do not find that it was part of the contract, as it was in the present case, that the book must be produced whenever any money is deposited or withdrawn, nor does it appear that there was any stipulation corresponding with that in the Post Office Savings Bank book to the effect that every deposit must be immediately entered by the postmaster or other person receiving it in the depositor's book, and that the postmaster or other person receiving the deposit must affix his signature and the stamp of his office to each entry. In M'Gonnell v, Murray the Master of the Rolls says that he does not find in the Savings Bank Act (meaning, according to the reference in the report, the Act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 87) anything to distinguish a savings bank pass-book from an ordinary banker's pass-book; and he also takes the view that the book did not embody the terms of the contract between the depositor and the bank, and, further, that it was merely evidence of, or a voucher for, a debt. It appears to me that the book in M'Gonnell v. Murray was, in the view taken of it by the court, of a different nature from that with which I have to deal. I am quite unable to say that the Post Office Savings Bank book is not distinguishable from an ordinary banker's pass-book, and I think it is clearly more than evidence of, or a voucher for, the debt. I do not see how I can consistently with the cases of Moore v. Darton and In re Dillon, do otherwise than hold the book to be capable of being well given, so as to create a donatia mortis causâ.

BOND v. BARROW HÆMATITE STEEL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Articles of association — Construction— Preference shares—"Net profits"—Reserve fund— Discretion of directors — "Interest" — Depreciation fund.

In an action by preference shareholders in a company claiming that they were entitled by contract to be paid a preferential dividend out of the balance to the credit of the profit and loss account in each year before the appropriation of any part of such balance to a reserve fund or any carrying over,

Held, that such a question, as well as that of a depreciation fund, is to be answered according to the circumstances of each particular case, the nature of the company and the evidence of competent witnesses.

In the present case, special resolutions creating the preference shares were to be read as subject to the provisions of the original articles of association, and a provision for the payment of "net profits" towards arrears of dividend due on such preference shares was not sufficient to rescind the articles relating to declaration of dividends and formation of reserve fund.

Per Farwell, J.: "Interest is compensation for delay in payment, and is not accurately applied to the share of profits of trading, although it may be used as an inaccurate mode of expressing the measure of the share of such profits."

"There is no hard and fast rule by which the court can determine what is capital and what is profit."

The court is unlikely to compel directors of a company to pay dividends when they have expressed their opinion that the state of the accounts does not admit of any such payment.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Witness action, to determine the rights of preference shareholders.

The defendant company was incorporated in 1864 with a capital of £150,000, divided into 1,500 shares of £100 each.

The objects for which the company was formed (as altered by special resolution confirmed by an order of the court, dated the 19th of June, 1897) were (inter alia) the purchasing, leasing, or otherwise acquiring of coal mines or any other mines, mining ground, or minerals, and the searching for and getting and smelting and making merchantable, and selling and disposing of coal, ironstone, and all ores, metals, and metallic minerals whatsoever.

The capital of the company had been altered from time to time and now stood at £1,528,275, divided into 150,000 ordinary shares of £7 10s. each, 377 eight per cent. preference shares of £75 each, and 50,000 six per cent. preference shares of £7 10s. each, all of which had been issued, and the preference shares were fully paid.

The company had issued five per cent. debenture stock, of which there was £538,530 outstanding on the 31st of December, 1900. The 377 eight per cent. preference shares of £75 each were created by special resolutions passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the company, held respectively on the 7th of November and the 3rd of December, 1872, by the terms of which such shares were to bear interest at 8 per cent. per annum in perpetuity, and the holders were to be entitled to attend the general meetings of the company, but not in virtue of such shares to vote or interfere in any way in the company's proceedings.

The 50,000 six per cent. preference shares of £7 10s. each were created by special resolutions passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the company, held respectively on the 30th of March, and the 15th of April, 1876, by the terms of which the holders of such shares were to be entitled to a fixed dividend of 6 per cent. per annum on the amount paid thereon after the payment of the interest payable on the mortgage and bond or debenture debts of the company, and after payment of a dividend of 8 per cent. per annum on the 377 eight per cent. preference shares, "and in case in any year the net profits of the company are not sufficient for the payment in full of the dividends on the 50,000 preference shares, the net profits of any subsequent year are (after payment of the interest and dividends above mentioned) to be applied in payment to the holders of the 50,000 preference shares of the arrears of dividend, and the holders of such shares are entitled to attend the general meetings of the company, but not to vote or interfere in any way in the company's proceedings."

The following articles of association of the company were material to the questions which had arisen as to the rights of the preference shareholders, viz.:

43. "Any capital raised by the creation of new shares shall be considered as part of the original capital, and shall be subject to the same provisions with reference to the payment of calls, the forfeiture of shares on non-payment of calls, or otherwise, as if it had been part of the original capital, except that it shall be lawful for the company in general meeting, by special resolution . . . to direct that the new shares shall have such priority in respect of dividends as it shall deem expedient."

95 empowered the directors to declare a dividend with the consent of the company in general meeting.

96. "No dividend shall be payable exept out of the profits arising from the business of the company."

97. "The directors may, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they think proper as a reserved fund to meet contingencies, or for equalizing dividends, or for repairing or maintaining the buildings and premises connected with the business of the company."

106 (10). "The directors have power to set aside out of the profits of the company before recommending any dividend such sums as they think proper as a reserve fund to meet contingencies or for equalizing dividends or for repairing, renewing, improving, and maintaining any of the property of the company, and for other purposes as the directors shall in their discretion think conducive to the interests of the company, and to invest the several sums so set aside upon such investments as they may think fit, and from time to time deal with and vary such investments and dispose of all or any part thereof for the benefit of the company, and to divide that reserve fund into such special funds as they may think fit, and to employ the reserve fund or any part thereof in the business of the company, and that without being bound to keep the same separate from the other assets."

112. "Subject to the earlier provisions, the profits of the company shall be divisible among the members holding ordinary shares in proportion to the number of ordinary shares held by them respectively."

113. "The directors may, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare a dividend to be paid to the members according to their rights and interest in the profits."

114. "No larger dividend shall be declared than is recommended by the directors, but the company in general meeting may declare a smaller dividend."

115. "No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits of the company."

116. "The declaration of the directors as to the amount of the profits of the company shall be conclusive."

The plaintiffs were holders of 25 of the eight per cent. preference shares and of 640 of the six per cent. preference shares. They claimed a declaration that by the terms upon which the preference shares were subscribed and issued and under the provisions of the articles of association the amount standing to the credit of the profit and loss account of the company as on the 31st of December, 1900, ought to be applied in payment to the holders of the eight per cent. preference shares of interest thereon as from the 31st of December, 1898, and subject thereto, in payment to the holders of the six per cent. preference shares of an accumulative dividend thereon as from the 31st of of December, 1896, and that the company might be ordered to apply the said profits, or a competent part thereof, in occordance with such declaration.

The facts as to the profits and losses of the company and the action of the directors will be found in the judgment below.

No evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs, but Sir David Dale, a director, and accountants and engineers were called on behalf of the company.

C. E. E. Jenkins, K.C., and A. R. Kirby, for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to the dividends on the eight per cent. preference shares for the years 1898 and 1899, and for those on the six per cent. preference shares for 1897, 1898, 1899, and 1900. J. G. Butcher, K.C., and F. Cassel, for the company.—On the true construction of the articles of association the directors have a discretion to set aside a reserve or to carry forward some credit, and there is nothing illegal in such a contract. Assuming its legality, "net profits," if indeed the words are so clear as to force their meaning on the court, means "net divisible profits," as in Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co. The contention of the plaintiffs involves that the company deprives itself of a most important power of management which is usually found in companies, for where a profit has been earned it may be vital to the company's future existence and power of competing that it should be employed in adopting some new improvement. Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J.—The defendant company was incorporated in the year 1864 with a capital of £150,000, which has since been first increased and subsequently reduced and now stands at £1,528,275, divided into 150,000 ordinary shares of £7 10s. each, 377 eight per cent. preference shares of £75 each, and 50,000 preference shares of £7 10s. each. The plaintiffs are holders of some of each of these classes of preference shares, and they claim on behalf of themselves, and all other holders of preference shares, to be paid the dividends and arrears of dividends on their shares out of the profits which they allege that the company has made in the years 1898, 1899, and 1900. No dividend has been paid on the 8 per cent. preference shares since 1898, or on the 6 per cent. preference shares since 1896. The preference shareholders have no vote in respect of these shares. The profit and loss account for 1898 shows a balance described as "net profits for the year 1898" of £65,803 7s. 3d., and of this £20,000 was carried to reserve account, making it £40,000, and £10,418 10s. was carried forward. The profit and loss account for the year 1899 shows a balance described as "net profit for the year 1899" of £89,018 17s. 6d., and this was carried forward pending the decision of the court on an application for the reduction of the capital of the company to which I will refer presently. The profit and loss account for the year 1900 shows a balance of £157, 605 12s. 11d. which is provisionally brought forward. The report for the year 1898 contains the following statement: "The shareholders are aware, both from the balance sheets themselves and the auditors' certificates which have accompanied them, that for some years past no depreciation has been written off the amounts at debit of land, buildings, works, fixed plant, and mining leases. The directors have carefully considered the matter, and, having regard to the fact that many of these assets are more or less of a wasting character, they are of opinion that the time has arrived when a careful revision of their value should be made. It is, however, a subject which in all its bearings requires most mature consideration, and the deliberations of the directors are not sufficiently advanced at the present time for them to submit any recommendation to the shareholders." Accordingly, in the year 1899 special resolutions were passed for the reduction of the capital of the company. The petition for the confirmation of these resolutions came before the court in August, 1900, and was opposed by some of the preference shareholders, and the petition was dismissed by Cozens-Hardy, J., and his order was confirmed by the Court of Appeal: In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co. (Limited), [1900] 2 Ch. 846, 49 W. R. Dig. 24; on appeal, ante, p. 71, [1901] 2 Ch. 746. Some, but not all, of the present plaintiffs appeared and opposed this petition and the petition was dismissed on the ground that the alleged loss had not been proved to the satisfaction of the court, and also by Cozens-Hardy, J., on the ground that the amount standing to the credit of the reserve fund and the £89,018 17s. 6d. profit for the year 1899 were applicable to make good loss of capital so far as they would extend. The plaintiffs in the present action are now claiming that these sums and the balance to the credit of profit and loss account in 1900 are not so applicable, but belong to them by contract, and it is argued on behalf of the defendants that Cozens-Hardy, J.'s, order creates an estoppel, and this may possibly be correct so far as regards any of the plaintiffs who appeared and opposed the petition. But this is not pleaded, and as there are other plaintiffs who did not appear on the petition, and who could sue on behalf of themselves and all other preference shareholders who did not oppose the petition, I do not think it necessary to express any conclusive opinion on this point. Nor can I regard Cozens-Hardy, J.'s, decision as a precedent disposing of this case, for the points argued before me were not before him, and that by no fault of the plaintiffs, because the contentions that they now raise could not have been put forward by them in support of their opposition to the petition, but were adverse to such opposition, and should, if urged at all, have been urged by the company.

The contention of the plaintiffs in this action is that they are entitled by contract to be paid a preferential dividend out of the balance to the credit of the profit and loss account in each year, and that the company cannot appropriate any part of such balance to reserve or carry over one shilling until they have been paid in full. There is no suggestion of want of bona fides on the part of the directors or of the company. The defendants contend that this is not the true construction of the special resolutions creating the preference shares, and that, if it is, the balance to the credit of profit and loss for any year is not necessarily such profits of the company as are properly applicable to dividend, but that if the court is satisfied by the evidence that there have been ascertained losses and depreciations of capital assets exceeding the amount of the balances, these losses must be made good before any dividend can be paid. The first point depends on the construction of the original articles and the special resolutions creating the preference shares, for it is not contended that if the preference shareholders have such contractual rights as they claim, the company can by subsequent special resolutions deprive them of such rights or of any part thereof. Article 43 provides as follows: "Any capital raised by the creation of new shares shall be considered as part of the original capital and shall be subject to the same provisions with reference to the payment of calls, the forfeiture of shares on non-payment of calls or otherwise, as if it had been part of the original capital, except that it shall be lawful for the company in general meeting, by special resolution as aforesaid, to direct that the new shares shall have such priority in respect of dividends as it shall deem expedient." This article, in my opinion, provides that all new shares shall be subject in all respects to all the provisions of the articles, except only that dividends payable on new shares may rank in priority to, instead of pari passu with, ordinary shares. For this purpose it is necessary only to introduce modifying words in article 95, and then the whole fasciculus of clauses relating to dividends (95 to 101) apply. It is argued that the provisions as to the declaration of a dividend do not apply to shares on which a fixed preferential dividend is payable. In my opinion this is not so. The necessity for the declaration of a dividend as a condition precedent to an action to recover is stated in general terms in Lindley on Companies (5th ed., p. 437), and, where the reserve fund article applies, it is obvious that such a declaration is essential, for the shareholder has no right to any payment until the corporate body has determined that the money can properly be paid away. It is urged that this puts the preference shareholders at the mercy of the company, but the preference shareholders came in on these terms and this argument does not carry much weight in an action such as this where bona fides is conceded. The opposite conclusion might enable the preference shareholders to ruin the company, and would certainly lead to great inconvenience in enabling them to compel the payment out of the last penny without carrying forward any balance. Granted that it is a hardship to go without dividends for a time, this hardship presses more heavily on the ordinary shareholders who have to wait until the preference shareholders have received all arrears before they can get anything. It was urged that article 97 providing for the reserve fund cannot apply to preference shares, because one of its objects is to equalize dividends, but I cannot see that the mention of one object which is not applicable is any reason for excluding those objects which are applicable, and which are really for the benefit of all the shareholders. On the articles as they stand, I have no doubt that the true construction is that which I have stated.

But it is contended that the special resolutions have created larger rights, and it was, in my opinion, competent to the company by such resolution to alter article 43. Now the 8 per cent. preference shares are created by resolutions of 1872 in these terms: "(1) This company will agree to purchase from the Barrow Rolling Mills Co. (Limited) the two furnaces erected by that company, and the land purchased by them, and any other property of which the Rolling Mills Co. may be possessed. (2) The consideration for the purchase shall be the sum of £37,700 in preference shares of this company, bearing interest at 8 per cent. per annum from the 1st of January last, such preference shares to be issued to the present shareholders in the Rolling Mills Co. in proportion to their holdings. (3) The directors are authorized to issue preference shares to the amount of £37,700, bearing interest of 8 per cent. per annum in perpetuity, for the purpose of carrying out the about arrangement. (4) The holders of the above-mentioned preference shares shall be entitled to attend the general meetings of this company, but they shall not be entitled in virtue of such shares to vote, or to interfere in any way in the company's proceedings, nor shall they, in virtue of such shares, be eligible as directors of the company." In my opinion there is nothing whatever in this to alter any of the articles as I have construed them. Stress has been laid on the word "interest"; but in my opinion that word has slipped in per incuriam, and should be read as "dividend," as indeed is done when this resolution is referred to in the special resolution of 1876, to which I shall have to refer presently. Interest is not an apt word to express the return to which a shareholder is entitled in respect of shares paid up in due course and not by way of advance. Interest is compensation for delay in payment and is not accurately applied to the share of profits of trading, although it may be used as an inaccurate mode of expressing the measure of the share of such profits. It is impossible, in my opinion, to give to the word used as it is in this case so pregnant a meaning as the plaintiffs derive, reading it as equivalent to an alteration of the articles and as creating a right overriding the valuable and possibly essential article providing for reserve funds.

The 6 per cent. preference shares present more difficulty. They were created by resolutions of 1876 as follows: "(1) The capital of the company shall be and is hereby increased by the addition thereto of 50,000 preference shares of £10 each, entitling the holder to a fixed dividend at the rate of £6 per centum per annum on the amount for the time being paid up in respect of such shares. (3) The holders of the said new preference shares shall be entitled to a dividend thereon only after payment of the interest from time to time payable in respect of the mortgage and bond or debenture debts of the company, and after payment of a dividend at the rate of £8 per centum per annum on the preference shares of the company, amounting to £37,700, created by special resolutions passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the company in the year 1872; and in case in any year the net profits of the company shall not be sufficient for the payment in full of the dividends on such new preference shares, the net profits of any subsequent year shall (after payment thereout of interest on the mortgage bond or debenture debts of the company, and of dividends of the said £8 per cent. preference shares) be applied in payment to the holders of the said new preference shares of the amount by which the dividends of any previous year or years may have fallen short of the fixed rate of £6 per cent." The third resolution is not very happily worded, but I have come to the conclusion that this and the first resolution read together are merely a verbose statement of a bargain that the holders of the 6 per cent. shares are to have a fixed 6 per cent. cumulative preferential dividend, subject to the rights of the debenture-holders and the 8 per cent. preference shareholders. I think that the words "only after payment, &c.," in No. (3) are restrictive words, equivalent to "subject to," and do not create new rights by rescinding the articles relating to declaration of dividends, creation of reserve fund, and the like. The only difficulty that I have felt has been created by the latter part of No. (3), beginning "the net profits of any such year." I feel the difficulty of limiting the generality of the term "net profits," but, on the other hand, it is only the arrears to which this provision applies, and it would be strange that the preference shareholders should have to allow a reserve fund to be formed so far as their current year's dividend was concerned, but should be entitled to sweep up everything in respect of past arrears. I have come to the conclusion that the use of the words "net profits" is not sufficient to rescind the articles to which I have referred, but that the resolution must be read as subject to the provisions of those articles. For the reasons that I have stated the plaintiffs' case fails.

But another point has been taken by the defendants, and, as evidence has been adduced and considerable argument has been addressed to it, I feel bound to state the conclusion at which I have arrived with respect to it. The construction is that, even if the plaintiffs were right in their construction of the articles, the company could not legally pay them the dividends that they claim because there are no profits properly so called out of which they can be paid, and that any such payment, if made, would be made out of the capital. It has been proved to my satisfaction (and indeed Mr. Jenkins very properly admitted that he could not dispute that the result of the evidence was) that the company has sustained an actual ascertained and realized loss of capital to an amount exceeding £200,000, and has also lost capital by estimate and valuation to an amount exceeding £50,000. The various sums claimed by the plaintiffs as available to pay their dividends amount to about £240,000. If, therefore, these ascertained and estimated losses have to be made good before any dividend can properly be paid, there are obviously no funds out of which to pay dividends. The defendants allege and the plaintiffs deny that the company are bound to make good these losses before paying any dividend. The question is one of very considerable difficulty on the authorities, but the result of these authorities is, in my opinion, that there is no hard and fast rule by which the court can determine what is capital and what is profit. "The mode and manner in which a business is carried on and what is usual or the reverse may have a considerable influence in determining the question what may be treated as profits and what as capital": per the Lord Chancellor in Dovey v. Cory, [1901] A. C. at p. 486. "It may be safely said that what losses can be properly charged to capital and what to income is a matter for business men to determine, and it is often a matter on which the opinion of honest and competent men will differ. There is no hard and fast legal rule on the subject": per Lindley, L.J., in In re National Bank of Wales, [1899] 2 Ch. at p. 670. It is, however, necessary to bear in mind that the two propositions—(1) that dividends must not be paid out of capital, and (2) that dividends may only be paid out of profits—are not identical, but diverse. The first is the requirement of the statutes, and cannot be dispensed with; the latter is in Table A in the articles of the particular company, and is one of the regulations of the company which has to be construed. A company which has a balance to the credit of its profit and loss account is not bound at once to apply that sum in making good an estimated deficiency in value of its capital assets. It may carry it to a suspense account or to reserve, and if the assets subsequently increase in value the amount neither has been nor will be part of the capital. If, therefore, a part of such balance is used in paying dividends, such dividend is not paid out of capital, because the sum has never become capital, although it still remains a question whether it has been paid out of profits or not. It has been pointed out by Lindley, L.J., in Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co., that there is nothing in the statutes requiring a company to keep up the value of its capital assets to the level of its nominal capital. The requirement is merely negative, that dividends shall not be paid out of capital, and the balance to the credit of profit and loss account does not automatically become part of the capital assets because the value of the actual capital assets has depreciated to an amount equal to or exceeding such balance.

The real question for determination, therefore, is whether there are profits available for distribution, and this is to be answered according to the circumstances of each particular case, the nature of the company, and the evidence of competent witnesses. There is no single definition of the word "profits" which will fit all cases. Take for instance Professor Marshall's definition (Economics, ed. of 1883, p. 142): "The excess of the receipts from the business during the year over the outlay for the business, the difference between the value of the stock and plant at the end and at the beginning of the year being taken as part of the receipts or as part of the outlay according as there has been an increase or decrease of value." I am precluded from adopting this in its entirety by authorities which are binding on me, because in the definition "stock and plant" obviously include both fixed and circulating capital as defined at p. 134 of the same treatise. See, for instance, Lord Lindley's judgment in Verner v General and Commercial Investment Trust, where he says: "Perhaps the shortest way of expressing the distinction which I am endeavouring to explain is to say that fixed capital may be sunk and lost and yet that the excess of current receipts over current payments may be divided, but that floating or circulating capital must be kept up." I do not understand his lordship to be laying down a general and universal rule that in every company fixed capital may be sunk and lost, but that there are companies in which that may be the case. All the authorities, however, agree, I think, that circulating capital must be kept up. Now in the present case the £200,000 realized loss arises by the surrender of the leases of certain mines, by the pulling down of certain furnaces, and on the sale of certain cottages. The company is a smelting company on a very large scale, and for the convenience of its works and by way of economy they acquired the leases of the surrendered mines in order to supply themselves with their own ore instead of buying it as required. The ore was used exclusively for the purposes of the company's works. The mines were drowned out and the cost of pumping them out was prohibitive. The company therefore surrendered the leases, pulled down the blast furnaces, and sold the cottages connected therewith. Now the evidence before me is all on one side. The plaintiffs called none, and Sir David Dale and the defendants' other witnesses all agree that in a company of this nature these items ought to come into the account before any profit can be said to be earned, and my own opinion coincides with theirs, inasmuch as I think that the money invested in those items is properly regarded in this company as circulating capital. Suppose the company had bought enormous stocks of ore sufficient to last for ten years, it could hardly be said that the true value of so much of this as remained from time to time ought not to be brought into the balance-sheet, and I can see no difference for the purpose of the account between ore in situ and ore so bought in advance. The blast furnaces and cottages are mere accessories to the ore, and resemble a building for burning the stores bought in advance already mentioned. There is more difficulty about the remaining £50,000. I think that the onus is on the plaintis to show that it is fixed capital and that in a company of this nature such fixed capital may be sunk or lost. They have not done this, and the evidence, so far as it goes, is the other way. But this is not an actual loss, but depreciation by estimate. The plaintiffs really relied on Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co. as an authority for this proposition as a universal negative—viz., "that no company owning wasting property need ever create a depreciation fund." In my opinion that is not the true result of the decision. It must be remembered that in that case there had been no loss of assets. The company's assets were larger than at its formation, and the court decided nothing more than the particular proposition that some companies with wasting assets need have no depreciation fund. For instance, I cannot think that it would be right for the defendant company to purchase out of capital the last two or three years of a valuable patent and distribute the whole of the receipts in respect thereof as profits without replacing the capital expended in purchase. It is for the court to determine in each case on evidence whether the particular company ought, or ought not, to have such a fund. There is no doubt as to the opinion of the witnesses in this case, and, further, the opinion of the directors cannot be altogether disregarded. The courts have, no doubt, in many cases, overruled directors who proposed to pay dividends, but I am not aware of any case in which the court has compelled them to pay when they have expressed their opinion that the state of the accounts do not admit of any such payment. In a matter depending on evidence and expert opinion it would be a very strong measure for the court to override the directors in such a manner. I have made no distinction between the realized loss and the estimated loss, because the witnesses declined to recognize any any such distinction, and also because the decided cases deal only with the distinction between floating and fixed capital, and do not distinguish between realized and estimated loss, and it would serve no useful purpose for me to express any opinion on the subject. The result is that the action fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Company — Winding up — Proof in winding up — Directors—Remuneration as receivers and managers—Remuneration as directors.

Two directors of a company who had been appointed by the court receivers and managers for the debenture-holders were allowed to prove in a voluntary winding-up for their remuneration as directors during the period for which they had acted and been paid as such receivers and managers.

On the 20th of September, 1899, Messrs. Comfort and Allen, two of the directors of the above company, were appointed by the court receivers and managers of the company's railway in a debenture-holders' action, and were paid salaries in that capacity.

On the 19th of April, 1901, the company passed a resolution for voluntary liquidation with a view to reconstruction.

Article 90 of the company's articles provided that the remuneration of the directors should be at the rate of £1,000 a year, and in fact the chairman had always received £300, and the other directors £175 each, annually, and these sums had been paid by monthly instalments.

This was a summons on behalf of four directors who claimed arrears of remuneration from the 30th of June, 1898, to the 19th of April, 1901; the argument was confined to the right of Messrs. Comfort and Allen to be paid their remuneration as directors while acting as receivers and managers in the debenture-holders' action.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Martelli, for the four directors.

Jenkins, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the liquidator.

BUCKLEY, J.—The directors are entitled to remuneration for carrying on the company's business as long as there is any business to carry on, and they are no less entitled to their remuneration because by doing certain work as receivers and managers, for which they are paid as receivers and managers, they lighten their work as directors.

Bill of exchange—Promissory note—Fraud of third party—Holder in due course—"Negotiated"—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 20, 29.

The defendant applied to A. for a loan of £15. At A.'s request the defendant, on promise of the loan, signed a blank paper bearing a 9d. stamp, and gave A. authority to fill it up as a promissory note for £15 payable to A. Subsequently A. applied to the plaintiff for a loan of £25, and offered in exchange to give the plaintiff the defendant's promissory note for £30. This was agreed to, and A. filled up the signed and stamped paper as a promissory note for £30 payable to the plaintiff, who received it in ignorance of the true facts, giving in exchange his cheque for £25 payable to the order of the defendant. A. having forged the defendant's signature to the plaintiff's cheque obtained payment for the same.

Held, that, although a payee might be a "holder in due course" within section 29 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, yet the delivery here to the plaintiff did not "negotiate" the note within the proviso to section 20 of that Act, and therefore, as the note was not filled up by A. strictly in accordance with the authority given him by the defendant, the plaintiff could not recover on the note.

Appeal by the plaintiff in the action from a decision of the learned judge of the Newcastle-upon-Tyne County Court in favour of the defendant.

The action was brought on a promissory note under circumstances which fully appear from the considered judgment of the court.

Arthur Powell, for the plaintiff.—My client is a holder of the bill in due course within the proviso to section 20 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and therefore, although the note was not filled up strictly in accordance with the authority given to Anderson, he is nevertheless entitled to recover on it.

Bruce Williams, for the defendant.—The plaintiff here became a party to the note before its completion, and therefore, being himself the payee on the face of the bill, he is not a "holder in due course" within section 29 of the Act, and the delivery of the bill to him was not a negotiation of it. That being so, the plaintiff is not protected by the proviso to section 20, which applies only when any instrument within that section is "negotiated" to the holder in due course. The county court judge was therefore right in deciding for the defendant, and this appeal should fail.

of the Newcastle County Court given for the defendant in action by the payee against the maker of a promissory note for £30, and the principal point involved is the construction of the 20th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The facts are not in dispute. The conduct of each of the parties in the action appears to have been quite straightforward and honest, and the evidence of each of them has been accepted as true. The difficulties which arose were occasioned by the fraud of one Anderson, who is now dead. The facts are as follows: Mr. Wheeler, the defendant, was a curate at Sunderland, and being about to remove to Norfolk, he required a temporary loan of £15 to pay the expenses of removing. He applied to Anderson to lend him the money, and Anderson promised to do so. The defendant, however, seems to have understood that Anderson proposed to get the money from someone else, and the name of the plaintiff Hurdman was mentioned as a person who would lend it, but the defendant objected to borrowing the money himself direct from the plaintiff. The defendant gave to Anderson a promissory note payable to Anderson for £15, and expected to get the money from Anderson the next day. We think he must have expected that Anderson would have borrowed the money, and probably from the plaintiff If he knew anything of business he must have understood that his promissory note would be indorsed by Anderson to the lender of the money. On the next day Anderson saw him, and did not give him the money, but informed him that the promissory note was in some way wrongly made out, and gave it back to him and it was burnt. In lieu of it the defendant gave to Anderson his signature on paper stamped with a 9d. stamp, which would be sufficient for a note for £75. This was done in a restaurant when the defendant was in a hurry, and he trusted Anderson to fill it up, but only authorized him to do so as a promissory note payable to himself and for £15 only. Anderson promised to send the £15. He did subsequently send a cheque of his own for £15, which, however, was dishonoured. Anderson, having got the defendant's signature and the note in blank, communicated by telephone with the plaintiff and asked him if he was willing to lend the defendant £25 upon his promissory note for £30 at a month. He represented that the defendant was in urgent need of the money and was willing to pay the £5 for the accommodation, but he further stipulated that if the money was repaid in a week £2 only should be charged instead of £5. The plaintiff agreed to the proposal, and it was arranged that Anderson should bring or send the note and receive the money. The plaintiff, having to go out, wrote a cheque for the £25 payable to the order of the defendant and left it with his wife to be exchanged for the promissory note. Anderson then sent the promissory note by a clerk, and received the cheque from the plaintiff's wife. The note, when received by the plaintiff's wife, was filled up as a promissory note for £30, with the plaintiff's name inserted as payee. It was on the face of it complete and regular in all respects, and the plaintiff had no notice that it had been signed in blank, or that Anderson had in any way acted without authority. The plaintiff's cheque for £25 was presented at the bank on which it was drawn, with an indorsement purporting to be the defendant's, but which was not his, and the indorsement appears to have been forged by Anderson. The defendant appears to have got cash from someone for Anderson's cheque for £15, but when it was dishonoured he had to take it up. In the result, therefore, he got no part of the proceeds of the promissory note. When the week elapsed the plaintiff wrote to the defendant on the matter, and then some correspondence took place, in which the plaintiff and defendant each stated the facts as far as they knew them. The defendant, upon receiving the plaintiff's letter, had some communication with Anderson, who promised to settle the matter, and gave him a receipt purporting to be a discharge of his liability, but Anderson did not settle with the plaintiff, and died within a few days and before the note became due. The judge on these facts gave judgment for the defendant.

The liability of the defendant appears to depend upon whether the case comes within the proviso at the end of the 20th section of the Bills of Exchange Act—that is, whether in this case the note was within the meaning of the words as used in that section: "After completion negotiated to a holder in due course." On the part of the defendant it was not denied in argument before us that the plaintiff was a holder in due course, but it was said that the note was not negotiated to him, and that, if it was, it was not negotiated after completion. Since the arguments we have been referred by counsel for the defendant to the case of Lewis v. Clay, 46 W. R. 319, 77 L. T. Rep. 653; as an authority that the plaintiff was not in that case a holder in due course. On the argument it was further said that section 84 shows that the note was incomplete until the delivery to the plaintiff, and consequently, if it could be said to be "negotiated" to him at all, it was not "after completion," but either before or, at most, simultaneously with completion; but it was further said, and this we think is the substantial argument for the defendant, that it was never negotiated to the plaintiff, as he was the payee, and an original party to the contract contained in the note, and did not become a party by transfer. It is contended that a bill or note is only "negotiated" when it is transferred from one holder to another, and for this section 31 is referred to. In substance the argument for the defendant and the judgment of the county court judge in his favour come to this—that the proviso in section 20 can have no application as between the immediate parties to a note or bill. If this is the necessary meaning of the words used in the proviso, we must, of course, give effect to it and affirm the judgment for the defendant, for the Bills of Exchange Act is now the code of law on the subject, and in cases where it differs from the old law it prevails over the old law. But if the words used in the Act are fairly capable of being construed as meaning the same as the words used by judges previously to the Act in stating the law, it would be right to give them that meaning, in the absence of anything to indicate a clear intention of the Legislature to alter the previous law. Further, by section 97, sub-section 2, the rules of the law merchant are to continue to apply to bills and notes, except so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. It is, therefore, material to see what light the law on this subject before the Act throws on the case before us. We find Bowen, J., stating the law thus in Garrard v. Lewis, 31 W. R. 475 at p. 476, 10 Q. B. D. 30: "I arrive at the conclusion that a man who gives his acceptance in blank holds out the person to whom it is intrusted as clothed with ostensible authority to fill in the bill as he pleases within the limits of the stamp, and that no alteration of the marginal figure, even if it be fraudulent or unauthorized, vitiates the bill as a bill for the full amount inserted in the body when the bill reaches the hands of a holder who is unaware that the marginal figure has been improperly altered." Of course, a case like the present, where there was no marginal figure, but only verbal instruction to fill in £15 as the amount, is an a fortiori case. It will be observed that the words "when the bill reaches the hands of a holder" are wide enough to cover the case of the payee, unless it could be contended that a payee was not a holder. Again, Lord Selborne, in France v. Clarke, 31 W. R. 374, 26 Ch. D. 257, expresses the rule thus: "The person who has signed a negotiable instrument in blank or with blank spaces is (on account of the negotiable character of the instrument) estopped by the law merchant from disputing any alteration made in the document after it has left his hands by filling up blanks or otherwise (not ex facie fraudulent) as against a bonâ fide holder for value without notice, but it has repeatedly been explained that this estoppel is in favour only of such bonâ fide holder." This statement would appear to include the case where the name of the person who became bonâ fide holder had been inserted as payee. The reported cases in which a holder who had given value for a bill after it had become complete and regular on the face of it has been held entitled to recover, notwithstanding that the bill had been signed by the defendant in blank and had been filled up otherwise than in accordance with the defendant's authority, will, we believe, be found to be all cases where the holder was indorsee and not payee; but it is obvious that cases such as the present, where the payee's name was inserted without his knowing of the bill having been in blank would be rare. The language of the judges seems wide enough to cover the case of the payee as well as the case actually before them, but that is all that can be said. There are cases where the payee's name has been inserted by himself and where he has been entitled to recover, as Crutchly v. Mann, 5 Taunton 529, Harvey v. Cane, 24 W. R. 400, 34 L. T. Rep. 64, and Lard v. Jackson, 34 L. T. Rep. 65, but in these it seems there had been nothing done in excess of the defendants' authority except the mere putting of the payee's name. In Harvey v. Cane it was said that "anybody who gets the bill (i.e., one with the payee's name omitted) fairly may put his own name as payee," and if this wide statement is correct, it would seem that a payee stands in as good a position as an indorsee when he bonâ fide gives value for the bill; but in Harvey v. Cane the court also seems to have come to the conclusion that what was done came substantially within the defendant's authority. The cases Awde v. Dixon, 6 Exch. 869, and Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough, 45 W. R. 24, [1896] A. C. 514, cited by the defendant on the argument, do not appear to help him very much; but, on the other hand, the investigation of the law before the Bills of Exchange Act appears to show that there is no case which would be a distinct authority in favour of the plaintiff if the law were still as before the Act. We therefore approach the consideration of the words used in the Act without any very clear guide from the previous state of the law, but we do rather expect to find the bonâ fide holder for value without notice, or the holder in due course, as he is now called, fully protected. Passing now to the words of section 20 of the Act, the first sub-section of that section shows that Anderson had a primâ facie authority to fill up this note, but that in this case is hardly important. The second sub-section shows that, unless the case comes within the proviso at the end, the note is not enforceable against the defendant, because it was not filled up strictly in accordance with the authority given. If in the present case Anderson, instead of communicating through the telephone with the plaintiff, had brought the stamped paper signed by the defendant with him, and had filled it up in the plaintiff's presence, the plaintiff would certainly have been put on inquiry as to Anderson's authority, and by reason of the first part of the 2nd sub-section could only have recovered if Anderson was acting strictly within his authority. So in all cases where the plaintiff has been allowed to recover on a bill in which he had inserted his own name as payee he would, I think, now have to show that this was within the authority given by the defendant. Then comes the important proviso, "Provided that if any such instrument" (that is, an instrument which has been either a simple signature on stamped paper or a bill wanting in any material particular) "after completion is negotiated." Now, it seems to us that completion here refers to completing the form of the bill or supplying the wanting "material particular." It is after it has been made complete and regular on the face of it, to take the words of section 29 defining holder in due course. We do not think "completion" as used in this proviso includes delivery. It is the form of the instrument which is being referred to, and not its ceasing to be inchoate and revocable and becoming an operative instrument which is the matter referred to in the 84th section. But, even if the bill could not be said to be completed unless delivered to some one, here it was delivered to the plaintiff, and, if what happened on his giving his cheque for it and becoming the holder for value is "negotiating it to a holder in due course," it may, I think, be said to be "negotiated after completion." The real question is, does "negotiated to a holder in due course" cover what was done in this case? The plaintiff undoubtedly became the holder of the bill for value when it was handed to his wife and she gave over his cheque in exchange. This brings us to the important words, "negotiated to a holder in due course," and it is necessary to consider the case of Lewis v. Clay. In that case the late Lord Chief Justice said in an action brought by the payee of a promissory note, "Further, an examination of sections 20, 21, 29, 30, and 38, relating expressly to bills, and sections 83, 84, 88, relating to promissory notes, will make it clear that a holder in due course is a person to whom after its completion by and as between the immediate parties the bill or note has been negotiated. In the present case the plaintiff is named as payee on the face of the note, and is, therefore, one of the immediate parties. The notes have, in fact, never been negotiated within the meaning of the Act. I desire to say here that, even if the plaintiff were 'holder in due course,' it would, in my judgment, make no difference in the result." The Chief Justice thus gave his judgment really on the same ground as Foster v. Mackinnon, 17 W. R. 1105, L. R. 4 C. P. 704. It is quite clear, therefore, that the expression of opinion of the late Chief Justice that a payee was never a holder in due course was a dictum only. In section 2, there is this definition: "'Holder' means the payee or endorsee of a bill or note who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof." Therefore, in section 29 it is necessary to read holder as including payee as well as indorsee, and to read it, "a holder in due course is a payee or indorsee," &c. That being so, the only words in section 29 which can be said to indicate that a payee cannot be a holder in due course are those in sub-section 1, "and that at the time the bill was negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it." But, if the word "payee" had been expressed in the earlier part of the section, it would be clear that this means "if negotiated to him he had at the time no notice," &c. On the whole, therefore, we are not prepared to hold that a payee of a note can never be a holder in due course, but it is, as it seems to us, just as unnecessary for us to decide that question as it was for the late Lord Chief Justice in the case before him.

The real point in the present case, after all, is, can we hold that this note was "negotiated" to the plaintiff within the meaning with which the words are used in the proviso to the 20th section, and as to this we certainly have the opinion of the late Lord Chief Justice that a delivery to a payee for value is not a "negotiating" within the meaning of the Act? In the 31st section it is said, "a bill is negotiated when it is transferred from one person to another in such a manner as to constitute the transferee the holder of the bill." Does this mean only from one person who is holder to another, or may the person transferring be an agent in possession of the bill otherwise than a holder, whose delivery constitutes the receiver or holder? And even if that cannot be the meaning of the 31st section, may it not be possible to say that on the 20th section "negotiated to a holder in due course" means no more than delivered to a person in such a way that he thereupon becomes a holder in due course? This is the argument of Mr. Arthur Powell for the plaintiff. On the other hand we have to deal with the points raised by Mr. Bruce Williamson in his argument for the defendant, that the issuing of a bill or note to the first holder stands on a different footing altogether from the transfer of it from one holder to another, because when the first takes it it has not become part of the mercantile currency of the country, to use an expression found in some of the cases. Even if the payee of a note may be a holder in due course, the question whether he is so or not depends upon the actual state of facts as between him and the maker of the note; and the contract between the payee and the maker of the note, though it has some incidents written into it by the law merchant, yet is governed more by the ordinary law of contracts than by the law merchant, and in particular that the element of negotiability in no way enters into the contract between the maker and the payee. There is much to support this argument in the Bills of Exchange Act. In the present case the delivery of the note to the plaintiff must, in order to enable him to recover, be under the authority of the defendant. It certainly was not so delivered by the defendant's actual authority and can only be said to have been delivered under his authority by reason of the ostensible authority with which Anderson had been clothed by the signature in blank. Mere possession of a promissory note, complete and regular on the face of it and payable to a named payee, would not be conclusive evidence that the maker had given authority to the person in whose possession it was to deliver it to the maker. Anderson, if agent of the defendant at all, was only agent to fill up the paper, and if the question were to be determined altogether apart from the law merchant and the Bills of Exchange Act, we should have to say that there was here no binding contract at common law, whereby the defendant promised the plaintiff that if the plaintiff would give £25 to Anderson for the defendant the defendant would pay £30 to the plaintiff in a month. We have been very reluctant to come to the conclusion that the judgment in favour of the defendant in this case was right, but after carefully considering the matter we have come to the conclusion that we should be unfairly straining the words if we did not hold that "negotiated" in the proviso at the end of section 20 means transferred by one holder to another. We think the present case might possibly have been decided in the plaintiff's favour before the Act was passed. We think that the appeal must be dismissed.

REX v. LINES. (a.)

Criminal law—Indictment—Game—Night poaching—Previous convictions—Night Poaching Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 69), ss. 1, 9.

By section 1 of the Night Poaching Act, 1828, it is enacted that if any person shall by night unlawfully enter or be in any land with any gun, net, engine, or other instrument for the purpose of taking or destroying game, such offender shall, for the first and second offences, be liable, on summary conviction, to certain terms of imprisonment, "and in case such person shall so offend a third time he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." By section 9 of the same Act it is enacted that if any persons, to the number of three or more, shall by night unlawfully enter or be in any land for the purpose of taking or destroying game. "any of such persons being armed with any gun, crossbow, fire-arms, bludgeon, or any other offensive weapon," such persons shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Held, that a count of an indictment for a third offence against section 1 of entering by night upon land with a gun for the purpose of taking or destroying game, which shows that one of the two alleged previous convictions was a conviction of an offence against section 9, is bad, as it does not show that such person has "so" offended a third time within the meaning of section 1.

Case stated by the deputy-chairman of the Bedfordshire Quarter Sessions.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Bedford, holden at Bedford, on the 30th of October, 1901, John Lines was tried on the following count of an indictment:—"That John Lines, on the 27th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1879, was in due form of law convicted on a certain indictment for that he, the said John Lines, with three other persons, in the night of the 11th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1878, together being then by night respectively armed with bludgeons, did there together by night, armed as aforesaid, unlawfully enter certain lands in the occupation of Lord Brownlow for the purpose therein of taking and destroying game contrary to the statute in that behalf, and the said John Lines being then so convicted as aforesaid was then and there adjudged and sentenced to a term of penal servitude for five years." And that after the said John Lines had been so convicted as aforesaid, to wit on the 17th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1886, the said John Lines was duly convicted, for that he, the said John Lines, in the night of the 16th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1886, did then by night then and there unlawfully enter land, in the occupation of the Right Hon. Earl Brownlow, with a gun, for the purpose then and there of taking and destroying game contrary to the statute in that behalf, and the same being his second offence in that behalf the said John Lines was for such last-mentioned offence committed to prison for a term of six calendar months, there to be kept to hard labour, and was then and there further ordered at the expiration of such last-named sentence to find sureties by recognizance, himself in £20, and two sureties in £10 each, or one surety in £20, for his not so offending again for the space of two years then next following, and in default of such sureties to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for a further term of six calendar months. And that the said John Lines afterwards and after he had been so twice convicted as aforesaid, to wit on the 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1899, by night, to wit about the hour of 5.30 in the night of the same day, did unlawfully enter certain land, in the occupation of Arthur Macnamara, and was then by night unlawfully in the said land with a certain gun, for the purpose by night as aforesaid of therein taking and destroying game against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our lord the king, his crown, and dignity."

It was objected by counsel (Mr. C. E. Dyer) for the defendant that the said count was bad, inasmuch as it disclosed no identical offence; that the offence for which the defendant stood indicted being an offence against section 1 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, an indictment for such offence would only lie in the case of a person who 'so offended' a third time; that the first of the previous convictions named in the count showed on the face of it that it was an offence against section 9 of the said statute and not against section 1; that the punishment for the third offence under section 1 of the statute was of a cumulative nature, and that liability to indictment under section 1 was dependent on the fact of the defendant having been dealt with for his previous offences summarily in the manner provided by section 1; whereas, for an offence under section 9, a defendant expiates his offence by the punishment awarded, and owes nothing further to the law.

The deputy-chairman of the quarter sessions held that under the authority of Rex v. William Ball, 1 Moody C. C. R. 330, the offence for which the defendant was convicted under section 9 was also an offence under section 1, although, from the circumstances of aggravation which accompanied it, it was punishable under section 9, and that the power to indict under section 1 was dependent upon the offence being a third offence, and that, if the first and second offences were, in fact, offences against section 1, it did not matter under what section the defendant had been convicted or before what tribunal he had been tried. He also held that the point raised by counsel for the defence as to the punishment which the defendant had suffered in respect of his first offence did not affect the validity of the indictment, but might properly be urged on the question of the punishment to be awarded him for his present offence. The jury found the defendant guilty on the count above referred to, and the previous convictions were duly proved. The deputy-chairman respited judgment until the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved should be known. The prisoner, being unable to find bail, remained in custody.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the first of the previous convictions stated in the count referred to could be treated as a first conviction for the purpose of the indictment.

By the Night Poaching Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 69), it is provided as follows: "Section 1.—If any person shall . . . by night unlawfully enter or be in any land . . . with any gun, net, engine, or other instrument for the purpose of taking or destroying game, such offender shall upon conviction thereof before two justices of the peace be committed for the first offence to the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding three calendar months, there to be kept to hard labour, and at the expiration of such period shall find sureties by recognizance . . . himself in £10, and two sureties in £5 each, or one surety in £10, for his not so offending again for the space of one year next following, and in case of not finding such sureties shall be further imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of six calendar months unless such sureties are sooner found; and in case such person shall so offend a second time, he shall be committed to the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding six calendar months, there to be kept to hard labour, and at the expiration of such period shall find sureties by recognizance . . . himself in £20, and two sureties in £10 each, or one surety in £20, for his not so offending again for the space of two years next following, and in case of not finding such sureties shall be further imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of one year unless such sureties are sooner found, and in case such person shall so offend a third time he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. . . ."

"Section 9.—If any persons to the number of three or more together shall by night unlawfully enter or be in any land . . . for the purpose of taking or destroying game or rabbits, any of such persons being armed with any gun, crossbow, firearms, bludgeon, or any other offensive weapon, each and every of such persons shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. . . ."

No one appeared on behalf of the prisoner.

Lord Coleridge, K.C. (Stimson with him), for the prosecution.—The decision of the deputy-chairman was right, and the prisoner was rightly convicted. In the case of Rex v. William Ball, 1 Moody C. C. R. 330, it was held that what is punishable as an offence under section 9 of the Act is nevertheless an offence under section 1, though the circumstances of aggravation made it liable to a heinous punishment. Notwithstanding that in section 1 the Legislature contemplated two previous summary convictions, nevertheless it is quite sufficient, in order to give the court jurisdiction to deal with the prisoner as for a third offence under section 1, to prove one previous summary conviction and one previous conviction under section 9.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case the point which has been reserved, and which we have to decide, is whether the previous proceedings against this prisoner are sufficient to make him guilty of an offence within the meaning of the words "shall so offend for a third time" in section 1 of the Night Poaching Act, 1828. It has been contended on behalf of the prosecution that a conviction for an offence under section 9 of this Act includes a conviction for an offence under section 1 because a conviction for the greater offence includes a conviction for the lesser offence, and that the prisoner having been convicted under section 9 of having, together with three other persons armed with bludgeons, unlawfully entered by night certain lands for the purpose of taking and destroying game, that conviction must be taken as being a conviction under section 1 of unlawfully entering by night "any land with any gun, net, engine, or other instrument for the purpose of taking or destroying game." It is quite true that in section 9, as also in section 1, the words "unlawfully enter or be in any land, whether open or inclosed, for the purpose of taking or destroying game" occur, but I think that when the words "or any other offensive weapon" in section 9 are taken into consideration, the essence of the offence under section 9 is the being armed with offensive weapons, and that those words do not refer to weapons for taking or destroying game but for committing serious assaults.

Section 1 provides that "in case such person shall so offend a third time he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." In my opinion these words "so offend" refer to a repetition of an offence against section 1. In the present case it seems to me there is no evidence of two previous convictions under section 1.

In my opinion the case of Rex v. Ball, upon which the deputy-chairman of quarter sessions relied, is not an authority for the purpose for which it has been cited by counsel for the prosecution. In that case the question arose as to the power to apprehend poachers under section 2 of the Night Poaching Act, 1828, and it was held that there was power to apprehend persons committing an offence under section 9, although the power to apprehend given by section 2 related to an offence under section 1, inasmuch as the poachers in that case had been guilty of an offence under section 1 as well as under section 9. In my opinion that decision is not an authority for the contention that we ought to treat a conviction for an offence under section 9 as a conviction for an offence under section 1 for the purpose of showing a third offence under section 1.

I therefore think that this conviction must be quashed.

NOAKES & CO. v. RICE. (a.)

Mortgage—Redemption—Public-house—"Tied house"—Clogging redemption—"Once a mortgage always a mortgage"—Covenant to continue after redemption.

A covenant in a mortgage of a leasehold public-house that the mortgagor shall during the continuance of the term, whether or not any principal money or interest is still owing on the security, buy his beer only from the mortgagees, is a clog on the equity of redemption, as it prevents the mortgagor getting back the property unimpaired after payment of principal moneys and interest due on the security.

He is therefore entitled on redemption to an assignment of the premises free from the covenant.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (48 W. R. 629, [1900] 2 Ch. 445) affirmed.

Santley v. Wilde, 48 W. R. 90, [1899] 2 Ch. 474, disapproved by Lord Macnaghten and Lord Davey.

In 1897 the respondent purchased the lease of the King's Arms, Camberwell, from the second mortgagees.

In order to carry this out, the appellants, who were brewers and first mortgagees under a mortgage which contained provisions almost identical with those of the mortgage mentioned below, released their security, and advanced respondent part of the purchase-money, taking a first mortgage as security for the advance.

By the mortgage deed, dated the 7th of October, 1897, the respondent demised the leasehold premises and fixtures and the goodwill to the appellants subject to the proviso of redemption, and the same indenture contained the following covenant: "And for the considerations aforesaid the mortgagor, so as to charge the premises hereinbefore expressed to be hereby demised into whosoever possession the same may come, whether by act of the party or by operation of law, or by any other ways or means howsoever, and to the further intent that the obligation of this covenant may run with the land, doth hereby covenant with the company that the mortgagor shall not nor will at any time during the continuance of the term aforesaid, and whether any principal moneys or interest shall or shall not be owing upon the security of these presents, use or sell or permit to be used or sold in, upon, or about the said demised premises any malt liquors, except such as shall be bonâ fide purchased by the mortgagor of the company; and, further, that if and whenever there shall be a breach of the said covenant he, the mortgagor, shall and will pay to the company the sum of £1,000 as and for ascertained liquidated damages for each such breach, and will sell all such malt liquors pure, unadulterated, and unmixed, and of the like strength, character, and quality in all respects as the same shall be supplied to him."

On the 24th of March, 1898, the respondent gave notice to the appellants of his intention to pay off the moneys secured by the said indenture of the 7th of October, 1897.

The appellants, however, though willing on payment to reconvey or transfer the property, refused to release or assign the covenant, so the present action was brought by the respondent for a declaration that he was entitled, not only to a reconveyance or transfer of the property, but also to a release or reassignment of the covenant.

Cozens-Hardy, J., held that the "tie," though valid during the continuance of the security, could not be maintained after payment of all moneys due on the security, and granted the declaration asked for, 48 W. R. 110, [1900] 1 Ch. 213.

The Court of Appeal (48 W. R. 629, [1900] 2 Ch. 445, Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) affirmed this order.

The present appellants again appealed.

Haldane, K.C., and Eve, K.C. (Stanley Fisher with them), for the appellants.—The doctrines against clogging the equity of redemption have been modified. The intention of the parties as expressed in their contract should be carried out. Here the mortgagee has contracted for a collateral advantage, and only if it be oppressive the court will not enforce it: Potter v. Edwards, 5 W. R. 407; Mainland v. Upjohn, 37 W. R. 411, 41 Ch. D. 126; Teevan v. Smith, 30 W. R. 716, 20 Ch. D. 724; Biggs v. Hoddinott, 47 W. R. 84, [1898] 2 Ch. 307; Santley v. Wilde, 48 W. R. 90, [1899] 2 Ch. 474; Carritt v. Bradley, 49 W. R. 593, [1901] 2 K. B. 550. Salt v. Marquis of Northampton, 40 W. R. 529, [1892] A. C. 1, turned upon the true construction of the document.

Astbury, K.C., and Edward Beaumont, for the respondents.—In this case we have a clog on the equity of redemption. No brewer would make advances on premises tied to a competing house. Salt v. Marquis of Northampton is in point.

Haldane, K.C., replied.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl OF HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case it is suggested that great differences of judicial opinion are apparent upon many of the decisions which are germane to the present appeal. For my own part, I very much doubt whether it is quite accurate so to describe the differences of judicial opinion. In many of the cases, and indeed, I think, in most of the cases, to which our attention has been drawn, the court has not been in any doubt or difficulty as to the rule, which has been established in the courts of equity so firmly that nothing could shake it now, but only as to the application of that rule to different sets of facts.

It is to my mind a very remarkable corroboration of the criticism which I am now making that in that case upon which doubt appears to have been thrown —namely, Santley v. Wilde—Lord Lindley's judgment is in these terms—and I do not know that there has been a more authoritative exposition of the rule which arises now than what he there laid down: "The principle is this: a mortgage is a conveyance of land or an assignment of chattels as a security for the payment of a debt or the discharge of some other obligation for which it is given. This is the idea of a mortgage: and the security is redeemable on the payment or discharge of such debt or obligation, any provision to the contrary notwithstanding. That, in my opinion, is the law. Any provision inserted to prevent redemption on payment or performance of the debt or obligation for which the security was given is what is meant by a clog or fetter on the equity of redemption, and is therefore void. It follows from this, that 'once a mortgage always a mortgage'; but I do not understand that this principle involves the further proposition that the amount or nature of the further debt or obligation the payment or performance of which is to be secured is a clog or fetter within the rule."

I cite that case because it appears to me that that lays down the rule; and the differences which are supposed to prevail from time to time appear to me to be only differences of fact, or of the modes in which the various courts have regarded the fact, as to whether a case came within that rule or not. But I do not believe that there is any portion of that which Lord Lindley laid down in the case which I have cited that has been the subject of doubt or difficulty in any court whatever.

I find that the same question has arisen, and has been very learnedly discussed, in the Irish courts lately in the case of Browne v. Ryan, [1901] 2 Ir. R. 653, and certainly the case is extremely relevant to the question which this House is now discussing, because, in truth, it arose upon what practically are the facts of this case, and the learned judges in the Court of Appeal have arrived at the same conclusion as that at which I invite this House to arrive. FitzGibbon, L.J., in his judgment (and also Holmes, L.J.), in referring to the case which I have just cited, appear to consider that that case is inconsistent with the rule which they themselves lay down. I confess I am unable to find any inconsistency. It may be that Lord Lindley took a different view of the facts in the case to which he was then referring to that which they would have taken, but that is not a difference in the law; and in this case it appears to me, as in the case which was argued in the Court of Appeal in Ireland, it is almost impossible—if the rule laid down by Lord Lindley there is the rule upon which the courts must act—to deny that there is a fetter or clog, or whatever figurative word may be used, to prevent that which, according to the known state of the law, is to be enforced—namely, that the person who has pledged his estate for the payment of a debt shall, upon redemption, be entitled to have that estate back again unfettered and unclogged by anything that shall prevent his exercising the right which the law insists upon his being permitted to have. Under these circumstances, it is and must be in each case a question of the particular thing which is advanced as a clog or a fetter, and in some cases it may seem to come very near the line. Whatever rule is laid down, one can reduce it to something like an absurdity by taking an extreme case.

But, taking this case, it appears to me that undoubtedly this was a mortgage, and that the equity of redemption is clogged and fettered here by the continuance of an obligation which would render this house less valuable in the hands of its owner during the whole period, and beyond the whole period, of the term, apart from the realization of the security. Under those circumstances, as a matter of the merest and simplest reasoning, I am wholly unable to come to any other conclusion than that there is a clog and fetter here which the law will not permit. That seems to me to be the whole of this case; and, apart from the attempt to determine the sources from which this rule of law or equity was arrived at, it seems to me that this case is capable of being disposed of very summarily in that way. I care not what the sources of the rule were. I care not what difference of fact there may have been in other cases. What I say is, here is a case strictly within the rule, and, looking at the facts of this case, and applying to it one's ordinary knowledge of what would be the effect of the covenant upon the property which was made the pledge, and which has to be restored, free and unfettered, to its owner, I cannot entertain a doubt that it did, and did intentionally, place a clog and fetter upon the right of redemption which it is the policy of the law, as declared by the courts of equity, to insist shall not be taken away by anything in the nature of a mortgage.

Under these circumstances I move that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J., affirmed by the Court of Appeal, is perfectly right.

Redemption is of the very nature and essence of a mortgage, as mortgages are regarded in equity. It is inherent in the thing itself; and it is, I think, as firmly settled now as it ever was in former times that equity will not permit any device or contrivance designed or calculated to prevent or impede redemption. It follows as a necessary consequence that when the money secured by a mortgage of land is paid off, the land itself, and the owner of the land in the use and enjoyment of it, must be as free and unfettered to all intents and purposes as if the land had never been made the subject of the security.

In the present case it is hardly necessary to appeal to this principle, because the mortgage deed under consideration expressly and in terms provides that, on repayment of the money advanced, the mortgagees are to reconvey the mortgaged premises to the mortgagor, or as he shall direct. That, of course, means that the land is to be reconveyed freed and discharged from all burthen and liability in respect of or arising out of the contract under which the advance was made.

Counsel for the appellants, in his reply, felt the difficulty of his position so much that he was driven to contend that the subject of the security was a "tied" public-house, and that therefore the mortgagor could only get back his property subject to that "tie" in favour of the mortgagees, the brewers. But to this, as was pointed out in the Court of Appeal, there are two answers. In the first place, the argument has no foundation in fact. Nothing can be plainer than this, that it was the object and intention of all parties that the property should be set free from the old "tie" attached to it, or attempted to be attached, in the hands of its former owner, and that it should be mortgaged to the appellants as a free public-house. In the next place, if the tie is invalid after redemption now, the tie could not have subsisted after the old mortgage was paid off.

Since the argument, my attention has been called to the case of Browne v. Ryan, recently decided by the Court of Appeal in Ireland. There a farmer mortgaged his holding to secure £200 and interest; and as part of the mortgage transaction it was stipulated that the mortgagor should sell his holding within twelve months, employ the mortgagee as the auctioneer at a certain commission, or pay him the like commission if the conduct of the sale was given to anyone else. The Court of Appeal held, and in my judgment rightly held, that the stipulation had no effect after redemption. The judgments of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal seem to me, if I may venture to say so, to contain a very clear exposition of the law. They had occasion to consider the judgment of the English Court of Appeal in Santley v. Wilde, and they expressed their disapproval of the conclusion at which the English Court of Appeal arrived. Speaking for myself, with all deference to Lord Lindley, I cannot help sharing that view. I do not in the least dissent from the propositions laid down by Lord Lindley, taking them separately. But the transaction in that case seems to me to have been nothing more than an ordinary mortgage to secure an advance of money, with a superadded obligation offending against the settled principles of equity in that it rendered redemption impossible. It seems to me to be contrary to principle that a mortgagee should stipulate with his mortgagor that, after full payment of principal, interest, and costs, he should continue to receive, for a definite or indefinite period, a share of the rents and profits of the mortgaged property as the result of an obligation arising from the contract made when the mortgage was created. Nor can I agree with the President of the Probate Division, who seems to have thought that Santley v. Wilde was covered by the decision in Biggs v. Hoddinott—a decision to which, as it seems to me, no objection can be taken.

If there is an expression in Cozens-Hardy, J.'s, judgment to which I do not cordially assent, it is one in the last paragraph of his judgment, where the learned judge seems to refer to this tie as "an equity attached to the property," or as an "equitable burden." I rather doubt whether such an obligation can be made to run with the land, or can be imposed on the owner in respect of the property except as between lessor and lessee, or, in the case of a mortgage, during the continuance of the security.

I concur in thinking that the judgment should be affirmed.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. For the reasons stated by Cozens-Hardy, J., by the Court of Appeal, and in this House, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord DAVEY.—There are three doctrines of the courts of equity in this country which have been referred to in the course of the argument in this case. The first doctrine to which I refer is expressed in the maxim, "Once a mortgage always a mortgage." The second is, that the mortgagee shall not reserve to himself any collateral advantage outside the mortgage contract; and the third is, that a provision or stipulation which will have the effect of clogging or fettering the equity of redemption is void.

The first maxim presents no difficulty; it is only another way of saying that a mortgage cannot be made irredeemable, and that a provision to that effect is void. In the case of Salt v. Marquis of Northampton the question was whether a certain life policy, the premiums on which were charged against the mortgagor, was comprised in the mortgage security. That question having been decided in the affirmative, it was declared to be redeemable, notwithstanding an express provision to the contrary contained in the deed.

The second doctrine to which I refer—namely, that the mortgagee shall not reserve to himself any collateral advantage outside the mortgage contract—was established long ago when the usury laws were in force. The court of equity went beyond the usury laws, and set its face against every transaction which tended to usury. It therefore declared void every stipulation by a mortgagee for a collateral advantage which made its total remuneration for the loan indirectly exceed the legal interest. I think it will be found that every case under this head of equity was decided either on this ground or on the ground that the bargain was oppressive and unconscionable. The abolition of the usury laws has made an alteration in the view the court should take on this subject, and I agree that a collateral advantage may now be stipulated for by a mortgagee, provided that no unfair advantage be taken by the mortgagee which would render it void or voidable, according to the general principles of equity, and provided that it does not offend against the third doctrine. On these grounds I think the case of Biggs v. Hoddinott was rightly decided.

The third doctrine to which I have referred is really a corollary from the first, and might be expressed in this form: "Once a mortgage always a mortgage, and nothing but a mortgage." The meaning of that is, that the mortgagee shall not make any stipulation which will prevent a mortgagor who has paid principal, interest, and costs from getting back his mortgaged property on the condition on which he parted with it. I do not dissent from the opinion expressed by Lord Lindley when Master of the Rolls in the case of Santley v. Wilde. He says: "A 'clog' or 'fetter' is something which is inconsistent with the idea of 'security'; a clog or fetter is in the nature of a repugnant condition." But I ask "security" for what? I think it must be security for the principal, interest, and costs, and, I will add, for any advantages in the nature of increased interest or remuneration for the loan which the mortgagee has validly stipulated for during the continuance of the mortgage. There are two elements in the conception of a mortgage—first, security for the money advanced; and secondly, remuneration for the use of the money. When the mortgage is paid off the security is at an end, and, as the mortgagee is no longer kept out of his money, the remuneration to him for the use of his money is also at an end. I confess I should have decided the case of Santley v. Wilde differently from the way in which it was dealt with in the Court of Appeal. After the payment of principal and interest and everything which had become payable up to the date of redemption, the property in that case remained charged with the payment to the mortgagee of one-third share of the profits, and the stipulation to that effect should, I think, have been held to be a clog or fetter on the right to redeem. The principle is this, that a mortgage must not be converted into something else; and when once you come to the conclusion that a stipulation for the benefit of the mortgagee is part of the mortgage transaction, it is but part of his security, and necessarily comes to an end on the payment off of the loan. In my opinion every yearly or other recurring payment stipulated for by the mortgagee should be held to be in the nature of interest, and no more payable after the principal is paid off than interest would be. I apprehend a man could not stipulate for the continuance of payment of interest after the principal is paid, and I do not think he can for any other recurring payment, such as a share of profits. Any stipulation to that effect would, in my opinion, be void as a clog or fetter on the equity of redemption.

By the Conveyancing Act a mortgagee may now be required to transfer his mortgage on payment of what is due to him, and he must then transfer all his security, including every advantage which he derives from the mortgage transaction and all his deeds and documents constituting his title as mortgagee. And on redemption he must do the like to the mortgagor, and any stipulation which varies the effect and incidents of redemption on payment off of what is due on the loan is a clog within the meaning of the rule.

Now, applying what I have said to the present case, the decision becomes easy. In the first place, I do not think that the respondent's covenant to deal exclusively with the brewers continued after the payment off of the loan and the redemption; and secondly, if it did, it was an attempt to charge it on the property, and that constituted a clog or fetter which, according to well-established principles, was void.

I only desire to add that, with Lord Macnaghten, I cannot assent altogether to the assumption made by Cozens-Hardy, J., that the covenant constituted, or might constitute, a good charge upon the property by virtue of the operation of the doctrine in Tulk v. Moxhay. I should hesitate some time before I assented to that proposition, but it is perfectly immaterial for the decision in the present case, because, as I have already said, I think that the covenant did not continue after the redemption, and that the mere attempt to make it a charge on the property would render it void.

Upon these grounds I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I am so satisfied in my own mind with the judgment pronounced by Cozens-Hardy, J., and by the Court of Appeal, and the judgment already proposed to this House, that I think I should be wasting time if I were to add anything to them beyond expressing my concurrence.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I concur.

Lord LINDLEY.—I agree in thinking that the covenant contained in this mortgage, by which the mortgagees have attempted to convert the house mortgaged from a free public-house into a tied public-house, even after redemption, is invalid. I see no answer to the objection taken to it that upon payment off of the mortgage-money the mortgagor cannot get back what he mortgaged—namely, a free public-house. The attempt to strengthen the tie by stipulating for liquidated damages and charging them on the property certainly does not mend matters, but makes them worse.

The case before us is not like the case of a mortgage of wasting property—for example, a lease which, owing to its nature, cannot be given back on redemption in the state in which it was mortgaged. Here the mortgage contains a covenant the object of which is to disentitle the mortgagor on redemption from having back the property unfettered by that covenant. This is inconsistent with the settled law of mortgage.

I regard the mortgage deed in this case as another unsuccessful attempt to lay a new burden on land not warranted by law or by the doctrine laid down by Tulk v. Moxhay, which has often lately been relied upon as going much further than it does.

The conclusion thus arrived at is not inconsistent with Santley v. Wilde, on which the appellants so strongly rely. Some of this House think that case went too far. I do not think so myself; but I will not trouble to consider its details, which were complicated. The principle on which the Court of Appeal decided the case was, I still think, sound. Whether it was properly applied in that case is now of no importance. I believe the true principle applicable to these cases to be that expounded by the Court of Appeal in Biggs v. Hoddinott and Santley v. Wilde. That principle is perfectly consistent with a real pledge and with the maxim, "Once a mortgage always a mortgage"; but it will not render valid the covenant which your lordships have to consider in the present case.

I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

As regards the recent case of Browne v. Ryan in Ireland, I am satisfied that the Court of Appeal did not go too far in holding that the plaintiff's action for damages could not be sustained.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

MICHAEL v. HART & CO. (a.)

Stock exchange—Damages—Measure of—Closing account—Breach of contract.

Defendants, who were brokers on the London Stock Exchange, agreed with the plaintiff, for whom they had bought certain shares for a particular settlement, to carry over the shares to the next settlement, and entered into the necessary arrangements with jobbers for that purpose. Before the settlement the defendants, in breach of their agreement, closed the account by selling the shares against him, and gave him notice thereof, the plaintiff insisting upon the defendants performing the contract upon the day fixed for its performance. In an action to recover damages for the breach of contract,

Held, that the plaintiff was not bound to treat the contract as finally determined on the day the account was closed, and to measure his damages upon the prices of the shares ruling on that day, but that he was entitled to have his damages assessed upon the prices ruling on the next settling day, the day fixed for the performance of the contract.

Quære, whether, as held by Wills, J. (ante, p. 154, [1901] 2 K. B. 867), the damages should be assessed upon the highest prices ruling between the date when the account was wrongfully closed and the settling day.

Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J., on further consideration: reported ante, p. 154; [1901] 2 K. B. 867.

The action was brought against a firm of stockbrokers to recover damages for breach of contract in not carrying over certain shares. The plaintiff's case was that he agreed with the defendants as his stockbrokers, on the 11th and 13th of May, 1901, that certain stocks and shares which they had purchased for him for the mid-May settlement should be carried over by the defendants for the end of May settlement. He had previously deposited with them 100 bank shares to secure any balance that might be due from him to them. The defendants made arrangements with jobbers to carry over the shares. The plaintiff complained that in breach of their contract the defendants on the 14th, 15th, and 16th of May wrongfully closed the account and sold against him the stocks and shares at prices greatly to his detriment. The defendants denied that they agreed to carry over any stocks and shares belonging to the plaintiff except upon the express condition that he should pay the defendants all differences due upon his account in excess of £1,000, and in the meantime providing further cover should the condition of the market require it. Their case was that on the 14th of May, 1901, they gave notice to the plaintiff that unless he complied with the condition by providing further cover at or before 2 p.m. on that day they would close the account, and, as he did not do so, they closed the account. It appeared that in answer to the notice above mentioned, the plaintiff's solicitors at once wrote, before the settling day, that the plaintiff insisted upon the defendants performing the contract.

At the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants applied for a new trial on the grounds of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, but the court (consisting of the Master of the Rolls, Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) refused to grant a new trial, Mathew, L.J., dissenting. It appeared that the prices of the shares on the day of the closing of the account were such that the damages, if assessed upon the basis of the prices on that day, were nominal. The prices of the shares rose after that date, but subsequently fell a little, and at the date of the end of May settlement the prices were below the highest prices during the account.

Upon further consideration Wills, J., held that the measure of damages was the highest prices of the shares between the date of the wrongful closing of the account and the settling day.

The defendants appealed.

J. Lawson Walton, K.C., and Herbert Reed, K.C. (H. Kisch with them), for the defendants.—When the defendants gave the plaintiff notice that they were going to sell the shares and close the account unless further cover was provided, and upon further cover not being provided, sold the shares, the contract was finally determined. By the sale of the shares the defendants released the jobbers from their obligation under the contract, and the contract with all its incidents was gone. There was at that time a final breach of the contract, and the plaintiff was bound to assess his damages upon the basis of the prices of the shares at that date. If this basis were taken, there would be no damages. Secondly, if the defendants' contention was wrong upon that, the settling day was the date for ascertaining the damages. The plaintiff was entitled to have the shares delivered to him on that day. If the plaintiff elected to treat the contract as still alive, it was alive for all purposes, including the obligation to give the defendants instructions to sell the shares at an intermediate date. Not having done so he could not claim damages on the basis of the highest prices ruling during the period in question, but could only claim damages on the basis of the prices on the settling day when the shares should have been delivered. It was not like the case of a continuous obligation to deliver shares.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and A. J. David (W. Carnelley with him), for the plaintiff, were not called upon on the first point.*

* Upon the second point an agreement as to the amount of damages was arrived at between the parties, without prejudice to the right of the defendants to appeal to the House of Lords, both upon the question whether there should not be a new trial, and also upon the question whether the damages should not be assessed upon the basis of the first contention of the defendants above set out.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action brought by a client against a firm of stockbrokers alleging that the defendants had agreed to carry over certain shares, which they had bought for him on the London Stock Exchange, from the mid-May to the end of May settlement, and that the defendants had broken that agreement by wrongfully selling the shares and thus closing the account before the end of May settlement. The defendants denied the agreement and the breach. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and this court refused to grant a new trial, my brother Mathew dissenting. Then comes this appeal before us from the decision of Wills, J., as to the proper measure of damages.

The points argued before Wills, J., were, I suppose, the same as those which have been argued before us. It was contended that the defendants having without instructions closed the account a day or two after they had agreed to carry over the shares, that was a final breach by the defendants of their undertaking; and that, inasmuch as the breach resulted in releasing the jobbers, with whom they had contracted, from the obligation to buy or sell the shares, that for some reason or other altered the right of the plaintiff to elect whether he would or would not treat the repudiation as a final breach, and as the only breach of which he was entitled to take advantage. In other words, the argument was that the plaintiff had no option to say that he would wait until the date fixed for performance of the contract, but that the damages must be assessed upon the footing that the contract was rescinded on the day of the wrongful sale.

The general rule of law in regard to what has been called an anticipatory breach of contract going to the whole consideration for the contract is this: An announcement by one party to a contract that he will not perform it—that is, a declaration by him, so so far as he is concerned, of his intention then and there to rescind it, does not of itself amount to a breach of contract or a rescission of it. The two parties must rescind. But the effect of the wrongful repudiation is to entitle the other party to adopt that repudiation, and to treat the contract as at an end, except for the purpose of bringing an action upon it to recover damages for the breach. He may, however, treat the notice of intention as inoperative, and may hold the other party to the contract. Unless he elects to treat the contract as rescinded he can call upon the other party to perform it. That rule was stated by Cockburn, C.J., in Frost v. Knight, 20 W. R. 471, L. R. 7 Ex. 111, and by Keating, J., in Roper v. Johnson, 21 W. R. 384, L. R. 8 C. P. 167, as well as by Lord Esher in Johnstone v. Milling, 34 W. R. 238, 16 Q. B. D. 460, at p. 467. In Roper v. Johnson the point arose because the plaintiff, by bringing the action before the expiration of the time for the performance of the contract must be taken to have tied himself to the repudiation as a final determination of the contract. The rule does not apply where the plaintiff has not so tied himself. In the present case the action was not brought until after the day fixed for the performance of the contract, and upon the defendants giving the plaintiff notice that they were going to close the account the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendants insisting upon their performing the contract on the date fixed for performance. In my opinion the contention that the plaintiff must measure his damages on the date of the wrongful closing of the account, and that on that basis the plaintiff would only be entitled to nominal damages, cannot, upon the decisions above referred to, be sustained.

There was a contention put forward by the plaintiff, which was adopted by Wills, J., that, as the plaintiff had a right at any time to call upon the defendants to sell the shares during the account, the measure of damages must be based upon the highest prices of the shares between the wrongful closing of the account and the end of May settlement. The defendants had an alternative contention, on the assumption that they were wrong upon the first point—namely, that the prices ruling on the day when the contract ought to have been performed was the proper measure of damages. As between these two contentions a compromise has been arrived at. We think that the first point taken for the defendants is bad, and we give our decision upon that point only. We have accordingly only to give judgment for the damages to be assessed in accordance with the agreement arrived at between the parties.

BARTELL v. W. GRAY & CO (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Factory"—Painting ship in dock——"Undertakers"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), s. 23—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

The respondents contracted with shipowners to do the painting and plumbing work on one of their ships which was lying in a wet dock, and which was being fitted out for a voyage. The applicant, who was in the employment of the respondents, was sent with other men to do the work, and was engaged on the painting work when he was injured by an accident. The shipowners were in charge of the ship with part of the crew on board, but the respondents were in possession of the ship as far as was necessary for the work to be done. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge made an award in favour of the applicant.

Held, that there was evidence upon which the county court judge could find that the applicant was injured while employed in a factory, in respect of which the respondents were the undertakers, and that therefore he was entitled to compensation.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Bow County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a ship painter, and was in the employment of Gray & Co. The steamship Tongariro, belonging to the New Zealand Shipping Co., was lying at a wharf in the Royal Albert Docks and was being fitted up as a transport. Gray & Co., who were contractors for the line for painting and plumbing, had contracted to do the painting and plumbing work in the ship, and they sent their men with the materials to the dock to do the work on board the ship. They did not hire any part of the dock for this purpose. It was stated in evidence that the shipping company were in charge of the ship with part of the crew on board, and that Gray & Co. were in possession of the ship as far as was necessary for the work to be done. The applicant was injured by an accident while painting the booby hatch.

The county court judge made an award in favour of the applicant for 17s. 6d. a week.

The employers appealed.

A. Powell, for the employers.—"Undertakers" in respect of a factory must, by section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, be the occupiers thereof within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895, and by section 23 of the Act of 1895 the person having the actual use or occupation of a dock, quay, or wharf is to be deemed the occupier of a factory. A person having the actual use or occupation of a ship in a dock or at a wharf may be the "undertakers": Raine v. Jobson, 49 W. R. 705, [1901] A. C. 404. There can however, be only one person having the "actual use or occupation" of a factory. He is the person who is liable to the provisions of the Factory Acts as to penalties and other matters. It is not necessary to say that exclusive use or occupation is essential; the general control will do. The appellants had not the general control of the ship; the shipowners had the general control by having their crew on board. The appellants were merely the contractors for painting the ship, and had not the general control of the ship so as to make them the occupiers of a factory. In Merrill v. Wilson, 49 W. R. 161, [1901] 1 K. B. 35, and Raine v. Jobson the undertakers had the general control of the ship or dock. The appellants were, therefore, not liable.

He also referred to Low v. Abernethy & Co., 2 Ct. Sess. Cas., 5th series, 722; Francis v. Turner Brothers, 48 W. R. 228, [1900] 1 Q. B. 478.

Ruegg, K.C., and Chester Jones, for the applicant.—There was evidence upon which the county court judge was justified in finding that the appellants had the actual use or occupation of the ship for the purpose of carrying out their work. It is clear that the use or occupation need not be exclusive. Raine v. Jobson is in point.

They also referred to Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co. v. Peters, 1 Ct. Sess. Cas., 5th series, 786.

A. Powell replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. The county court judge has found that the applicant was entitled to an award, and he arrived at that decision by coming to certain conclusions of fact, two of which must have been that the deceased man was injured in a "factory," and that the employers were the "undertakers" in respect thereof. It was contended that the award cannot stand, because there was no evidence that the employers were the occupiers of a factory, and that therefore they were the undertakers. The questions, therefore, accordingly are whether the place can be described as a factory, and, if so, whether the employers can be called the undertakers in respect of it? If there was evidence upon those points we cannot disturb the award. The facts are that a transport was being made ready for a voyage, and the employers were described in the evidence as doing the painting and plumbing work, and as "contractors for the line for painting and plumbing." They had contracted to do the painting and plumbing work on the ship on the occasion in question. That seems to point to a contract on a large scale to do all the painting and plumbing work in the ship. The applicant was employed at the time in painting the booby hatch, and was injured by an accident while so employed. There is nothing to suggest that the contract which the employers undertook was confined to the painting of the booby hatch. I understand that it was a contract to paint the whole of the ship, and the painting of the booby hatch was part of the work included in the contract. The ship was in a dock, and therefore the person in occupation of the ship would be in occupation of the dock, or of a part thereof capable of being limited and defined in regard to space. He would therefore be the occupier of a "factory" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. By section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, the person having the actual use or occupation of a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, or of any premises within the same, or forming part thereof, and the person so using any such machinery shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory. That section is swept into the section of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, defining "factory" and "undertakers." In dealing with a dock one must look at this section of the Act of 1895 to see if the case is brought within the Act of 1897, and if the employers are the undertakers. The words in the section "having the actual use or occupation" are followed by the words "and the person so using any such machinery," and this seems to me of some importance as showing what is the nature of the use that is sufficient. It is clear from the decision in Raine v. Jobson that a person working on a ship in a dock is working in a factory. The decision in Flowers v. Chambers, 47 W. R. 513, was overruled by Raine v. Jobson. Therefore the applicant, who was working in a ship in a dock, was working in a factory.

The next question is whether the employers were the undertakers in respect of that factory. That depends upon whether they had the actual use or occupation of the ship, and therefore of the dock, or a defined part of it. No one can say that persons who are painting a ship in a dock are not making use of the dock. There was abundant evidence that the employers had the actual use of the dock or of a defined part of it for the purpose of carrying on their operations. As was pointed out in Merrill v. Wilson, the use or occupation need not be exclusive. Merrill v. Wilson shows that in determining whether there is actual use or occupation the tribunal must look at the subject-matter with which it is dealing. It is obvious that the use or occupation of a dock or wharf may be different from the use or occupation of other subject-matters. There may be a use or occupation by others, and at the same time the special use or occupation of the particular individual is not interfered with. The decision in Merrill v. Wilson seems to me to cut the ground from under the contention of the employers, that the shipowner, by occupying the ship with his crew on board. displaced the occupation of the employers. I agree that one must first constitute the place a factory, and in determining that question, one cannot divorce from the idea of a factory all notion of a defined limit in regard to space. In this case the whole ship was handed over to the employers for certain purposes, which were not inconsistent with the use of the ship by other persons for other purposes. The employers were therefore the undertakers; at any rate there was evidence upon which the county court judge was justified in so holding. It would be a most unfortunate result if a workman employed directly by the shipowners could claim compensation, while he could not if he were employed by a contractor who had undertaken to do all the work in the ship. That would be a very refined construction to place upon the Act. The appeal therefore fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree. There are two questions to be determined: first, whether the ship, which was in a dock, is a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and secondly, whether the employers are the undertakers in respect of that factory.

With reference to the first point, after the decision of the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson, I feel no difficulty. A dock is a factory, and the ship was lying in a dock. It was pointed out by the Lord Chancellor in that case that the Act of 1897 does not intend to deal with the relation between shipowners and seamen when engaged in their ordinary occupation at sea, but he goes on to point out that it does not follow that, when a ship is brought into a dock and work is being done in the ship, and an accident happens there, the immunity given to the ship while at sea is therefore extended to the dock in which the ship is placed. The moment the ship is in a dock the liability attaches, and it is not necessary that the shipowner should be in exclusive possession of the dock, because, as was pointed out in Merrill v. Wilson, it is sufficient if there are definite premises in the dock of which the shipowner has the actual use or occupation. Therefore the ship was a factory within the Act.

Upon the second question I confess that I have felt considerable difficulty, but the case really resolves itself into this: Is there any evidence upon which the county court judge could reasonably find that the employers had the actual use or occupation of the dock or a portion thereof within the meaning of the Act. The employers were doing the painting and plumbing work in the ship necessary to fit her out as a transport. They had contracted for that work, and had sent their own workmen to the ship. They were in possession of the ship as far as was necessary for the work they had to do. The only other evidence upon this point was that the shipowners were in charge of the ship with part of the crew on board. I think that there was evidence upon which the judge could hold that the employers had such a use or occupation of the ship as made them undertakers within the meaning of the Act. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

BUSH v. HAWES. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Sub-contractor—Work ancillary to the business of the undertakers—Erection of iron roof—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 4.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the respondent had contracted to build a boiler-house, and that the deceased workman was in the employment of a firm who had sub-contracted with the respondent to erect an iron roof to the boiler-house. The county court judge found, as a fact, that the erection of an iron roof was not part of the respondent's business, but, on a consideration of the character of the business as it was generally carried on, he found that such work was not merely ancillary to the respondent's business.

Held, that the finding of the county court judge was conclusive to show that the work was merely ancillary to the respondent's business, and therefore the respondent was not liable under section 4 of the Act, the case coming within the exemption contained in the last paragraph of the section.

Knight v. Cubitt & Co., ante, p. 113, [1902] 1 K. B. 31, distinguished.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Norwich County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a dependant of a workman who had been accidentally killed in the course of his employment.

The deceased workman was a builder's labourer, and at the time of the accident he was in the employment of Hadley & Co., who had contracted to do part of a work which had been undertaken by the respondent. The work undertaken by the respondent was the erection of a boiler-house and shaft. The work sub-contracted for by Hadley & Co. was the making and erection of an iron roof to the boiler-house. The proceedings were taken against the respondent under section 4 of the Act.

The points taken on behalf of the respondent were—first, that the building did not exceed thirty feet in height as required by section 7; secondly, that the respondent could not be made liable under section 4, because the sub-contract was for work which was "merely ancillary or incidental to" the trade or business carried on by the undertaker, within the meaning of the proviso in the last paragraph of that section.

The evidence with regard to the second point was that it was no part of the respondent's business to construct or erect such an iron roof as was put up by Hadley & Co.

The county court judge found that the building did not exceed thirty feet in height, and on that ground he held that the applicant was not entitled to compensation. But he also held, in the applicant's favour, that the case was not within the proviso to section 4. He was of opinion that, though the construction of an iron roof and placing it in position was not part of the trade or business of the respondent, he ought to take into consideration the character of the business as it was generally carried on, and on that ground he found that the putting up of the iron roof formed part of the trade or business of the respondent within the meaning of the section, and was not merely ancillary thereto.

The applicant appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the respondent.

W. M. Thompson, for the applicant.

F. Low, for the respondent.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that the cross-appeal should be allowed. The deceased workman was in the employment of sub-contractors, who had been employed by a builder to put an iron roof on a boiler-house which he was building. In order to make good a claim for compensation against the builder, it is necessary that the case should be brought within section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which makes the undertakers liable in the case of sub-contracts. The section, however, contains a proviso, which says that the section "shall not apply to any contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work which is merely ancillary or incidental to, and is no part of or process in, the trade or business carried on by such undertakers respectively." The test of the undertaker's liability is whether the work is a part of or a process in his trade or business. The county court judge found as a fact that the construction of an iron roof and placing it in position was not a part of the respondent's trade or business. But then he went on to consider whether such work was generally undertaken by builders. I think that was a mistake. His finding of fact was such as to negative the application of the section. In the case of Knight v. Cubitt & Co., ante, p. 113, [1902] 1 K. B. 31, we held that the county court judge was justified on the evidence in finding that the work of demolishing a house was part of the business of the respondents, and not merely ancillary thereto. Here the county court judge, having found that the putting up an iron roof was not part of the business of the respondent, was wrong in holding that it was not merely ancillary. The respondent thus has a good answer to the claim, and it is unnecessary to consider the applicant's appeal.

In re FERGUSSON'S TRUST. (a.)

Will — Construction — Foreign law — Next-of-kin — Whole and half blood—Next-of-kin of a German subject.

The expression next-of-kin means, in English law, the nearest blood relations in an ascending and descending line, whether of the whole or half blood, and this construction will be placed on that expression in the will of an English testator giving a legacy to the next-of-kin of a legatee who is a subject of a foreign state, under the law of which relations of the half blood are not deemed next-of-kin.

This was a summons to determine what persons were entitled to a legacy which, in the events which had happened, had passed to persons described in the will giving the legacy, as the "next-of-kin" of a German lady.

The facts of the case were as follow:

By his will Mr. Frederick E. M. Fergusson, of 18, Gardiner's-lane, Calcutta, bequeathed certain legacies in the following words: "To Miss Adelaide Montriose, of Worthing, Essex, 4 per cent. promissory notes for rupees five thousand; to my niece Minnie Koppe, of 4, Market-street, Hamburgh, Germany, Government 4 per cent. promissory notes for rupees six thousand and five hundred, to Miss Frances Margaret Evans Cragg, of Cardiff in Wales, daughter of the late William Cragg, of Calcutta, Government 4 per cent. promissory notes for rupees three thousand. And I declare that in the case of the death of the before-named legatees in my lifetime such legacies shall not lapse, but shall be divided amongst the next-of-kin of such deceased legatee or in default of any next-of-kin, shall fall into the residue of my estate." And the testator appointed the Administrator-General of Bengal executor.

The testator died on the 1st of October, 1898, and his will was proved by his executor on the 2nd of January, 1899, at Fort William, in Bengal.

Minnie Koppe died on the 13th of June, 1897,

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

in Hamburgh, a domiciled German. Her husband, Mr. D. A. Koppe, predeceased her.

At the time of her decease Minnie Koppe's next-of-kin according to English law was her half-sister. According to German law her next-of-kin was her nephews and nieces, the children of a deceased sister. A claim was also put forward by the children of D. A. Koppe by a former marriage. The executor took the opinion of a German lawyer and the fund was paid into court.

A. H. Jessel, for the nephews and nieces of Minnie Koppe.—Next-of-kin means nearest of blood kin in German law, and only includes the whole blood. There is no direct authority, but gifts to children are analogous. If a gift is made to the children of A., a German, in this case children born out of wedlock, but legitimized by the subsequent marriage of the parent, will take: In re Goodman's Trusts, 28 W. R. 902, 17 Ch. D. 266; In re Andros, 32 W. R. 30, 24 Ch. D. 637; In re Grey's Trusts, 41 W. R. 60, [1892] 3 Ch. 88.

Baynes, for other parties.—The word "next-of-kin" is not a technical expression except when it is used in connection with the Statute of Distributions.

Cann, for half-sister of Minnie Koppe.—"Next-of-kin" is a technical expression. The testator must be considered to have intended to use it in its technical sense. Next-of-kin is a technical term, and includes relations both of the whole and the half blood. The cases on the word children have no application here. The will is the will of an Englishman and must be construed according to English law.

Borthwick, for the trustees of the will.

Jessel replied.

BYRNE, J.—In this case a domiciled Englishman made his will and gave to his niece Minnie Koppe a legacy, and the testator declared that in case of the death of the legatee in his lifetime that the legacy should not lapse but should be divided among the next-of-kin of the deceased legatee. Mrs. Koppe died in the testator's lifetime a domiciled German subject. The question arises as to who are her next-of-kin. German law does not recognize relations by the half blood as next-of-kin. So far as the construction of the words in the will go, the case is governed by the law of England. What, then, is the true construction of the words next-of-kin of such deceased legatee. They mean to be equally divided among the blood relations of the deceased, they taking as joint tenants, and the half blood to take equally with those of the whole blood. It is said that I must say that the words "next-of-kin" standing alone mean blood relations, and also that I must ask who are the nearest blood relations according to German law. For this view the cases In re Goodman's Trusts and In re Andros are principally relied on. These cases established that when there is a gift to children the status of the children must be determined according to the law of domicil. And it is said that in the present case, there being a gift to next-of-kin, that I must ask what persons are next-of-kin, according to German law. It is said that the question, "Who are the next-of-kin?" is one of status. Now, if the question is one of a status, it may be determined according to foreign law, and persons who may have the status of children according to that law, though not under English law, may oust the persons entitled to take under English law. I am now asked to put an interpretation on the word "next-of-kin" used by the testator. The word, however, is simply "next-of-kin." There is no reference to the Statute of Distributions. I see no reason on the authorities why I ought to construe this word "next-of-kin" according to German law. "Next-of-kin" here means the next-of-kin according to English law, and that means the nearest blood relations in an ascending and decending line, questions of legitimacy and such matters may, if necessary, be considered.

His lordship declared that the persons entitled to the legacy in the events which had happened were those who were nearest of kin to Minnie Koppe in an ascending and descending scale according to English law.

WALES v. CARR. (a.)

Mortgage—Costs—Price of redemption—Costs of preparing mortgage deed—Costs of application.

The costs of preparing a mortgage deed, investigating title, and paying stamp duty and survey fees, which are not paid at the time of the completion of the mortgage, are not mortgagee's costs which can be added to the price of redemption. They form a simple contract debt between the mortgagor and the mortgagee.

Action without pleadings.

The plaintiffs were transferees of a second mortgage who redeemed the defendants, the first mortgagees. The costs of preparing the mortgage deed, including a survey fee and the stamp duty on the mortgage deed, amounting to £28, were not paid at the time of the execution of the mortgage. The defendants' solicitor had obtained a judgment against the mortgagor for this amount but such judgment was not satisfied.

Upon the plaintiffs seeking to redeem the defendants' mortgage the defendants claimed to add to the price of redemption these costs. The plaintiffs objected, but finally paid the money under protest and brought this action, in which they sought a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to charge or claim the above costs, and an order for the repayment of the sum to the plaintiffs. The point was raised in this way by agreement between the parties.

Earle, for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to redeem without paying these costs, which are not ordinary mortgagees' costs. Even if the case is not covered by authority we are right on principle. These costs are not included in the list of costs payable on foreclosure in Seton on Decrees: see Fisher on Mortgages, p. 897, s. 1899. The point has seldom arisen because as a rule the mortgagee does not part with his money until these costs have been paid.

He quoted Gregg v. Slater, 4 W. R. 381, 22 Beav. 314; Wyatt v. Cook, [1868] W. N. 237; and distinguished National Provincial Bank v. Games, 34 W. R. 600, 31 Ch. D. 582; Ex parte Firth, In re Cowburn, 30 W. R. 529, 19 Ch. D. 419.

Cozens-Hardy, for the defendants.—When the mortgage was completed the mortgagee's solicitors' costs are a debt recoverable by the mortgagee from the mortgagor and are part of the costs recoverable under and by virtue of the mortgage. Gregg v. Slater has now been altered by the Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 25). When the mortgage has been completed there is an implied contract by the mortgagor to indemnify the mortgagee, and that enables the mortgagee perhaps to sue the mortgagor, or at any rate to make such costs part of the price of redemption.

He referred to Cordery on Solicitors, 71; the report of Wyatt v. Cook, in 3 L. J. Notes of Cases, 237; Nicholson v. Jeyes, 1 W. R. 274, 278, 22 L. J. Ch. 833; Ex parte Fewings, In re Sneyd, 32 W. R. 352, 25 Ch. D. 338; Ashburner on Mortgages, 304; Robbins on Mortgages, vol. 2., 1191.

FARWELL, J.—This is an application by the transferees of a second mortgage who have redeemed the first mortgage, and must be treated as a redemption action. The costs in question, amounting to about £28, were incurred in or about the preparation of the mortgage deed. These are costs which the mortgagee would be entitled to recover from the mortgagor at common law, if and when he has paid them, by virtue of their relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee. Sir George Jessel, in Ex parte Firth, In re Cowburn, in the presence of two distinguished common law who would not have let it pass if incorrect, judges, and it seems to me to be perfectly correct, said: "There is a great distinction between a sum of money being advanced on the terms of the lender paying out of it a debt due by the borrower to a third person, a portion of that sum being handed back again to the lender or handed over by him to another person who is a creditor of the borrower, and a sum of money being retained for that which is not truly a debt until after the transaction itself is completed—that is, a sum of money which consists of the expenses of the transaction itself. When a mortgage is completed, the mortgagor is liable to pay to the mortgagee the expenses incident to the mortgage transaction. The mortgagee is primarily liable to his own solicitor for those expenses. The mortgagor is liable to pay over to the mortgagee what he pays his own solicitor, but there is no debt until the transaction is completed," 19 Ch. D., at p. 427. The Master of the Rolls is there using technical terms of the common law in their strict sense.

These are costs against which the mortgagor is liable to indemnify the mortgagee after the mortgage has been completed. These are costs in no way included in the mortgage deed itself. The mortgagee's costs properly so called, if he sued in common law or Chancery, were included in the mortgage debt. They were certain costs, the payment of which in Chancery always formed one of the terms of redemption, and the court allowed redemption only on that term among others.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, called my attention to Ex parte Fewings, In re Sneyd, 32 W. R. 352, 25 Ch. D. 338. But the position in that case was quite different to bringing in these costs as part of the price of redemption, see 25 Ch. D., at p. 352, where Cotton, L J., says: "If the debtor, in his character of mortgagor, claimed to redeem the mortgage, the court would not grant him that which originally was an indulgence, a departure from the strict term of his legal right, without imposing upon him the condition of paying the mortgagee, not only the debt which he had contracted to pay by his covenant, but any expenses which had been properly incurred by the mortgagee in his position as such. But that is an entirely different thing from saying that an action of debt could be maintained by the mortgagee against the mortgagor for those expenses. It is said that a mortgagee's right in a redemption action is founded on an implied contract by the mortgagor to pay these costs, but I am of opinion there is no such contract, but as a condition of redemption that a court of equity imposes on the mortgagor the terms of paying all costs properly incurred by the mortgagee for the purpose of protecting the estate or himself as mortgagee." See also National Provincial Bank of England v. Games. The costs in those cases are those necessarily incidental to the creation of the position of the mortgagee as such, and are included in the inquiry in a foreclosure action as to what is due "under or by virtue of the mortgage security." That inquiry does not include costs due on the implied covenant of indemnity at common law. If this were not so I should be tacking a simple contract debt to the price of redemption, which has always been held inadmissible.

This question does not, in the large majority of cases, arise, because the costs in question are nearly always deducted by the mortgagee before handing over his mortgage loan. Mr. Earle relied on Gregg v. Slater, but from the report of the same case in 2 Jur. N. S. 246, it is clear that it is not a decision in point at all. If I rightly understand what was decided it was that the costs in question were not mortgagee's costs at all. [He also referred to Wyatt v. Cook, [1868] W. N. 79, 237, 3 L. J. Notes of Cases, 237. The report in the Weekly Notes is unintelligible, but from the report in 3 L. J. Notes of Cases it is clear what the point was. It was a case of a catching bargain with an expectant heir which was set aside. In the Court of Appeal the mortgagor offered to pay the costs, so that no decision was required or given on this point. Another case which was quoted, and seemed to me to have no applicability, was Nicholson v. Jeyes. That was a case of an administration suit of which the costs were to be raised by mortgage. Knight-Bruce, L.J., in that case said: "I consider the mortgagee must have all his reasonable costs to which, according to the usual practice out of court, he, as mortgagee, would be entitled." There was in fact in that case no mortgagor, the court had directed the mortgage to be executed and there could be no question of an implied contract. Turner, L.J., says: "As the order has directed that the mortgagee shall have his costs, charges, and expenses, the words 'including his reasonable and proper charges of settling the security' may be added." The Lord Justice clearly thought that costs, charges, and expenses were not necessarily sufficient, so he suggested the addition of words wide enough to cover the costs of preparation of the mortgage deed.

These costs are recoverable immediately on the execution of the mortgage deed and the distinction between these and other costs is clear. The mortgagee cannot charge against the mortgagor on his security the costs of preparing the mortgage deed which he might recover under his implied contract with the mortgagor.

Cozens-Hardy.—This is a redemption action, and the point which I have raised was not frivolous, but open to considerable argument and doubt. I, therefore, am entitled to costs. The point was raised in this way in order to save expense.

Earle.—The point was raised in this way by agreement. The defendants would not let us redeem without paying these costs, which we did under protest. I claim that I ought to have costs as I have been held right.

FARWELL, J.—The mortgagee is nearly always entitled to his costs in a redemption action. The point was here left open by agreement, and brought on cheaply and quickly, but it was still necessarily part of the redemption action, and the mortgagees are entitled to their costs.

IRELAND v. HART. (a.)

Company—Transfer of shares—Registration—Equitable title—Priority.

The decisions in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, 34 W. R. 662, 11 App. Cas. 20, and Moore v. North-Western Bank, 40 W. R. 93, [1891] 2 Ch. 599, establish that—where the articles of association of a company provide that the transferor shall be deemed to be the holder of such shares until the name of the transferee is entered in the register in respect thereof, and that every instrument of transfer shall be left at the office of the company for registration, accompanied by the certificate of the shares to be transferred and such other evidence as the company may require to prove the title of the transferor or his right to transfer the shares—the mere leaving of such transfer and the certificate of shares at the office of the company, before the company had notice of any prior equitable claim to the shares, is not sufficient to give the legal title to the transferee so as to oust the prior equitable owner, and is not of itself sufficient to give the transferee a "present absolute unconditional right" to the shares.

Witness action.

The plaintiff, Lucy Eveline Ireland, a married woman, was entitled to 180 shares in a company called Samuel Kidd & Co. (Limited), as her separate estate.

In the year 1900 she transferred them into the name of her husband, the defendant H. C. Ireland, in order to give him the right to attend and vote at the meetings of the company, and he became the registered holder; this transfer was for only a nominal consideration.

The defendant H. C. Ireland, the plaintiff's husband, was a solicitor. The defendant Hart was an accountant, who for several years had audited the defendant Ireland's books, and afterwards practically kept them.

Early in 1901 the defendant Ireland was in need of money, and negotiations took place between him and Hart as to a loan, and it was eventually agreed between them that Hart should advance the defendant Ireland the sum of £500 on the security of certain shares which Ireland had in a company called "Homocea (Limited)," of certain money which was owing to the defendant Ireland, and on the shares in Samuel Kidd & Co. (Limited). Hart did not know that these shares were held by Ireland as trustee for his wife. Hart advanced a part of the money at various times before March. On the 4th of March the defendant Ireland wrote to him regarding the shares in Samuel Kidd & Co. (Limited): "I enclose blank transfer forms . . . I hope . . . you may be able to arrange on enclosed."

The transfers were executed under seal by the defendant Ireland, but the consideration and the name of the transferee were left blank. The certificates of the shares were also sent to Hart.

On the 6th of March Hart acknowledged the receipt of the transfer, and the same day paid the balance of the loan on the security of the blank transfer. The plaintiff, Mrs. Ireland, knew nothing of this transaction.

In November, 1901, Hart, not being satisfied with his security, proceeded to perfect it by registering the shares in his own name. He therefore filled in the transfer in his own name, and filled in the consideration as £100, and on the 23rd of November he sent the transfers to the company's office for registration. The articles of association of the company with regard to transfers were as follows: "Article 30. The instrument of transfer of any share should be signed by both the transferor and the transferee, and the transferor shall be deemed to remain the holder of such share until the name of the transferee is entered in the register in respect thereof. Article 31. The instrument of transfer of any share is to be in writing in the usual common form, or in a following form, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit. Article 33. Every instrument of transfer shall be left at the office for registration, accompanied by the certificate of the shares to be transferred and such other evidence as the company may require to prove the title of the transferor or his right to transfer the shares." The value of these shares was about £900.

On the 26th of November, in consequence of the small consideration entered in the transfer, the managing director called on the defendant Ireland, who told him that Hart had no right to register the shares, and asked to have the registration postponed for a time. The managing director agreed to that, and on the same day the defendant Ireland wrote to him a letter containing the same request. The ordinary meeting of the directors of the company was on the 27th of November. At the meeting the managing director told the other directors what had taken place, but the transfer was not formally submitted to the board, and the register was not altered. On the same day the plaintiff Mrs. Ireland issued the writ in this action claiming a declaration that those shares which stood in the company's books in the name of the defendant Ireland were held by him in trust for her, and that the deed purporting to be a transfer of those shares by the defendant Ireland should be delivered up to be cancelled. On the same day an interim injunction was obtained restraining the transfer of these shares.

Hughes, K.C., and C. T. Mitchell, for the plaintiff.—The defendant Hart has no legal title, and the plaintiff's equitable one must prevail, for there is no legal title in the shares until registration. And Hart has not, as between himself and the company, an absolute and unconditional right to be registered as shareholder: Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, 34 W. R. 662, 11 App. Cas. 20; Roots v. Williamson, 36 W. R. 758, 38 Ch. D. 485.

S. C. M. Goodman, for the defendant.—Hart's title to these shares ousts the plaintiff's equitable title, as he had, between himself and the company, a present unconditional right to have the transfer registered. Hart had obtained the transfer, and he obtained an absolute right to have it registered when he sent it with the certificate to the company's office. This is a higher right than the plaintiff's equitable one. Roots v. Williamson is distinguishable, as there all the formalities necessary for registration had not been complied with. Here nothing has been left undone to perfect the registration except the clerical act of putting Hart's name on the register: Moore v. North-Western Bank, 40 W. R. 93, [1891] 2 Ch. 599.

Mitchell, in reply.—The plaintiff's is the prior equity and must prevail unless Hart can show that he has the legal title. This he cannot do as he has not been registered. Entry on the register is a condition precedent: In re Florence Land and Public Works Co., Nicol's case, 29 Ch. D. 421, 33 W. R. Dig. 40. There was no unnecessary delay on the part of the company in registering (In re Joint Stock Discount Co., Shepherd's case, 15 W. R. 26, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 16), and Hart had no right to compel the company to register the transfer, and when once the company had received notice of the plaintiff's title it would have been improper for them to have done so. Société Générale de Paris v. Tramways Union Co., 14 Q. B. D. 424, at p. 453, 33 W. R. Dig. 44.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 20.—JOYCE, J., after stating the facts, continued: Now in my opinion the board of directors were not bound to register that transfer at the meeting of the 27th. It is well settled that, although directors might have no power to refuse to register a transfer, they were entitled to have a reasonable time after the transfer was made in order to make inquiries for the purpose of finding out if the transfer was in order, but after being satisfied on this point they would be bound at their next meeting to register the transfer. But I consider that, after what had taken place on that date, the directors were not bound to pass the transfer at that meeting. At all events they did not pass the transfer. In my opinion an application made under section 35 on the 27th of November to register the transfer could not have succeeded.

The cases—Société Generalé v. Walker and Moore v. North-Western Bank—establish that where the articles are in the form in which they are in the present case, a legal title is not acquired as against an equitable owner before registration, or at all events until the date when the person seeking to register has a present absolute and unconditional right to have the transfer registered. I am not here to give the absolute meaning of that "present absolute and unconditional right," but, as it appears to me, I am not sure that anything short of registration would do except under very special circumstances. At all events, I am of opinion that in this case, prior to the date of the injunction the defendant Hart had not a present absolute and unconditional right to the registration of the transfer of these shares, and that the prior equitable right of the plaintiff, Mrs. Ireland, must prevail. And although I think the plaintiff has the equitable title, which title must prevail, under the circumstances I think each side must pay their own costs.

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Mortgage—Negotiating fee—General Order under Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, Schedule I., Part I., r. 11—Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 25), s. 2.

A solicitor lent a client a sum of money on mortgage of real property. Subsequently he sent the client a bill, which included a fee for negotiating the mortgage.

Held, that, the solicitor having arranged and obtained the mortgage, he was entitled to the fee.

This was a summons to vary the certificate of the taxing-master, who had disallowed a fee charged by a solicitor, Norris, for negotiating a mortgage.

It appeared that Norris had arranged for the payment up of a sum of money raised on mortgage of some property by a client, and had himself advanced the necessary sum, subsequently taking a mortgage on the property.

The taxing-master disallowed the fee for negotiating the mortgage on the ground that Norris could not negotiate with himself.

Stokes, for the plaintiff, referred to the case of In re Macgowan, 39 W. R. 227, [1891] 1 Ch. 105.

Gatey, for the defendant, argued that where a solicitor himself lent money as mortgagee he could not charge the negotiating fee unless he has a partner whom he negotiates with.

He quoted In re Eley, 36 W. R. 96, 37 Ch. D. 40.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—It has first been contended that Norris did not "arrange and obtain the loan" within the meaning of rule 11 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, which states that "As to a mortgagee's solicitor it [the scale] shall only apply to cases where he arranges and obtains the loan from a person for whom he acts." For a moment let me omit the consideration of the last words "from a person for whom he acts."

The property comprised in the mortgage deed was previously mortgaged. Norris arranged for the payment of the money due under this mortgage, advanced the money for the purpose, and discussed the matter with his client.

Further, it is not disputed that the terms of the loan were correctly stated in the deed. I have therefore no difficulty in finding on the facts that Norris did "arrange and obtain" the loan.

To return to the rule, the loan must be arranged and obtained from a person for whom the solicitor acts. But since the Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895, a solicitor who negotiates a loan is entitled to the scale fee even though he advances the money himself. On this the defendant contends that the statute does not apply to the case of a solicitor not in partnership who arranges a loan with himself and obtains the loan from himself, for he cannot be said "to arrange and obtain a loan from a person for whom he acts."

In my opinion that is much too narrow a construction to put on the statute. Section 2 provides that "any solicitor to whom either alone or jointly with any other person a mortgage is made, or the firm of which such a solicitor is a member, shall be entitled to receive for all business transacted and acts done by such solicitor or firm in negotiating the loan, deducing and investigating the title to the property, and preparing and completing the mortgage, all such usual professional charges and remuneration as he or they would have been entitled to receive if such mortgage had been made to a person not a solicitor and such person had retained and employed such solicitor or firm to transact such business and do such acts."

Suppose Norris had not himself advanced the money, but had been retained by a third person to do so, would he have been entitled to charge this fee? In my opinion, from the facts before me, he would clearly be entitled to do so. And the statute says that, the mortgage being made to the solicitor alone, he is to be entitled to the remuneration he would have been paid had he been acting for a third person. It follows that he is entitled to receive the fee. Any other construction will not give effect to the words of section 2, "Either alone or jointly with any other person." For these reasons the summons to vary the certificate will be allowed with costs.

WISE (Appellant) v. DUNNING (Respondent). (a.)

Justices—Public meetings—Insulting language—Apprehended breach of the peace—Power of justices to bind over.

The appellant had, in addressing meetings in public places, used language abusive of, and insulting to, other persons, and had threatened to hold similar meetings and use similar language in future.

Held, that the natural and probable consequence of such conduct on the part of the appellant would be to occasion breaches of the peace being committed by others, and that the justices had jurisdiction to bind over the appellant in recognizances to be of good behaviour.

This was an appeal from the decision of the stipendiary magistrate of Liverpool, binding over the present appellant George Wise to be of good behaviour for twelve months.

The information preferred by the respondent Dunning, head constable of Liverpool, stated that the said George Wise had held meetings on sundry dates in the month of May on the king's highway and sundry other places to which the public had access and that breaches of the peace had taken place in consequence, and that the said George Wise intended to hold similar meetings in future. The following facts were proved before the stipendiary: The said George Wise had held meetings in Islington-square, Liverpool, a public thoroughfare and part of the king's highway, on the 13th and 16th of May. At these meetings the said George Wise said he was prosecuting each of these meetings as a Protestant crusader. Each of the said meetings was attended by Roman Catholics as well as by supporters of the said George Wise. At that held on the 16th of May, Carver-street (a street running into the Islington-square) was completely blocked. At the meeting held on the 19th of May George Wise said that he intended to denounce the order of Jesuits. He also called them "rednecks," a term which was intended to insult and annoy them, and was well calculated to provoke a breach of the peace. At the meeting held on the 22nd the said George Wise said that he had been informed by letter that the Roman Catholics intended to bring sticks, and that he looked to his supporters to protect him, as the police had refused to do so. The said George Wise admitted the insertion by him of an advertisement in the Liverpool Evening Express on the 24th of May, 1901, inviting Protestants to support Mr. George Wise at a meeting to be held at Islington-square on the following Saturday, and not to allow the Romanists to triumph, but maintain their liberties. The respondent thereupon on the 25th of May lodged an information, similar to the information now in question, but the said George Wise then undertook not to hold the meeting last referred to. Nevertheless he did hold a meeting—not at Islington-square—but in front of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, on the said Saturday following. At this meeting disturbances occurred and many of the police were assaulted and knocked down. The said George Wise did not at any of his meetings commit or threaten to commit a breach of the peace. The said George Wise further stated that he intended to hold such meetings in the future, and as the said respondent Dunning was of opinion that if such meetings were held they would lead to a breach of the peace he lodged the present information against Wise.

The magistrate, at the hearing of the information, bound Wise over to be of good behaviour for twelve months.

The questions now for the opinion of the court were, first, whether the information was good—it being contended that the information did not allege that the applicant had been guilty of any offence; and, secondly, whether it was within the power of the magistrate to bind the appellant over, it being contended that he had not been guilty of any breach of the peace, nor did he intend to commit any.

F. E. Smith, for the appellant Wise.—The magistrate was wrong; Mr. Wise was always within his rights, and Beatty v. Gillbanks, 31 W. R. 277, 9 Q. B. D. 308, shows that in such a case he is not responsible if other people commit illegal acts. The decision in Reg. v. Justices of Londonderry, 28 L. R. Ir. 440, is in conflict with that of Beatty v. Gillbanks. The information discloses no offence committed by the appellants.

Pickford, K.C. (Maxwell with him), for the respondent.—The appellant had committed three offences. First, he had held meetings on the highway; secondly, he used language of an insulting character whereby a breach of the peace might be occasioned, thereby violating the Liverpool Improvement Act, 1842; thirdly, he had used language inciting to a breach of the peace by inviting his supporters to arm themselves. The information discloses sufficient grounds for binding over the appellant; but when the party appears a formal complaint is not necessary: see Reg. v. Hughes, 4 Q. B. D. 614, 29 W. R. Dig. 67.

F. E. Smith in reply.—There was no evidence of obstruction before the magistrates and the local Act was not even cited. The appellant was committing a lawful act, and he was not bound to assume that the natural consequence would be that others would commit unlawful acts: see Stone's Justices' Manual (33rd ed.), p. 724.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case has been extremely well argued, and everything that is possible to be said has been pressed upon us by the appellant, but I have no reason to doubt that the magistrate was perfectly right in binding over Mr. Wise to keep the peace. I do not think that it is necessary to go at great length into the various cases that have been cited before us. We have been much pressed with the case of Beatty v. Gillbanks and the supposed opposition between that case and the Irish cases, O'Kelly v. Harvey, 14 L. R. Ir. 105, 31 W. R. Dig. 100, and Reg. v. Justices of Londonderry, but the whole difficulty arises from the attempt to apply the same decision to a very different set of facts. I entirely agree with the view expressed by Field, J., in Beatty v. Gillbanks: "Now I entirely concede that everyone must be taken to intend the natural consequences of his own acts, and it is clear that if this disturbance of the peace was the natural consequence of acts of the appellants they would be liable, and the justices would have been right in binding them over, but the evidence set forth in the case does not support this contention." O'Brien, C.J., in Reg. v. Justices of Londonderry, said: "No act on the part of any person was proved to show that it was reasonably probable that the action of the defendants would, on the day in question, have provoked a breach of the peace." And in Reg. v. Justices of Cork, 15 Cox C. C. 78, at p. 84, 30 W. R. Dig. 106, May, C.J., said: "This requisition of sureties must be understood rather as a caution against the repetition of the offence than any immediate fine or punishment."

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Again, in the second case of Reg. v. Justices of Cork, reported in the same volume, at p. 149, Fitzgerald, J., after referring to the authorities, said, at p. 155: "Without citing further authority we may assume that where it shall be made reasonably to appear to a justice of the peace that a person has incited others by acts or language to a violation of law and right, and that the delinquent is likely to persevere in that course, such justice has authority by law in the execution of preventive justice to provide for the public security by requiring the individual to give securities for good behaviour, and in default commit him to prison." I have referred to these cases, not for the purpose of deducing any new rule of law, but for the purpose of pointing out that in a number of cases the essential condition has been stated, though in different language, that there must but be an act of the defendant the natural consequences of which, if his act be not unlawful in itself, would be to produce an unlawful act by others. The present case can be put higher. There is an important local statute providing that every person who should use insulting words or behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace might be occasioned, may be summoned, and on conviction fined. In addition, we have here distinct findings of fact that the appellant held a number of meetings; that the highways were blocked by thousands of persons, and that very serious breaches of the peace had arisen; and that the appellant had himself used, with respect to a large body of persons of a different religion, language which the magistrate has found to be of a most insulting character.

Magistrates are only doing their duty in making themselves acquainted with the character of the population amongst whom they have to administer justice; and in considering the natural consequence of a man's acts who has used insulting language towards the people of a particular religion the magistrates are bound to take into consideration that there is a large body of those persons in that town. It was also proved that the appellant had informed the meeting that he had received a letter stating that the Catholics were about to bring sticks, and he asked his supporters to protect him. It may be true that if this case were to be considered with reference to only one of the illegalities which it is alleged the appellant committed, further evidence might be required; but in my opinion there is ample evidence to show that in the public streets he did use language which was abusive, which did tend to bring about a breach of the peace, and which had caused an obstruction, and that he threatened to do similar acts.

The fact that the appellant had promised not to hold a meeting in one place and had held it within a quarter of a mile of that place on the same day shows that the magistrate was justified in taking precautions to prevent a repetition of his previous conduct.

Further, I think that any omission in the language of the information was cured by the evidence which was given. The appellant was represented by a solicitor and elected not to give evidence. I am of opinion that the points of law raised on behalf of the appellant fail, and that the magistrate acted quite rightly.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant calls himself a crusader in order preach a Protestant crusade; he supplies himself with a crucifix and round his neck were hung beads, in obvious imitation of the rosaries used by Roman Catholics. He admittedly made use of expressions most insulting to the Roman Catholics of Liverpool. The natural consequences of these acts was what has happened over and over again, and what must be the inevitable consequence if people, whether Protestants or Roman Catholics, are to be allowed to outrage each other's religion as the appellant outraged the religion of the Roman Catholics of Liverpool. The appellant is best described in the language of Butler. He is one of

> "That stubborn crew
> Of errant saints, whom all men grant
> To be the true Church Militant.
> A sect whose chief devotion lies
> In odd perverse antipathies."—
> HUDIBRAS, Part I.

I think that the natural consequence of this "crusader's" acts has been to produce illegality, and that from his acts and conduct circumstances have arisen which justified the magistrate in binding him over to keep the peace. It is said that the law in Beatty v. Gillbanks is at variance with the law in Reg. v. Justices of Londonderry. I am not sure that it is, but I have no hesitation in saying that if it is I prefer the law in Reg. v. Justices of Londonderry. If that be a right statement of the law, as I think it is, the magistrate was quite right in coming to the decision even without taking into consideration the Act of Parliament to which we have been referred. For those reasons I am of opinion that the magistrate's order was right.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the appellant's counsel that the law does not, as a rule, regard an illegal act as the natural consequence of a temptation to commit it. For instance, a person who exposes goods outside his shop is often said to tempt people to steal them, but that cannot be said to be the natural consequence of his act. Again, the House of Lords has recently held that when a blank space is left in a cheque which enables a person to increase the amount by adding figures, it is not the natural consequence that somebody should be led to commit forgery by writing figures into the cheque. That proposition is correct and really familiar, but I think the cases with respect to apprehended breaches of the peace show that the law does regard the infirmity of human temper to the extent of considering that a breach of the peace, although an illegal act, may be the natural consequence of abusive and insulting language or conduct. Possibly this may be an exception to the rule which the appellant's counsel pointed out to us; but I think it is quite clearly made out on the cases. I therefore think the decision of the magistrate was right.

MACDONALD (Appellant) v. HUGHES (Respondent). (a.)

Licensing law—Licensed person—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 3, 17.

The executor of a deceased licence-holder carrying on the business is himself a licence-holder within the meaning of the Licensing Act, 1872.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondent Margaret Hughes was the executrix of Ann Christina Hughes, who was at the date of her death, the 1st of April, 1901, duly licensed to sell intoxicating liquors at the house known as the Green Lodge, Hoylake, in the county of Chester.

On the 11th of April, 1901, a special sessions for the transfer of licences was held, but this being within fourteen days of the death of Ann Christina Hughes no application for transfer was then made, and the next day appointed for the holding of special sessions was the 6th of June, 1901. The respondent, as executrix, remained in possession and carried on the business.

On the 27th of May several police officers visited the premises and found, as they alleged, that gaming was being carried on on the premises, and the appellant, who was a superintendent of police, accordingly preferred a charge against the respondent under section 77 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

It was contended at the hearing of the information that the respondent was not a licensed person within the meaning of the Act as no licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors had been granted to her.

The justices allowed the objection and dismissed the information, but stated a case.

R. M. Montgomery (Honoratus Lloyd with him), for the appellant.—The respondent held the licence as executrix of the deceased. Section 3 of the Act of 1872 provides "that no penalty shall be incurred by the heirs, executors, or administrators of any licensed person who dies before the expiration of his licence, in respect of the sale of any intoxicating liquor," if such sale take place prior to the then next ensuing special session or (if such session be holden within fourteen days next after the death of the person took place) prior to the special session holden next after such special session as aforesaid." The meaning of this is that the licence is kept alive till the next special sessions. The offences named in section 13 and 18 would not be punishable if the view of the respondent is right.

Tobin, for the respondent.—The licence is issued to the licensee as a personal grant, and as the respondent did not then hold a licence she is not within section 3. The proviso to section 3 gives to the executor protection from penalties, but does not grant him a licence; that is granted him at the special sessions. If the respondent held a licence it could only be that of the deceased, and if that licence was not determined by the death of the testatrix there would be no need for the protection given by section 3 or for the respondent to go to the court under section 14 of the Act of 1898. This is a casus omissus, but the respondent could have been proceeded against under the common law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case we have to consider some words of the Licensing Act, 1872, which have not hitherto been interpreted. The question that we have to decide is whether an executrix in occupation of a licensed house and carrying on the business of the house and selling liquors on the premises may be made subject to penalties for allowing card-playing to take place on the premises as a licensed person; meaning thereby, a person holding a licence as defined by the Licensing Act, 1872. Licence, as defined by section 74 of the Act of 1872, means a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors granted by justices in pursuance of the Act of 1828, and a licensed person means a person holding such licence. That clause must have been inserted with some intention and if the view suggested by Mr. Tobin is right there is not any case in which that clause was needed. In my opinion after the death of a person holding such licence, the licence continues to exist for a certain time provided that the representatives of the licensed person come to the special sessions (held more than fourteen days after the death of the licensed person) for a licence; and the effect of the interpretation clause is that the representative of the deceased licensed person is entitled to act as if she or he were holding the licence. We were much pressed by the argument that if we were to take a contrary view a large number of offences which are provided for in sections 13 to 14 of the Licensing Act, 1872, might be committed with impunity by the representatives of a licensed person. I think that that would be so. In my opinion a person holding the licence till the next special sessions after the death of the licensee is a licensed person within the meaning of the Act, and the case must therefore go back to the magistrates.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the strongest argument against the respondent is the one on which the magistrates most relied on as in her favour—namely, the proviso to section 3 of the Act of 1872. The executor of a deceased licensee is not treated as being an unlicensed person. He holds the licence though he is not the grantee of it. It is important to notice that under section 14 of the Act of 1828 the executor may obtain from the special sessions a licence which is valid for the whole of the rest of the period covered by the old licence. I do not think this is a casus omissus at all, but it seems to me that it is clearly covered by the Act.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree that this appeal must be allowed, but I do not think that the words of the proviso are very clear. It does not say that the operation of the licence is to be extended for a certain time, but that is, I think, what the words mean. The licence continues till the special sessions, and in the meantime the executor holds the premises under the operation of the licence and is therefore a licensed person.

SMITH & SON (Appellants) v. KYLE (Respondent). (a.)

Master and servant—Shop—Young person—Hours of employment—Temporary stall—Shop Hours Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 62), ss. 3, 4, 9.

A temporary board on trestles is not a shop within section 4 of the Shop Hours Act so as to require a notice of the provisions of the Act; but Semble, it is a shop for the purposes of section 3, which regulates the hours of employment.

Case stated by justices.

The appellants were charged by the respondent for having on the 23rd of March failed to exhibit the notices required by section 4 of the Shop Hours Act, 1892, and section 1 of the Shop Hours Act, 1895, at the parish of Merstham, in the county of Surrey.

The following facts were proved at the hearing:

One Albert Boorer, a lad under the age of eighteen years of age, was in the employ of the appellants. He was employed from 6.30 to 10 a.m. at Merstham, and for the rest of the day at Redhill, Merstham railway station being about two miles from Redhill.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

His duties while at Merstham were partly to deliver papers, and for the remainder of the time to sell papers from a temporary stall consisting of a board laid down on trestles.

No notice as required by section 4 of the Act, 1892, was posted at Merstham, but there was such a notice at Redhill.

Section 4 of the Shop Hours Act, 1892, provides as follows: "In every shop in which a young person is employed a notice shall be kept exhibited by the employer in some conspicuous place referring to the provisions of this Act, and stating the number of hours in the week during which a young person may be lawfully employed in that shop."

The appellants contended that the notice was not to be posted at Merstham, but at Redhill, and that the stall at Merstham was not a shop as defined by section 9 of the Shop Hours Act.

The respondent contended that the notice should be posted in both places, and that the lad was none the less employed at Merstham because he only spent part of his time there.

The justices convicted the appellants and imposed a nominal fine of 1s., but stated a case.

R. B. D. Acland, for the appellants.—The employment of the lad was clearly at Redhill, and not at Merstham, where he only spent two hours. The notice required by section 4 was duly displayed at Redhill, and section 4 defines "a stall as a shop unless the context otherwise requires." It is impossible to extend the words of section 4 to a temporary structure such as this. Section 4 clearly implies a permanent structure "in which young people are employed."

A. Glen, for the respondents.—Section 4 applies to this case, as the notice required could be fixed outside the board. The stall is clearly a shop within section 3 of the Act, and the wording of section 4 is not to be read as implying a permanent structure.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this conviction must be quashed. But I desire to say nothing that would give rise to the impression that this stall would not be a shop for some of the purposes of the Act. For instance, if the lad were to be employed for more than seventy-four hours, including meal times, in one week, I think, subject to any argument that may be addressed to me, that the structure would be clearly a stall, and therefore a shop, within section 3, which limits the hours of employment of young persons in or about shops. But we have to consider the meaning of the word shop in section 4, interpreted by section 9, and it is important to notice that the definition of shop in section 9 as applying to a stall is limited by the words "unless the context otherwise requires."

I think apart from the particular case that the word shop, as used in section 4, applies to structures which are in the nature of permanent structures, and not to a mere temporary erection of a board and trestles such as existed here. The boy was really employed at Redhill, his employment at Merstham only lasted from 6.30 to 10 a.m., during part of which time he was delivering papers to subscribers. In my opinion it would be a ridiculous construction of the Act if we too were to hold that for the purpose of exhibiting a notice this board and trestles constituted a stall, and therefore a shop, within the meaning of the section. I think, therefore, that this conviction should be quashed.

DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

STEDALL v. STEDALL. (a.)

Divorce—Variation of settlements—Policy payable at fixed date to husband if alive, and if not to wife—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 45—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.

Where a wife had certain rights under a policy on her husband's life, and the marriage was afterwards dissolved by reason of her adultery,

The Court ordered her to settle her interests thereunder for the benefit of the petitioner and the children of the marriage.

Motion.

This was a motion to vary the registrar's report on a petition to vary settlements.

On the 25th of April, 1900, the husband obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of his marriage, and on the 5th of November, 1900, that decree was made absolute.

There were two children of the marriage, the custody of whom was given to the petitioner.

In 1891 the petitioner had insured his life for £2,500, payable on the 12th of December, 1910, to the petitioner if alive, but if dead to the respondent, but if she were dead to the petitioner's executors, administrators, and assigns.

The petitioner's contention was that now that his marriage with the respondent was dissolved it was a hardship that he should continue to pay the premiums on the policy if the respondent notwithstanding the dissolution of the marriage had rights under the policy.

The insurance company were said to have given it as their opinion that if the policy was surrendered they would have to pay the wife, and they suggested that the wife should be got to assign her rights under it. This, however, she refused to do. The motion had been previously before the court when Gorell Barnes, J., adjourned the case, intimating that he did not think that the policy was a marriage settlement within the meaning of the Matrimonial Causes Acts. But he thought it first desirable that counsel's opinion should be taken as to whether or not the respondent had in fact rights under the policy.

The petitioner now moved the court to order the respondent to convey her interests thereunder, the order being asked for under section 45 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85.

Barnard, in support.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said that he thought that the policy was certainly property belonging to the wife in reversion, and, moreover, it appeared to him that it might fall within section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859. It would, however, surely be a post-nuptial settlement. The court therefore thought that the wife ought to be ordered to settle her interest in the policy for the benefit of the petitioner and his children, and it further ordered that the matter should be referred to the conveyancing counsel to settle the deed. Judgment accordingly.

Will—Remoteness—Gift over—Splitting gift over—Cutting down absolute gift.

A testator, who died in 1852, gave his residuary personal estate to trustees in trust for his wife (who died in 1876) for life, and after her death he allotted two-fifths to S. D., and he directed that the two-fifths so given should remain in trust for her during her life for her separate use, and after her death in trust for her children, who being sons should attain twenty-five, or being a daughter or daughters should attain twenty-one or marry under that age, and in default of any such issue should be divided among the children of his brother C.

S. D. died in 1899 without ever having any issue.

Held, that the gift over on the death of S. D. without issue was void for remoteness, and that as the gift over failed, the original absolute gift took effect, and the two-fifths passed therefore to S. D.'s personal representatives.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Dec. 16.—Lord DAVEY.—In this case Richard Hancock, by his will dated the 17th of June, 1850, gave the residue of his property to trustees upon trust to permit his wife (who died in November, 1876) to receive the income during her life for her separate use, and after her death upon trust to be divided into five equal portions, which he allotted in the manner following: To Susan Drake he gave two such portions, to his brother William one such portion, to his brother Charles one such portion, and to the sons of his late brother Sampson the remaining such portion. The will then proceeds as follows: "But it is my will and mind that the two-fifth portion allotted to the said Susan Drake shall remain in trust and that she be entitled to take only the interest and annual proceeds of the shares so bequeathed to her during her natural life, and for her sole and separate use independent of her present or any future husband, but without power of anticipation, and from and after her decease in trust for the benefit of any child or children born unto her the said Susan Drake by her present or any future husband upon his or their attaining the age of twenty-five years, if a son or sons, or if a daughter or daughters upon her or their attaining the age of twenty-one years, or upon her or their marriage, whichever of these events may first happen, but in default of any such issue then and in that case the said two-fifths of my residuary estate and any accumulation of interest thereon shall go and be divided subject to the appointment of my wife among the children of my brother Charles, but if there be no such appointment then to be equally divided among such children payable if a son or sons upon their attaining the age of twenty-five years and if a daughter or daughters upon her or their attaining the age of twenty-one years, or upon her or their marriage, whichever event may first happen."

Susan Drake died on the 26th of June, 1899, without ever having had any issue. The two-fifths of the testator's residuary estate allotted to her are now represented by a sum of £12,399 10s. Reduced Three per cent. Annuities.

The appellants are the children of the testator's brother Charles, and in the events which have happened they claim to be entitled to Susan Drake's two-fifths of the residuary estate under the gift over stated above. They are also next-of-kin of the testator, and if they fail on their first point they contend that the share in question is undisposed of.

It will be observed that the disposition under which the appellants claim is an executory limitation, to take effect in default of such issue as mentioned of Susan Drake—that is, her children, whether born before or after the testator's death, who shall attain the age of twenty-five years in the case of sons, and twenty-one years or be married in the case of daughters. This event may, of course, happen beyond the limits allowed by law. An executory devise is an infringement on the rules of the common law, and the conditions for its validity are well settled. So far back as the year 1787 Lord Kenyon, then Master of the Rolls, thus expresses himself in Jee v. Audley, 1 Cox Ch. Cas. 324: "The general principles which apply to this case are not disputed: the limitations of personal estate are void, unless they necessarily vest, if at all, within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years or nine or ten months afterwards. This has been sanctioned by the opinion of judges at all times, from the time of the Duke of Norfolk's case to the present: it has grown reverend by age, and is not now to be broken in upon." And in advising this House in Dungannon (Lord) v. Smith, 12 Cl. & Fin. 546, at p. 563, a case to which I shall refer again, Cresswell, J., stated the rule thus: "It is a general rule, too firmly established to be controverted, that an executory devise to be valid must vest, if at all, within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years after; it is not sufficient that it may vest within that period; it must be good in its creation; and unless it is created in such terms that it cannot vest after the expiration of a life or lives in being and twenty-one years, and the period allowed for gestation, it is not valid, and subsequent events cannot make it so."

All this is not disputed by the appellants, and it would therefore seem that the gift over to the children of Charles in the will before the House must primâ facie be held void. But the appellants contend that they are entitled to look at the events which happened and to construe the event on which the gift over is to take effect as if it were two events. They say that the testator's words rightly construed is: "If Susan Drake shall have no issue, or if her children die without having fulfilled the prescribed conditions for the vesting of the property in them." In the first case they say the gift is good, and in the second only is it void.

The first observation that occurs to one is that this is not the language of the will. Counsel for the respondent pointed out grammatical difficulties in the words in that way. If one were at liberty to alter the language of the will in the manner suggested, I really do not see why one should not split the event into as many contingencies as can be pointed out in which the gift over would take effect within the allowed limits. For instance, why not divide the event in the present case into at least three: First, if Susan has no children; secondly, if her children all die under twenty-one; or thirdly, if they die under twenty-five? And there may be other contingencies into which the event could be broken up. In that case what becomes of the rule that you are not to look at the event which actually happens for determining the validity of the gift? I again quote Lord Kenyon in Jee v. Audley: "Another thing pressed upon me," he says, "is to decide on the events which have happened; but I cannot do this without overturning very many cases. The single question before me is, not whether the limitation is good in the events which have happened, but whether it is good in its creation; and if it were not, I cannot make it so."

But the same argument which has been pressed upon this House was addressed to the Court of Common Pleas more than a hundred years ago and overruled. In the case of Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop), 2 H. Bl. 358, decided in the year 1794, an advowson was devised to the first or other son of Thomas Proctor that should be bred a clergyman and be in holy orders, but in case Proctor should have no such son, to one Moore in fee. There being no particular estate to support the devise as a contingent remainder, it could take effect only as an executory devise. Proctor died without having had a son, and Moore thereupon claimed to present. It was argued that the limitations in the will were alternate: if Proctor should have a son in holy orders Moore was excluded, and if he had no son he could take. It was replied that in truth there was but one contingency on which the devise to Moore was limited, and the case was distinguished from a case of Longhead v. Phelps, 2 W. Bl. 704, where two contingencies were expressed in the disjunctive, the first of which was good. The Court of Common Pleas was very clearly of opinion that the first devise to the son of Thomas Proctor was void from the uncertainty when such a son, if he had any, might take orders, and that the devise over to Moore, as it depended on the same event, was also void, for the words of the will would not admit of the contingency being divided.

Again, in Dungannon (Lord) v. Smith a testator bequeathed leaseholds for years to trustees on trust for B. for life, and after his death to permit such person who for the time being would take by descent as heir male of the body of B., to take the profits thereof until some such person should attain the age of twenty-one years, and then to convey the same to such person so attaining that age. It will be observed that there was no gift of the corpus of the estate except in the direction to convey, and the event upon which that was to take place might exceed the limits allowed by law. At the death of B. his son and heir had attained twenty-one. It was argued on his behalf that you might split the gift into two parts, and construe it as a direction to convey to the first heir male on his attaining twenty-one, which would be good, and in default of his doing so to the successive heirs male. This argument was in principle and substance precisely that put forward by the appellant in the present case. I will quote only the opinion of Maule, J., one of the learned judges who advised the House. He says: "With respect to this argument it may be observed that the words of the testator are clear and unambiguous: there is no difficulty in dealing with them as they stand in the will, unless it be sought to evade the rule against perpetuity. There is no such rule of construction as that any words which point out the same course of devolution" (I pause to add, "or describe the same events") "as those used by the testator may, in construing a will, be substituted for those which he has used,—a proposition which seems to be assumed in the argument in question. Such a rule would be manifestly inconsistent with the established law, that a gift to take effect on an event which may happen or may not happen within the legal limit is too remote, such a gift being always capable (consistently with the same order of devolution) of being divided into two gifts, one necessarily to take effect, if at all, within the legal time, and the other afterwards." I will not delay by quoting what was said by the noble and learned lords to the same effect in giving judgment, because I do not find the point more clearly put than it was by Maule, J.

The appellants, however, rely on another case in this House—Evers v. Challis, 7 H. L. Cas. 531. On a superficial view of this case it appears to lend some support to their argument, but on a careful examination it will be found to have been decided on a totally different point, which has no application to the present case. The will in Evers v. Challis contained a very complicated series of devises of a freehold estate. It is sufficient for the present purpose to say that there was a devise to the testator's daughter Ann for life, with remainder to her children, if sons living to attain twenty-three, and if daughters living to attain twenty-one, with a gift over under which the appellant claimed, Ann having died childless. As an executory devise, the gift over was admittedly too remote, but it was argued that it took effect immediately on Ann's death as a contingent remainder. It is a familiar principle of English real property law that if a devise can take effect as a remainder it shall do so, and it was accordingly held in this House that the gift over, in the event which had happened, operated and took effect as a contingent remainder, and the question of remoteness therefore did not affect it. That this was the point decided is clear from the opinion of the judges who were called in to assist this House, delivered by Wightman, J., as well as from the judgments delivered by the noble and learned lords who heard the case. Wightman, J., said: "No case or authority has been cited to show that when a devise over includes two contingencies which are in their nature divisible, and one of which can operate as a remainder, they may not be divided, though included in one expression; and our opinion does not at all conflict with the authority of the cases of Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop) and Jee v. Audley, in neither of which cases was it possible for the limitation over to operate as a remainder." Lord Cranworth said: "I think that the gift over to the children of John and Sarah on the death of Ann without issue in 1847 took effect as a contingent remainder and not as an executory devise, and so was good; because when the particular estate determined, the contingency on which the remainder was to take effect had happened." And he supports his opinion by reference to a case of Gulliver v. Wickett, 1 Wils. 105, which he discusses at some length. Lord Brougham said: "As to the cases, of which there are several, I need not go into them. One of them is Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop). In that case there was no particular estate to support the contingent remainder, and it was clearly an executory devise." On these grounds this House reversed the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, and restored that of the Queen's Bench. It is apparent that the authority of Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop) is untouched by anything decided or said in Evers v. Challis.

I am therefore of opinion that the appellant fails on his first point. Some minds may be disposed to sympathize with Sir William Grant when he says, in Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 363, "Perhaps it might have been as well if the courts had originally held an executory devise transgressing the allowed limits to be void only for the excess, where that excess could, as in this case it can, be clearly ascertained." But the law is what it is.

The appellant's second point is that the two-fifths allotted to Susan Drake, on failure of the gift over goes to the next-of-kin of the testator, and not to Susan's representatives, as declared by the Court of Appeal. I confess to some surprise at hearing this point treated as arguable. For, in my opinion, it is settled law that if you find an absolute gift to a legatee in the first instance, and trusts are engrafted or imposed on that absolute interest which fail, either from lapse or invalidity or any other reason, then the absolute gift takes effect so far as the trusts have failed to the exclusion of the residuary legatee or next-of-kin, as the case may be. Of course, as Lord Cottenham pointed out in Lassence v. Tierney, 1 Mac. & G. 551, if the terms of the gift are ambiguous you may seek assistance in construing it—in saying whether it is expressed as an absolute gift or not—from the other parts of the will, including the language of the engrafted trusts. But when the court has once determined that the first gift is in terms absolute, then if it is a share of residue (as in the present case) the next-of-kin are excluded in any event. In the present case I cannot feel any doubt that the original gift of two-fifths of the residuary estate to Susan Drake was in terms an absolute gift to her. The testator uses the words "I give," and speaks of the shares subsequently as "allotted" to her. Counsel for the appellants contended that there are words in the will which confine her interest in the allotted portions to her life. But that is not what the testator has said; he has directed that during her life she shall have only the income of her share for her separate use without power of anticipation. That is quite consistent with a power to dispose of the capital after her death so far as it should not be exhausted by the trusts declared of it, and with the right of her representatives to claim it. In other words, as between herself and the estate there is a complete severance and disposition of her share so as to exclude an intestacy, though as between her and the parties taking under the engrafted trusts she takes for life only.

I am of opinion the appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I move accordingly.

Lord SHAND.—I have had an opportunity of fully considering in print the opinion of Lord Davey, and I concur in the judgment and in all that his lordship has said. I shall only add that on the points raised in the appellants' argument the authorities to which my noble and learned friend has referred seem to me to be conclusive against the appellants' argument in all its bearings.

Lord BRAMPTON and Lord ROBERTSON concurred.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I concur; and I have only to say that I think that on both points the matters argued by this House are so fully covered by the authorities that I do not think it necessary to add anything to what Lord Davey has said.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

Appeal.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) — Jan. 23, 24; Feb. 8.

HOLDEN (LIMITED) v. BOSTOCK & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Damages—Measure of—Sale of goods—Contract to supply invert sugar for brewing—Sugar contaminated with poisonous matter—Beer destroyed.

The measure of damages, apart from special circumstances, which the manufacturer of an article that has had to be destroyed by the fault of another is entitled to recover, is the price which he could have sold it for on the day that it had to be destroyed.

Held, therefore, that although the plaintiffs were brewers they were entitled to recover the full selling value of the beer in their cellars, which had by the fault of the defendants to be thrown away, and not merely such a sum as they themselves must have expended in order to brew an equal amount of beer of the same quality to replace it.

Appeal by the defendants asking that the damages entered against them at the trial of the action, which took place at the Manchester Assizes in February, 1901, before Bigham, J., without a jury, might be reduced by £350.

The facts were these: The plaintiffs, Messrs. Richard Holden (Limited), were a firm of brewers at Blackburn, and they had purchased from the defendants, Bostock & Co., sugar refiners at Liverpool, invert sugar, an article which until lately was very largely used all over the country in the manufacture of beer. A parcel of this invert sugar turned out to contain arsenic, having been made with impure sulphuric acid. The fact was not discovered until after the plaintiffs had used it, and consequently a very large quantity of beer had to be thrown away. The action was brought claiming damages for the beer thus spoiled and for other expenses and loss of business; the damages were set out under various heads in the statement of claim and in the particulars delivered by the plaintiffs. At the trial Bigham, J., entered judgment for the plaintiffs with damages, amounting in the aggregate to £1,980.

The defendants appealed, and contended that two of the heads of damages had been improperly allowed, and they asked by this appeal that as regarded these two items judgment should be entered for them. The first was a sum of £50 which the plaintiffs had paid away after the fact had been discovered that the beer was contaminated with arsenic, for printing and advertising that all such beer had been thrown away, and that in future they would not brew with invert sugar at all. But the real ground of the appeal was to obtain a ruling as to the principle on which brewers seeking damages for beer which they had been compelled to destroy were to be compensated, it being stated during the argument that several other actions by other brewers who had been supplied with bad invert sugar had been brought against the defendants, but stood over pending the result of this appeal.

It was not disputed by the defendants that where the brewer in order to at once supply beer to take the place of beer which had to be thrown away, had purchased on the market, the defendants were liable to pay him the full price that such beer had cost.

The plaintiffs had in this case purchased a certain quantity of beer in order to be able at once to go on supplying customers in their tap-room, and as to that item of damage there was no appeal.

At the trial, however, Bigham, J., had allowed the plaintiffs in respect of all the beer destroyed, which had not been replaced by the purchase mentioned above, such a sum as would have enabled them to replace that amount also by purchase in the market—in short, the full stock or selling value of the beer.

The defendants contended that this was calculated on a wrong basis, because the plaintiffs, being the manufacturers of the article lost, were only entitled to be repaid such a sum as they themselves would have to expend to rebrew that quantity of beer.

During the trial Mr. Fletcher Moulton, K.C., who appeared for the plaintiffs, made an admission to the effect that the difference between the net cost of the beer to the brewers and the price they would have sold the same quantity for would in this instance have been £300.

The defendants, for the purposes of this appeal, accepted that figure, and said this head of damage should be reduced by that amount.

The plaintiffs said that if the judgment was so varied, and only the net cost of production allowed, the brewer would have to brew twice for one profit, and assuming that it took a month to brew 28,000 gallons, one month of the life of the brewery was thrown away, for they would have to brew twice for one profit.

On the other hand, the defendants said if the actual selling price were allowed to the brewer for the beer destroyed he would make a profit twice over.

To this argument the plaintiffs replied: "If the net value of the beer destroyed was £1,000 to the brewer, and that sum alone were paid him, he could not buy on the market for £1,000 beer which he could sell for £1,300, nor could he sell the cheque for that sum. Therefore, as defendants cannot replace the beer in the plaintiffs' vats, which, when sold, would fetch £1,300, the payment of £1,000 did not truly represent the loss the brewer had sustained."

Cur. adv. vult.

COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment, which had been prepared by the Lord Chief Justice, and was the judgment of the court: This is an appeal from a judgment of Bigham, J., in a case heard before him without a jury at the Manchester Assizes in the month of February, 1901. The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who are brewers, against the defendants in respect of the supply by the defendants to the plaintiffs of sugar for use in the manufacture of beer, which was found to contain poisonous matter, in consequence of which large quantities of beer, which had been previously brewed by the plaintiffs, and in which the sugar supplied by the defendants had been used, had to be destroyed. The only questions argued upon the appeal were whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as part of their damages two items—(1) £50 cost of printing and advertising notices as to the change of brewing materials; (2) a sum of £300 being the amount of profits which the plaintiffs would have realized by the sale of the beer which they had in stock and which had to be thrown away.

As regards the item of £50, we are clearly of opinion that it was properly included. The general principle is that the plaintiff is entitled to any damages which, in the opinion of the jury, were the natural consequences of the breach of contract. The measure of damages must in each case depend upon the facts of the case. No damages for general loss of business were given, but we think that in such a trade as the plaintiffs on the happening of such an occurrence—namely, their having sent out to various customers beer which had to be destroyed—to advertise so as to minimize any possible loss of business, was a reasonable step, the cost of which, having been bonâ fide incurred by the plaintiffs with that object, they are entitled to recover from the defendants.

We are also of opinion that the judgment of Bigham, J., upon the other point—namely, the £300—is right, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover that amount as representing the measure of damage caused to the plaintiffs by the breach of contract of the defendants. The facts which gave rise to the question depend upon certain admissions made at the trial. It was ultimately agreed that the value of the beer destroyed in the hands of the plaintiffs for the purpose of sale was the sum of £1,800, of which the cost of production of the beer was agreed to be £1,500, and £300 the profits which the plaintiffs would have made on sale. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that inasmuch as the beer to which these figures relate, and which was destroyed, had not been sold, but was in stock in the plaintiffs' brewery at the time of the discovery of its poisonous character, plaintiffs' damage must be limited to £1,500, on the ground that that was the cost to them of replacing the beer, and they would earn £300 on its sale. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that primâ facie, under ordinary circumstances, the damage to the plaintiffs was the value in the market of the beer which would have to be purchased to replace that rendered useless by the defendants' breach of contract. We are of opinion, upon the facts proved before the learned judge, that the contention of the plaintiffs is right. The measure of damages to a plaintiff under such circumstances is not the mere money which he would have to spend in order to reproduce the spoiled article, but the value to him of that article, as he possessed it, on the day when it had to be destroyed, and in the absence of special circumstances, of which there is no evidence in this case, the ordinary measure of that damage is the market price at which it could be replaced, or, in other words, the market value of the beer in his cellars. Mr. Horridge, for the defendants, contended that although in many cases that was the true measure, and had in fact been recognized as being the true measure in this case—as regards beer which had to be purchased to supply the place of the plaintiffs' beer already delivered which had to be destroyed—yet that, as the plaintiffs were the makers of the article, they were only entitled to claim such sum as damages as it would cost them to replace the beer in their cellars, including, if necessary, items for interest on capital, use of brewery, &c. We do not express any opinion as to whether under the special circumstances of some particular case, plaintiffs or defendants would be entitled to put forward such a measure of damages, which might be either greater or less than the market price, according to the particular facts of any individual case, but we are clearly of opinion that in the absence of any such special circumstances, the ordinary and proper measure of damages is the market price of the article lost on the day on which it had to be replaced. In this case, according to the learned judge's note, which is confirmed by his own recollection, the £1,500 represented the bare cost of replacing the beer, and the £300 the difference between the cost price and its value to the plaintiffs. Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the appeal on this point fails also, and that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

SAUNDERS v. WHITE.
BIGGS, Claimant. (a.)

Bill of sale—Statutory form—Two grantors—Chattels belonging to each grantor in severalty—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9, Schedule.

A bill of sale given by two grantors of goods of which they are not joint owners, but some of which belong to one of them and the rest to the other, is void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (49 W. R. 127, [1901] 1 K. B. 70) affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) on an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Wandsworth County Court on an interpleader issue: 49 W. R. 127, [1901] 1 K. B. 70.

The interpleader issue was directed to be tried between the execution creditor of Joseph William White and Samuel Thomas Biggs, who claimed as the holder of a bill of sale given by White and his wife.

The bill of sale in question was dated the 3rd of May, 1900, and was made by Joseph William White, builder, and Emily, his wife, as grantors, to Samuel Thomas Biggs, a solicitor, as grantee, in consideration of the sum of £80 lent by Biggs to the two grantors. The security given was an assignment of furniture, some of which belonged to the husband and the remainder to the wife. The bill of sale witnessed that the grantors "do, and each of them doth," grant the furniture in question. It did not specify to which of them the various articles respectively belonged. It contained covenants by the husband and wife, and each of them, that they would punctually pay the principal together with interest by four equal monthly payments of £20 each. It also contained a proviso, in accordance with the form in the Bills of Sale Act of 1882, that the chattels should not be liable to seizure for any cause other than those specified in section 7.

The county court judge decided in favour of the execution creditor on the ground, inter alia, that the bill of sale was void as not being in accordance with the form annexed to the statute.

The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the county court judge.

The claimant appealed.

Mattinson, K.C., and Firminger, for the claimant.—The question is whether a bill of sale made by two grantors is necessarily void by section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as being not in accordance with the form in the schedule. The Divisional Court have held that it is void. But this bill of sale is in accordance with the form. The form describes the grantor as A. B. in the singular, but by the Interpretation Act, 1889, the singular includes the plural. It is immaterial that the goods in this case are not the joint property of the two grantors. On the face of it the bill of sale is a joint bill, and was given to secure one debt. There is no reason why such a bill of sale should not be allowed to be good. No one is deceived, and where a husband and wife desire to borrow money on the security of their furniture, and there is a doubt as to which of them is the owner of some of the articles, this is the only way in which the transaction can be carried out.

They cited Heseltine v. Simmons, 41 W. R. 67, [1892] 2 Q. B. 547; Ex parte Popplewell, 31 W. R. 35, 21 Ch. D. 73; Ex parte Barnett, In re Tamplin & Son, 38 W. R. 351, 62 L. T. Rep. 264; Ex parte Parsons, In re Townsend, 34 W. R. 329, 16 Q. B. D. 532.

Duke, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the execution creditor.—This is a document containing two several bills of sale, a bill of sale by the husband of his several goods, and a bill of sale by the wife of her several goods. Such a combination of two bills of sale cannot be brought within the form in the schedule. There can be only one entity of a grantor, though possibly that entity may consist of two or more individuals. In reading the form the words "the grantor" may be read for "A. B." No doubt by the Interpretation Act "grantor" may be read as meaning "grantor or grantors." But it cannot be read as meaning "grantor or grantors or either of the grantors." The form in the schedule relates to one transaction—i.e., to a dealing with one set of goods whether by one person or by a group of persons, to secure one debt.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: The question on this appeal is as to the validity of a bill of sale. The Divisional Court, affirming the decision of the county court judge, have held that it was bad under the Bills of Sale Act of 1882. The question arose upon an interpleader issue between the grantee under the bill of sale and an execution creditor of one of the grantors. The bill of sale purports to be made between Joseph William White and Emily White, his wife, of the one part, and Samuel Thomas Biggs of the other part, whereby it is witnessed that in consideration of the sum of £80 then paid to Joseph William White and Emily White by the said Samuel Thomas Biggs, the receipt of which Joseph William White and Emily White do, and each of them doth, hereby acknowledge, they, the said Joseph William White and Emily White, do, and each of them doth hereby assign to Samuel Thomas Biggs, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all and singular the several chattels and things, specifically described in the schedule hereto annexed, by way of security for payment of £80 and interest thereon at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum; and the said Joseph William White and Emily White do, and each of them doth, further agree and declare that they will duly pay to the said Samuel Thomas Biggs the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, by four equal monthly payments of £20 each on days therein named and do, and each of them doth, agree with Samuel Thomas Biggs to insure and produce the policy and receipts. Then follow covenants as to which no question arises. Then follows the schedule, in which a number of articles of furniture are specifically described. The facts, as found by the county court judge, are that none of the chattels named were jointly owned by the two grantors, but some of them belonged to the husband and some to the wife. There was no evidence of any agreement between the grantors altering the property as between themselves. Indeed, the bill was originally prepared by the grantee on the footing that the loan was made to the husband and that the goods belonged to him solely, and it was not until he went to prepare the schedule that he ascertained that some only belonged to the husband and the rest to the wife. He then altered the bill to its present form. The schedule, though it named the goods, did not distinguish which of them belonged to the husband and which of them to the wife; the result is that this bill of sale operates, if at all, as two separate grants of separate portions of furniture, which are not distinguished as belonging to either of the grantors. The court below have held that such an arrangement cannot be brought into the form prescribed by the Act of 1882, and is, therefore, void under section 9. They also held that it was bad under section 5 by reason of the fact that the husband was not the true owner of the wife's furniture, nor the wife of the husband's at the time of the grant, and that, as to these chattels respectively the bill of sale was void against either of them.

I am of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court was right. The transaction which it was sought to carry out by this bill of sale cannot stand apart from the document which purports to describe it—viz., the bill of sale. Indeed, it was not contended that it could be supported aliunde: see per Bowen, L.J., in Ex parte Hubbard, In re Hardwick, 35 W. R. 2, 17 Q. B. D. 690. It seems to me, therefore, that the question is —Can such a transaction, if stated according to the truth, be brought within the statutory form, that is, can it be framed in accordance with the form in the schedule according to the interpretation put on those words by the decisions in this court and in the House of Lords? See Ex parte Stanford, In re Barber, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259, and Thomas v. Kelly In Ex parte Parsons, In re Townsend, Lord Esher says: "If they (the Legislature) have forbidden every such document except one which is made in a particular form, we are bound to give to their legislation the ordinary meaning of language. It seems to me that the words of section 9 strike at all documents which give a security upon goods for the payment of money, and I take it the Legislature intended to say—If you cannot make your agreement by a document in the form specified in the schedule, you shall not be able to make it by any document at all." And it was there held that, the transaction being one which, from its nature, it was impossible to carry out in the statutory form, the document describing it was void as substantially deviating from the prescribed form. In Thomas v. Kelly the present Lord Chancellor says: "I think that section 9 must be construed to enact not only what a bill of sale must contain, but also what it must not contain; so that the statute must be understood to have prohibited bills of sale of personal chattels as security for money to which the form given by the statute is not appropriate." And further on he says: "The form is here, in my judgment, intended to be exhaustive of what may or may not be included in such a deed." The judgment of Lord Fitzgerald seems to me to be on the same lines, and though Lord Macnaghten says of section 9, "This section seems to me to deal with form and form only," I do not think he meant to lay down anything inconsistent with the passages I have cited from the judgment of the Lord Chancellor. Indeed, it seems to me to follow from the fact that the Legislature has prescribed a particular form in which alone a valid bill of sale can be shaped that it thereby excluded from documentary validity all transactions which, if described according to the true facts could not be brought substantially within the form. I say documentary validity, for, as pointed out particularly by Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., in many cases, a transaction may stand apart from the document which embodies it. But where it has to seek support from the document it must stand or fall with it. I cannot, therefore, accept the argument that, if a document be so framed as to make it possible to construe it in such a way as not to be incompatible with the form, it cannot be impeached, although if construed as describing the real transaction it would be outside the form. In this case the document can be construed in accordance with the facts only by reading the joint words of grant as superfluous and confining the effect of the grant to two separate grants by the husband of his chattels and by the wife of hers. I do not think that it would be possible to claim protection for a transaction incapable of being described according to the facts in the statutory form by misdescribing it in the form so as to bring it apparently within the schedule, and I think the authorities I have cited are conclusive to this effect: see also per Fry, L.J., in Beckett v. Tower Assets Co., 39 W. R. 438, [1891] 1 Q. B. 638, at p. 644. The learned Lord Justice there says: "Upon principle—that is to say, on the plain construction of the statute—it seems to me clear that, in considering whether the Bills of Sale Act applies, the court not only may but must inquire into the real nature of the transaction. . . . Again, the real truth of the transaction must be applied to the construction of documents for the purposes of the Act, and if a document construed according to the true nature of the transaction be not within the Act, then it will not be protected by its form." Does, then, the schedule contemplate and cover two separate grants by two grantors of separate sets of chattels not so described as to be capable of being referred specifically to either grant? If it covers two grants, why not three or more? And where is the line to be drawn, and what is the object of the provision for specific description of the chattels if in such a case the bill and the schedule together do not show to which section of the things granted, each grant is applicable? It seems to me that to hold that two or more separate grants could be brought within the terms of the schedule would involve such an extension of the symbol A. B., which is used to describe the grantor in the schedule, as to involve a departure from the statutory form in something which, in the language of Lord Macnaghten in Thomas v. Kelly, "is a characteristic of that form," and to introduce inadmissible complications. I think the reasoning of Bowen, L.J., in Melville v. Stringer covers this case: "If one examines the form a substantial part of it is, as it seems to me, that property must be assigned to the person who finds the money, and that to such person repayment is to be made of the money borrowed; and therefore I do not think that a bill of sale is within the Act if the money is lent by one person and made repayable to another person, or if the property is assigned by it to one person and the repayment is to be to another, nor if the assignment of the property is to one person to secure repayment to another. Mr. French has contended that that construction would exclude from the Act the case of a trustee to whom property has been assigned for securing the repayment of money for those beneficially interested therein. My answer is that that is an illustration of what is struck at by this section 9, which section is against any substantial variation of the form. If that is what that section means, can it be said that an assignment to parties who are not joint creditors when the repayment is not to be of the sum secured to those creditors jointly, but only of portions of such sum to each of them separately, is in accordance with the form in the schedule? So far from it being such, I think it is inconsistent with that form, and is therefore invalid." If the form were capable of being extended so as to cover several separate grants by separate grantors and covenants incident thereto, I do not see why it could not be extended to cover all the transactions negatived as admissible by Bowen, L.J., in the passage above cited. I think it is clear on the face of the schedule that only one grant is contemplated, though it may be, but it is not necessary to decide it, that the grant might be made by two or more joint owners, and I think the same complication in the case of several separate grantees which was held to avoid the bill of sale in Melville v. Stringer, would arise in the case of several separate grantors, and, for the reasons pointed out by all the judges in that case be, on that ground outside the schedule. There would in point of fact be two separate bills of sale in one document, and the subject-matters of the bill would be undefined by the instrument itself so as to be incapable of being specifically referred to either of them. This would surely be to sin against that simplicity and certainty which is said to have been the main object of the Legislature: see per Lord Esher, M.R., in Melville v. Stringer, and per Lord Fitzgerald in Thomas v. Kelly. I find nothing in Heseltine v. Simmons inconsistent with the views above stated. There the objection was treated as going to the truth of the consideration only, which is the subject of a special section. The larger question of whether it would have been possible to state the true consideration without departing from the statutory form was not raised or discussed. It was decided after Melville v. Stringer and Ex parte Parsons, to both of which cases Lord Esher, who was a member of the court that decided it, had been a party. It cannot, therefore, I think, have been meant to decide anything inconsistent with the principles laid down in those cases. As in my opinion the bill of sale is bad on the grounds above stated, it is not necessary to consider the point taken under section 5.

In re SCOTTISH EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY'S POLICY. (a)

Insurance—Life—Policy taken out in name of a stranger—Intention—Resulting trust.

A person took out a policy of insurance on his own life "for the behoof of" his wife's sister. After his wife's death he went through the form of marriage with her. She predeceased him. He always held the policy, and paid the premiums himself both before and after her death.

Held, that though her legal personal representatives were the persons entitled to receive the money at law and give a receipt for it, in equity the money belonged to the legal personal representatives of the person who had taken out the policy and paid the premiums, there being no proof that it was intended for her benefit.

Summons taken out by the executors of William Sanderson to determine to whom should be paid a certain sum of £790 17s. 4d. paid into court.

In 1850 Sanderson effected a policy of insurance with the Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Society for the sum of £400 on his own life "for the behoof of Miss Harriott Stiles." The policy provided that "in consideration of the premises the said William Sanderson had been duly admitted a member of the said society and the said Harriott Stiles, and her executors, administrators, and assigns, shall be certified to be entitled to receive out of the stock and funds of the society at the end of six months after the decease of the said William Sanderson the sum of £400, but which sum shall not be exigible until three months after proof of the death of the assured." The policy continued: "And it is further specifically declared and agreed that the sum or sums to become due and payable as therein mentioned shall be payable to the executors, administrators, and assigns of the said assured."

Miss Harriott Stiles was sister of Sanderson's wife.

In 1852, after the death of his wife, Sanderson went through the form of marriage with her. He, however, retained the policy in his own possession and paid the premiums thereon up to the time of his death. Miss Stiles died intestate on the 21st of September, 1890. Sanderson died in September, 1900. The question having arisen as to who was entitled to receive the insurance money, the society paid the amount due under the policy into court, and this summons was taken out by Sanderson's executors for the determination of the court whether this money belonged to them or to the legal personal representatives of Miss Stiles.

G. Lawrence, for the executors.—Apart from the statement in the policy that it was taken out "for behoof of Miss Harriott Stiles," there is no evidence to show that she is entitled to the beneficial interest in the policy money. If the legal right is in the defendant he is trustee of it for the plaintiff. In In re Richardson, Weston v. Richardson, 47 L. T. Rep. 514, 31 W. R. Dig. 110, where a policy was taken out by a father on his own life in his daughter's name, and the father paid the premiums and retained the policy in his possession, Kay, J., held the daughter entitled to the benefit on the presumption that it was an advancement. The burden is on the defendant to prove that he is beneficially entitled: Pfleger v. Browne, 28 Beav. 391; Beecher v. Major, 13 W. R. 853, 2 Dr. & Sm. 431.

R. M. Pattison, for the defendant.—Beecher v. Major is really in my favour, as here there is a clearly expressed declaration in the policy itself that it is "for the behoof of Miss Harriott Stiles." It is a complete gift, the money is to be paid to her, her executors, administrators, and assigns. This is a notice to the insurance company on the face of the policy itself. It amounts to a trust in her favour: Milroy v. Lord, 4 De G. F. & J. 264, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 120.

Lawrence, in reply.—The policy may be void as between Sanderson's executors and the company, but if the company do not take advantage of the illegality it has to be adjudicated on as if it were valid: Worthington v. Curtis, 24 W. R. 228, 1 Ch. D. 419. [JOYCE, J., referred to Mortimer v. Davies, cited in Rider v. Kidder, 10 Ves. 360.]

JOYCE, J.—In the leading case of Dyer v. Dyer, 1 Watk. Copy. 216 and 2 Cox Ch. 93, Eyre, L.C.B., in giving his judgment, says: "The clear result of all the cases, without a single exception, is that the trust of a legal estate, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, whether taken in the names of the purchaser and others jointly or in the name of others without that of the purchaser, whether in one name or several, whether jointly or successive, results to the man who advanced the purchase-money"; and although the judgment goes only to real estate or to leasehold, I think the law is correctly laid down in Lewin on Trusts, p. 175, where it is stated "Not only real estate but personalty also is governed by these principles; as if a man take a bond or purchase an annuity, stock, or other chattel interest in the name of a stranger, equitable ownership results to the person from whom the consideration moved."

The case referred to with reference to a bond is the case of Ebrand v. Dancer, 2 Ch. Cas. 26, where a grandfather had taken a bond in the name of his grandchildren, their father being dead. The Lord Chancellor said: "There is a difference in the case where the father is dead and where he is alive; for where the father is dead the grandchildren are in the immediate care of grandfather"; in other words, it means that if the grandfather in that case had not been in loco parentis to the grandchildren in whose name the bond had been taken out, then they would have been trustees for the grandfather, who took the bond.

Then there is the case of Rider v. Kidder. There John Rider purchased Consolidated 3 per cent. Annuities, and transferred the stock into the joint names of himself and the defendant Annie Kidder, and Sir Samuel Romilly in his argument in that case cites Mortimer v. Davies, and says: "In Mortimer v. Davies, a late case at the Rolls, a man living in this way, but not married, purchased an annuity in the name of a woman with whom he cohabited. It appeared the purchase-money was his, and no consideration passed from her. She insisted that it was intended as a provision for her, but was held to be a trustee." Then that is again mentioned by Sir Samuel in his reply. He says: "In Mortimer v. Davies there were no circumstances. Upon the dry point alone that the defendant cannot produce evidence of an intention to make a provision for her this plaintiff is entitled"; and it appears from 10 Ves. (p. 360) and 12 Ves. 202, that in this particular case of Rider v. Kidder the annuities were directed to be re-transferred. Lord Eldon says, 10 Ves., at p. 366: "If the case at the Rolls was purely this, that A. bought an annuity in the name of B., A. paying for it, and B. had no proof that it was meant as a provision for her, in this court the fact of the advancement of the purchase-money as between these persons, standing in no relation to each other that would meet the presumption, raises a trust in the person vested with the interest for the benefit of the person who paid the money." And later on he says: "If, therefore, this case depended upon the mere naked circumstance of the purchase of stock in both their names, and he had died immediately without any dealing or transaction upon it, I should have thought the defendant would have been a trustee for his personal representative, as she would have been for himself." And Lord Romilly puts it quite generally in the case of Garrick v. Taylor, 9 W. R. 181, 29 Beav. 79, which was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. He says: "If a purchase be made by one in the name of another, the presumption is that the latter is a trustee for the person who pays the money unless the parties stand in the relation of parent and child."

Now, this case is the simple one of a policy taken out by Mr. Sanderson a great many years ago, in which the name of Miss Stiles appears as the person to whom the money is to be paid. The policy was never handed to her, and she is now dead, and the premiums were always paid, and were paid for many years after her death, by the person who took out the policy. That really is a case of taking the policy out in the name of another, that other person being a sister of his wife, and therefore not standing in the relation to him that would "meet the presumption," as Lord Eldon expressed it. It comes, really, to a case of a purchase by one in the name of another with no other circumstances at all proved. Therefore, in my opinion, although the legal personal representative of the lady in this case would be the person entitled to receive the money at law and to give a receipt for it, in equity the money belongs to the legal personal representatives of Mr. Sanderson, who took out the policy.

Attorney-General v. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of the City of Liverpool. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Loan capital—Issue of stock—Date of issue—Finance Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 9), s. 8.

The Finance Act, 1899 (which came into operation on the 20th of June, 1899), by section 8, enacts that where any local authority, corporation, company, or body of persons propose to issue any loan capital, they shall, before the issue thereof, deliver to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a statement of the amount proposed to be secured by the issue, and every such statement shall be charged with an ad valorem stamp duty.

Held, that by the time scrip certificates are issued to allottees the loan capital is issued within the meaning of section 8, and therefore the statement should be delivered to the Inland Revenue Commissioners before scrip certificates are issued.

Held, also, that where scrip certificates in respect of a loan to a corporation were issued to allottees before the 20th of June, 1899, although the payment of the final instalment in respect of the loan was not due or paid until after the 20th of June, 1899, section 8 of the Act had no application.

Special case.

Information on behalf of the Crown to recover duty under section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899, in respect of the issue of certain loan capital by the defendants.

By the Liverpool Corporation Loans Act, 1894, as amended by the Liverpool Corporation Loans Act, 1897, the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the city of Liverpool were empowered to issue stock upon the terms and subject to the conditions and provisions contained in the said Acts.

By a resolution of the council of the city of Liverpool, duly passed in accordance with the said Acts on the 5th day of April, 1899, it was resolved that under the authority, and subject to the provisions of the said Acts, the corporation, acting by the council, did thereby in exercise of their powers create stock to be called the Liverpool Corporation 2½ per cent. Redeemable Stock.

The amount and terms and manner of the issue appear from the prospectus issued on the 8th of April, 1899, by the Bank of England on behalf of the Liverpool Corporation inviting tenders for the said stock.

The material portion of the prospectus is as follows: "The Governor and Company of the Bank of England give notice that . . . they are authorized to receive, on Thursday, the 13th of April, 1899, tenders for £1,000,000 of Liverpool Corporation Stock bearing interest at £2 10s. per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly at the Bank of England or at any of its country branches. . . .

"The books of the stock will be kept at the Bank of England in London, but arrangements have been entered into whereby assignments and transfers may be made at the Liverpool branch of the bank. . . .

"Tenders must be delivered at the chief cashier's office, Bank of England, before two o'clock on Thursday, the 13th of April, 1899. . . .

"A deposit of £5 per cent. on the amount of the stock tendered for must be paid at the same office at time of the delivery of the tender. . . .

"The dates at which the further payments on account of the loan will be required are as follows:

"On Monday, the 24th of April, 1899, so much of the amount tendered for each hundred pounds of stock as when added to the deposit will leave sixty pounds (sterling) to be paid.

"On Wednesday, the 24th of May, 1899, £30 per cent.

"On Wednesday, the 21st of June, 1899, £30 per cent., but the instalments may be paid in full on or after the 24th of April, 1899, under discount at the rate of £1 per cent. per annum. In case of default in the payment of any instalment at its proper date the deposits and instalments previously paid will be liable to forfeiture. Scrip certificates to bearer will be issued in exchange for the provisional receipts.

"The stock will be inscribed in the bank's books on or after the 21st of June, 1899, but scrip paid in full in anticipation may be inscribed forthwith."

On the 13th of April, 1899, tenders were received and the full amount of the stock—namely, £1,000,000—was duly allotted.

The respective further payments were duly made by the allottees in respect of the greater part of the stock at or about the dates named in the prospectus, but portions of the instalments were paid up before the latest date named for such payment, and in particular the final instalments of stock to the amount of £209,400 were paid in full prior to the 20th of June, 1899, and the inscription of £200,300, part of such last-mentioned sum, was effected and completed in the books of the Bank of England before the 20th of June, 1899.

When the amounts payable on allotment were paid provisional receipts were issued, and these receipts were exchanged for scrip certificates to bearer, and every one of the allottees received a scrip certificate to bearer in respect of the amount of stock allotted to him prior to the 20th of June, 1899.

The inscription of the stock in the books of the Bank of England was effected between the 19th of April, 1899, and the 25th of January, 1900. The amount of stock inscribed before the 20th of June, 1899, was £200,300. The amount inscribed on the 20th of June, 1899, was nil, and the amount inscribed after the 20th of June, 1899, was £799,600 and there remained the sum of £100 not yet inscribed.

The scrip certificates to bearer were dated the 24th of April, 1899, but were not, in fact, issued until the 2nd of May, 1899.

The Finance Act, 1899, came into operation on the 20th of June, 1899. No statement of the amount to be secured by the issue of the said loan capital or any part thereof was delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue either before or since the issue thereof in the manner mentioned in section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899.

On the 4th of August, 1899, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue requested that a statement in respect of the nominal loan capital of the corporation issued on and after the 20th of June, 1899, might be rendered pursuant to the above section.

The corporation replied that they had not rendered a statement because they had not issued any stock on or since the 20th of June, 1899, and that the stock was issued on the 13th of April, 1899, to which the Inland Revenue replied that the date of issue of the loan must be taken to be the date on which the final payment on account thereof is made, that date in the present case being the 21st of June, 1899.

The Attorney-General contended that the whole of the loan capital, save £209,400 (being the amount on which the final instalments were paid before the coming into operation of the Finance Act) was issued after the coming into operation of the said Act, and that the duty imposed by section 8 (2) was payable in respect thereof.

The defendants contended that the whole of the loan capital was issued before the coming into operation of the said Act, and that no duty was payable on any part thereof under section 8.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the said loan capital, other than the said £209,400, or any part of it, was issued subsequently to the coming into operation of the Finance Act, 1899.

The Finance Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 9), s. 8, provides that:

"(1) Where any local authority, corporation, company, or body of persons formed or established in the United Kingdom propose to issue any loan capital, they shall, before the issue thereof, deliver to the commissioners a statement of the amount proposed to be secured by the issue.

"(2) Subject to the provisions of this section, every such statement shall be charged with an ad valorem stamp duty of two shillings and sixpence for every hundred pounds . . . of the amount proposed to be secured by the issue . . ."

S. A. T. Rowlatt (Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., with him), for the Crown.—The Finance Act, 1899, came into operation on the 20th of June and the final payments on account of the loan were payable on the 21st of June, therefore the loan must be taken to be issued after the Act came into operation, and that being so, stamp duty is chargeable on the loan under section 8 (2) of the Act. "Loan capital" is defined by section 8 (5) as meaning "any debenture stock, county stock, corporation stock, municipal stock, or funded debt, by whatever name known, or any capital raised by any local authority, corporation, company, or body of persons formed or established in the United Kingdom, which is borrowed or has the character of borrowed money, whether it is in the form of stock or in any other form." There is no definition of "issue" in the Act, but it must be taken that until the stock is in existence there has been no issue. The stock cannot be said to be in existence until the last instalment is actually paid and only a ministerial act remains to be done. The capital is issued as soon as the subscriber is entitled to call for his stock: In re Imperial Rubber Co., Bush's case, 22 W. R. 699, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 554; In re Heaton's Steel and Iron Co., Blyth's case, 25 W. R. 200, 4 Ch. D. 140; In re Ambrose Lake Tin and Copper Co., Clarke's case, 26 W. R. 601, 8 Ch. D. 635; Cockburn, L.C.J., in that case says: "Issue . . . must be taken as meaning something distinct from allotment, and as importing that some subsequent act has been done whereby the title of the allottee becomes complete, either by the holder of the shares receiving some certificate, or being placed on the register of shareholders, or by some other step by which the title derived from the allotment may be made entire and complete." The South African Territories (Limited) v. Wallington, 45 W. R. 467, [1897] 1 Q. B. 692, and 46 W. R. 545, [1898] A. C. 309. "Issue" was also discussed in the case of Baring v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 46 W. R. 98, [1898] 1 Q. B. 78.

Lawson Walton, K.C., and Gore Brown, for the defendants, were not called upon.

PHILLIMORE, J.—All I have to determine is whether this loan capital was issued after the 20th of June. It appears as regards that portion of the loan on which duty is now sought to be charged—namely, the million less £209,400—the final instalments were not paid until the 21st of June, and therefore the inscribing of that stock was not complete as regards this until even later than the 21st of June.

It is contended on behalf of the Crown that, inasmuch as the final payment was not made until after the 20th of June, this loan capital was issued after the passing of the Finance Act, 1899, which received the Royal Assent on the 20th of June. Now, I do not say at this moment when it is the duty of a corporation endeavouring to raise money by a permanent loan to deliver the statement, duly stamped, to the commissioners, which section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899, requires them to deliver. It may be, and there are analogies which would certainly point to that, that they must do so before they advertise in the usual way for tenders, which advertisement implies an obligation or promise to accept tenders within the terms of the advertisement. It may be that it is before they do that, that they must deliver this statement—I am not sure and I do not so decide—but what I do feel sure of is that they must do it before they issue the scrip certificate. I understand that all the scrip certificates were in fact issued on the 2nd of May, or, at any rate, considerably before the 20th of June. That being the case, I conceive that that is the latest date which can be said to be within the meaning of the statute "the issue," and if as I think, at least by that date the corporation were bound to do it, they are equally entitled to say, as against the Crown, that unless that date falls after the coming into force of the Finance Act, 1899, they do not fall within section 8 at all. In other words, my opinion is that the whole of the issue of the million—not merely the £209,400—was made before the 20th of June, 1899, and that therefore the corporation could not, and had no duty to, comply with section 8, and that therefore they are not taxable.

As I have said, the analogy of the tax on companies—when they originally create their capital, or where their capital is being increased—to the tax imposed by the Stamp Act of 1891, but enlarged and therefore referred to by the Finance Act, 1899, in the very clause which immediately precedes the clause in question—would lead one to suppose that the statement must be delivered to the commissioners and the duty paid before there is an attempt to get from the public the loan capital which the corporation is seeking to raise. But I understand and appreciate the fact that there may be hardships and difficulties in that construction, and I do not wish at all to say that that is a necessary construction here. All I do say is that by the time the corporation have issued the necessary certificates whereby they have bound themselves, upon the creditor complying with the remainder of the terms, to issue the stock to him and enter him as a stockholder, by that time, in my opinion, they have issued the loan.

Therefore I must give judgment in favour of the defendants, with costs against the Crown.

ESHER URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. MARKS. (a.)

Highway—New road in place of old—Obligation to repair ratione tenuræ—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 25 (2).

In the year 1773 O. was the owner of lands now comprised in the plaintiffs' district, through which there passed an old highway. O. desired to stop up and inclose this highway, and in due course received licence to do so on his undertaking to make, as he did, upon his own land another road in lieu of the old road, "as fit for horses, carts, carriages, and foot passengers to pass and repass," and on his undertaking that he and his heirs would keep the substituted road in repair.

The defendant was the owner and occupier of part of the lands formerly held by O., and the plaintiffs desired to make him liable for the repair of the road.

Held, that the defendant was liable ratione tenuræ as being an assign of O., and that he was none the less liable because he was the assign of part only of such land.

Action tried before Walton, J., without a jury.

The Urban District Council of Esher and the Dittons claimed a sum of £137, the amount of expenses incurred by them in repairing a certain road, known as Ember-lane, being a highway leading from Bridge-road, Thames Ditton, westward to the bank of the River Ember, which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant was liable to repair ratione tenuræ, and had failed to do, after due notice had been served on him pursuant to the provisions of section 25 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1894. That section provides that where a highway repairable ratione tenuræ is reported out of repair, and the person liable fails when requested by the district council to place it in proper repair, the district council may do the work and charge the person liable with the expenses incurred.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the considered judgment of the learned judge, given on the 11th of January last, the case having been tried by him on the 31st of October and the 1st of November, 1901.

WALTON, J., read the following judgment: In this action the Urban District Council of Esher and the Dittons claim a sum of £137 10s. 5d., the amount of expenses incurred by the district council in the repair of a road within their district called Ember-lane. The action is brought under section 25, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894, which provides: "Where a highway repairable ratione tenuræ appears on the report of a competent surveyor not to be in proper repair, and the person liable to repair same fails when requested so to do by the district council to place it in proper repair, the district council may place the highway in proper repair and recover from the person liable to repair the highway the necessary expenses of so doing." The history of

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ember-lane appears to be as follows: In the year 1773, Mr. George Onslow was the owner of lands which may be described as the Ember Court estate, Ember Court, or as it was then more commonly called, Imber Court, or, by a still earlier name, Imworth, which was a manor in the parish of Thames Ditton: see the recitals of the Inclosure Act (48 Geo. 3, c. 134). Through these lands of Mr. Onslow there passed an old highway, leading from Thames Ditton and Esher towards East and West Molesey. Mr. Onslow desired to stop up and inclose this highway, and accordingly, on the 6th of October, 1773, he sued out a writ of ad quod damnum; and on the 11th of October in the same year an inquisition was taken before the sheriff of the county of Surrey by virtue of such writ and the jurors upon this inquisition found that it would not be to the damage of the king or of any other if the king should grant to George Onslow a licence to inclose and stop up the old highway, which was a highway for horses, carts, carriages, and foot passengers, and to hold such road when stopped up to the said George Onslow and his heirs for ever, so that instead thereof George Onslow did in his own land make another road as fit and convenient for horses, carts, carriage and foot passengers to pass and repass; and the jurors further said that it would not be to the damage or prejudice of the king or of any other if the king granted to George Onslow such licence if George Onslow did in his own lands set out in place of the existing highway another road commencing opposite to the foot-bridge over the River Mole next below Ember Mills and passing through certain land belonging to George Onslow to the road leading from Hampton Court Bridge towards Esher, such road to be for ever thereafter kept in good and sufficient repair by George Onslow, his heirs and assigns. At the following quarter sessions for the county of Surrey, held on the 11th of January, 1774, the inquisition and return were by order of the court entered and recorded amongst the records of the sessions. It is not disputed—indeed upon the pleadings it was admitted—that the old highway referred to in the inquisition was stopped up and enclosed and was from that time held by George Onslow, his heirs and assigns, as part of his lands known as the Ember Court estate. And it cannot be doubted (nor was it disputed at the trial, although a question was raised as to a subsequent alteration in its character) that Ember-lane, as originally set out, was the road which Mr. Onslow was required by the terms of the inquisition to set out, and which he did set out, for the use of the public in place of the old highway which he stopped up and inclosed. Apparently, when Ember-lane was first made it led to a foot-bridge across the river and by a ford for horses and carriages to a cart or carriage-way on the other side of the river, leading to East and West Molesey. It may be noticed that in the finding of the jury the new road was described as commencing opposite the foot-bridge over the River Mole. The River Mole empties itself by two mouths, one of which is called the Mole, and the other is now called the Ember. The road called Ember-lane in fact commences opposite to a foot-bridge across that mouth of the Mole which is now called the Ember. I am satisfied that in 1773 both mouths were spoken of as the "Mole," or perhaps more commonly as the "Moulsey river." This appears from old maps, and even if I am not entitled to take judicial notice of this as a geographical fact, I am satisfied upon the evidence—and, as I have said, it was not really disputed—that Ember-lane is the road which was set out pursuant to the inquisition of 1773. I shall deal with the question as to its subsequent change of character presently. I have first to consider a difficulty which arises in the present case from the fact that, although the terms of the writ and inquisition and return have been proved by the production of the records of the quarter sessions of Surrey, no trace can be found of any licence by the king, which in the ordinary course should have been granted in the terms of the findings of the jury upon the inquisition. If any such licence was granted it appears to have been lost. There is no doubt that the inquisition was acted upon, the old road was stopped and the new road was made and has ever since been used as a highway. There was also evidence which satisfies me that the new road was never repaired by the inhabitants or by any public body. There was evidence that such repair as has from time to time been done was done by owners of lands forming part of the land referred to in the inquisition as the land of Mr. Onslow. This evidence of repair would not be sufficient to prove a liability to repair by prescription; but, taken in connection with the other facts showing that the inquisition was acted upon, it is not entirely to be disregarded. The case of Leigh Urban Council v. King, [1901] 1 K. B. 747, 49 W. R. Dig. 71, is an illustration of the kind of inference which a court is entitled to draw in a case of this kind, where certain formal order and proceedings necessary to legally justify the substitution of one highway for another cannot be proved. In such cases when, for a long period of time every one has acted openly as if the required orders and proceedings had been made and taken, there is a strong presumption that such orders were made and such proceedings taken, and that the records and evidence of them have been lost. I have no hesitation in finding as a fact that a licence was granted by the king and that the old road was stopped up, and Ember-lane set out and substituted for it under such licence. The question, no doubt, remains whether the licence incorporated the conditions required by the findings in the inquisition. When one remembers that as far back as 8 & 9 Will. 3 any member of the public aggrieved by the inclosure of a road under an inquisition taken upon a writ of ad quod damnum had an appeal to quarter sessions, and the determination of such appeal was final and conclusive, it is impossible to suppose that the Crown would override the rights of the public by granting a licence which did not give to the public the protection required by the inquisition. I find, therefore, that a licence was granted by the king in the terms and subject to the conditions of the inquisition. A point was made by Mr. Robson on behalf of the defendant with which it will be convenient to deal at once. He contended that the case was similar to Reg. v. Barker, 25 Q. B. D. 213, 38 W. R. Dig. 85, and that the old road set out as a highway in 1774 or thereabouts had disappeared; that its character had been so completely changed that it had, long before any question arose between the plaintiffs and the defendant, ceased to be the road which Mr. Onslow, his heirs and assigns, were required to repair, and had become something entirely different. It is true that at some date later than 1773, probably about 1821, the road on the other side of the river towards which Ember-lane led, ceased to be used by carts or carriages, and for many years past there has been no access to or egress from Ember-lane at the end nearest to the river except for foot passengers. Ember-lane itself, however, has always been open from the other end to the use of the public for cart and carriage traffic, although, no doubt, it has in fact been used principally by foot passengers. It was contended by Mr. Robson, on behalf of the defendant, that it had ceased to be a highway for carts and carriages, but, in my judgment, the fact that it has become a cul-de- sac for traffic of that character has not taken away the rights of the public to use it so far as it may be found convenient to do so for carts, carriages, and horses: see Gwyn v. Hardwicke, 4 W. R. 486; Reg. v. Burney, 23 W. R. Dig. 95. I am further satisfied that there has been no such change in the character of the road as to make it so different from the road which Mr. Onslow and his heirs and assigns were required to keep in repair, that the old Ember-lane can be said to have disappeared. I find, therefore, that Ember-lane was and is a highway for horses, carts, carriages, and foot-passengers, and that it was laid out and thrown open to the public pursuant to the inquisition of the 11th of October, 1773, and a licence of the Crown which has been lost, but which allowed Mr. Onslow to stop up the old road on condition that he and his heirs should keep the substitute road Ember-lane in repair. About April, 1900, it was reported to the plaintiffs by their surveyor (who was a competent surveyor within the meaning of section 25, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1894) that Ember-lane was not in proper repair so as to be fit for use either by carts or carriages or by foot-passengers. At this time the defendant Mr. Marks was the owner and occupier, and as such was an assign of Mr. George Onslow of part of the lands referred to in the inquisition. The district council claimed that as such assign and by reason of his tenure and occupation he was liable to repair Ember-lane. Certain correspondence passed between the district council and the defendant in April, 1900, and by a letter of the 24th of April the council required the defendant to place the road in a proper state of repair. The defendant, however, repudiated any liability to repair, and the plaintiffs thereupon placed the road in proper repair, incurring expenses in so doing which amounted to £137 10s. 5d., the amount claimed in this action.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant that a liability to repair a highway ratione tenuræ can exist by prescription only, and therefore that where the road in question can be shown to have been first made within the period of legal memory there can be no such liability; and that as Ember-lane did not exist as a road before the year 1773 the defendant could not be liable to repair it ratione tenuræ. It is true that in cases in which the claim against an occupier of land, that he is bound to repair ratione tenuræ, is founded upon usage or, in other words, on evidence of acts of repair, such usage must be immemorial, and if it can be shown in such a case that the usage commenced at some time since the reign of King Richard I., the attempt to establish a liability to repair ratione tenuræ fails. In other words, to prove such an obligation by prescription the usage must be immemorial. But as was pointed out in the case of The Mayor of Lyme Regis v. Henley, 1 Bing. N. C. 222, prescription necessarily implies some legal origin, and the legal origin of an obligation to repair ratione tenuræ may be a grant from the Crown. If it can be proved that the king granted a licence to the owner of certain lands to stop and inclose for the benefit of himself and his heirs a public highway passing through such lands, imposing at the same time a condition that the owner of such lands should make a new road in place of the old one, and that he, his heirs and assigns, should keep such new road in repair, and if it can further be proved that the grantee accepted and acted upon such grant by stopping up the old highway, this would, in my judgment, be sufficient to establish an obligation ratione tenuræ to repair the new road made in place of the old road so stopped up. And it appears to me to be immaterial whether such grant was made and accepted before or after the reign of King Richard I. For these propositions the case which I have cited of The Mayor of Lyme Regis v. Henley appears to me to be a sufficient authority. The Stratford Bridge case, reported in 2 M. & Sel. 520n, affords an example of the way in which this kind of liability might arise before the reign of Richard I. It may, however, be suggested that the defendant was not an assign of Mr. Onslow within the meaning of the inquisition. He admits that he was the owner and occupier of Ember Court from the 29th of September, 1899, to the 24th of October, 1900, and that Ember Court formed part of the lands formerly belonging to George Onslow, and that the expenses in question were incurred about August, 1900. But it is true that some part of the lands of George Onslow referred to in the inquisition never belonged to the defendant. In The Queen v. Duchess of Buccleugh, 1 Salk. 358, it was held that where a manor was held subject to an obligation of repairing a highway and the manor became afterwards divided amongst several persons, each alienee was liable to the whole charge, his remedy being by contribution from the others. In the present case there was a licence to the owner of lands to stop and inclose a highway passing through such lands and "to hold it, when stopped up, to him and his heirs for ever," subject, however, to the condition that the owner of the lands should make another road through his lands in place of the old road, and that he, his heirs and assigns, should for ever keep the new road in repair. I think that "heirs and assigns," within the meaning of the inquisition, are the heirs and assigns of the lands through which the old road passed and through which also the new road was to pass—that is to say, the lands constituting the Ember Court estate of Mr. Onslow. In my judgment, therefore, the liability to repair was charged upon the heirs and assigns of that estate. Following the principle of the case which I have cited, when the estate became divided among several persons each alienee and occupier of any part of the estate, and, therefore, the defendant, was liable to the whole charge. It was further suggested that, even if there was an obligation upon the defendant to repair, it was not an obligation ratione tenuræ, because such an obligation is enforceable against an occupier only, and not against an owner who is not an occupier, and therefore an action under section 25, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1894 would not lie, and that the only remedy was under section 34 of the Highways Act, 1862. In the first place it is admitted that at all material times the defendant was occupier as well as owner. In my judgment a grant of a licence by the Crown in the terms of the inquisition of 1773 is sufficient to create an obligation ratione tenuræ. The cases already cited of Lyme Regis v. Henley and the Stratford Bridge case appear to me to establish this. The rule that was acted upon when highways were stopped and substituted roads made under a licence granted pursuant to an inquisition upon a writ of ad quod damnum was to leave the burden of repair as far as possible where it lay before. There is the strongest ground for inferring that the reason why Mr. Onslow and his heirs were required to repair the new road was that the old road which was stopped up was one which the owner of Ember Court was bound to repair ratione tenuræ. They accepted a similar liability in respect of the new road.

For these reasons I think that the plaintiffs have established their case, and, as there is no dispute as to the amount, there will be judgment for the plaintiffs for £137 10s. 5d. and costs. I ought to add that what I have said as to the obligation ratione tenuræ to repair applies only to a grant from the Crown, and not as between subject and subject. Licences appear to have been granted since George III., and no legislation appears to have been necessary in order to complete the proceedings under a writ of ad quod damnum. I have had inquiries made and have discovered that there are records of inquisitions later than 1773. I do not see why the statute should have made any difference, because appeals existed earlier than the reign of George III.

Criminal law—Bankruptcy—Failure by debtor fully and truly to discover all his property to the trustee—Disclosure by debtor at private meeting of creditors—Intent to defraud—Admissibility of evidence negativing such intent—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, sub-sections 1, 2, 4, and 6.

Upon an indictment under section 11, sub-sections 1, 2, 4, and 6, of the Debtors Act, 1869, charging a bankrupt with not fully and truly discovering to the trustee all his property, evidence that the bankrupt at a private meeting of his creditors, held after the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, had disclosed all his property, is admissible for the purpose of negativing any intent on his part to defraud his creditors.

Case stated.

This was a case stated by the assistant recorder for the city of Birmingham, as follows:

The defendant was tried before the assistant recorder at the quarter sessions for the city of Birmingham, on the 12th of October, 1901, on an indictment containing eight counts, framed under sub-sections 1, 2, 4, and 6 of section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, charging the defendant with not fully and truly discovering to the trustee administering the estate for the benefit of his creditors two sums of £70 and £65 1s. 2d. respectively. It was proved in evidence that the defendant carried on the business of a timber merchant at Elkington-street, Birmingham. He also traded at 83A, Constitution-hill, Birmingham, under the name of "The Unique Cabinet Manufacturing Co.'s Works." This latter was quite a small business.

On the 18th and 19th of April, 1901, the defendant instructed an auctioneer to sell by auction the business that he carried on at 83A, Constitution-hill, and also his household furniture and effects where he resided at Westminster-road, Handsworth. The auctioneer, on defendant's instructions, sold both his business and the household furniture the next day, the 20th of April, 1901. The business was sold for £35. The household furniture was sold for £108 15s.

On the 24th of April, 1901, the auctioneer gave the defendant an open cheque for £70 on account of these two sales. The defendant presented the cheque at the bank the same day and received the money for it.

On the 25th of April the auctioneer gave the defendant another open cheque for £65 1s. 2d., being the balance due to the defendant, less expenses, on these sales, and on the same day the defendant also cashed this cheque at the same bank. These were the two sums in respect of which the defendant was charged with the offences set out in the indictment.

On the 27th of April, 1901, the defendant executed a deed of assignment. The petition in bankruptcy was filed by a creditor on the 7th of May, 1901, the act of bankruptcy being the execution of this said deed. The receiving order was made on the 20th of May, 1901, and the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt thereon on the 8th of July, 1901. The defendant filed his statement of affairs, in which he made no mention of the receipt by him of either of the said sums of money so received by him as aforesaid. The defendant had also to answer in writing certain questions contained in a form called "O. R. 7." Question 11 was "What money had you in your possession or under your control at the date of the receiving order?" To this the defendant answered "None."

The assistant official receiver on the 22nd of May, 1901, saw the defendant with reference to his answers to the questions in the said form "O. R. 7," and on being questioned the defendant then stated that he had had some furniture, but that it was sold by auction on the 11th of March, 1901, and that he had received £90 for it, which he had expended in his business.

On the 19th of June, 1901, the defendant swore to his said statement of affairs, and in the said statement he made no mention under the head of cash in hand of either of the said two sums of money so received as aforesaid.

On the 9th of July, 1901, one James Rhodes, was duly appointed trustee in the defendant's bankruptcy, and at an interview between the said trustee and the defendant on the 17th of July, 1901, the trustee asked the defendant for the name of the auctioneer who had sold his furniture on the 11th of March, 1901, and where the account was. The defendant said that he could not remember the name of the auctioneer nor could he give any account of the matter.

It appeared that there had been a private meeting of the defendant's creditors on the 11th of May, 1901, at which the defendant and his solicitor and one Richards, the trustee under the said deed of assignment, were present. The defendant's counsel at the trial before the assistant recorder tendered evidence to show that the defendant at this private meeting of the creditors had disclosed the sale of his said furniture and business, the amount he received from the said sale, and that the various creditors questioned him as to what he had done with the money so received, and that he told the creditors at the said meeting that he was living on the money so received. Counsel for the prosecution objected to the reception of this evidence, contending that it was not relevant to any of the issues raised in the indictment, especially as at this date the said James Rhodes was neither appointed trustee in bankruptcy nor was he present at the said meeting. Counsel for the defendant contended that this evidence was relevant on the question of intent to defraud. The assistant recorder ruled that the evidence was not admissible and that counsel for the defence could not address the jury as to what transpired at the meeting of the 11th of May, 1901; but decided to grant a case if the defendant was convicted. The defendant was found guilty upon all the counts of the indictment. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the assistant recorder was right in law in rejecting the evidence so tendered for the defence, and in not allowing counsel for the defence to address the jury as to what took place at this meeting of the 11th of May, 1901.

By the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, it is provided as follows:

"Any person adjudged bankrupt, and any person whose affairs are liquidated by arrangement in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, shall, in each of the cases following, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; that is to say:

"(1) If he does not, to the best of his knowledge and belief, fully and truly discover to the trustee administering his estate for the benefit of his creditors, all his property, real and personal, and how, and to whom, and for what consideration, and when he disposed of any part thereof, except such part as has been disposed of in the ordinary way of his trade (if any), or laid out in the ordinary expense of his family, unless the jury is satisfied he had no intent to defraud:

"(2) If he does not deliver up to such trustee, or as he directs, all such part of his real and personal property as is in his custody or under his control, and which he is required by law to deliver up, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud:

"(4) If after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him or the commencement of the liquidation, or within four months next before such presentation or commencement, he conceals any part of his property to the value of ten pounds or upwards, or conceals any debt due to or from him, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud:

"(6) If he makes any material omission in any statement relating to his affairs, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud."

Lawless, for the defendant.—The evidence tendered is admissible and should have been admitted.

Stamford Hutton, for the prosecution.—The assistant recorder was right in refusing to allow counsel for the defence to address the jury as to what transpired at the meeting of the 11th of May, and the evidence tendered as to what took place at that meeting is clearly inadmissible, for there is no connection between what took place then and the offence charged. There was no duty on the part of the bankrupt to make a disclosure at the meeting.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C J.—We are of opinion that this conviction must be quashed. The offences charged are under sub-sections 1, 2, 4, and 6 of section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, each of which sub-sections provides that any person adjudged bankrupt and any person whose affairs are liquidated by arrangement shall in each of the cases mentioned in those sub-sections be liable on conviction to be imprisoned "unless the jury is satisfied he had no intent to defraud." Under such a proviso the defendant should be allowed to give evidence which is relevant to the transaction and which would negative an intent to defraud. The presence or absence of such intent may of course appear upon the evidence tendered by the prosecution. In this case a very substantial part of the defence is that at a private meeting of the defendant's creditors, held on the 11th of May, 1901, the defendant disclosed the sale of his furniture and business, and the amount he had received from such sale, and what he had done with the money so received. Whether or not this evidence would have been sufficient to satisfy the jury that the defendant had no intent to defraud would be a question for them, but it was clearly admissible with the object of negativing an intent to defraud.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright and Bigham, JJ.) Feb. 10, 11.

In re KEEN & KEEN.
Ex parte THE BRISTOL SCHOOL BOARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Property of bankrupt—Reputed ownership—Order and disposition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

A clause in a building contract whereby it is provided that "all plant, work, or materials brought to and left upon the ground by the contractor shall be considered the property" of the building owners, does not constitute them the true owners thereof for the purpose of consent to reputation of ownership by the contractor.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Beresford in the County Court at Bridgwater.

Keen & Keen were a firm of building contractors who in 1899 entered into a contract to build a school at Knowle, near Bristol, for the Bristol School Board. They engaged to furnish the plant and materials and to finish the work in 1901.

By clause 10 of the contract it was provided that "all plant, work, or materials brought to and left upon the ground by the contractor shall be considered the property of the board, and the same shall not on any account whatever be removed or taken away by the contractor, or by any other person, without the express licence in writing of the architect."

The same clause went on to say that the board should not be answerable for any loss or damage which might happen to the goods while upon the property.

Clause 20 provided that if the contractor should become bankrupt, or suspend or delay his part of the work, then the architect should be at liberty to give a notice requiring the work to be proceeded with within seven days, and in default all plant should be forfeited to the board.

Keen & Keen presented their own petition in bankruptcy upon the 16th of February, 1900, and on the 21st of February the architect gave the notice provided for in clause 20. The period of seven days was extended in order to give the trustee time to consider whether he would complete the contract. He eventually decided to disclaim the contract, whereupon the school board entered upon the land, seized the plant, and continued the buildings. The trustee thereupon moved in the county court for a declaration that he was entitled to the plant and materials as having been in the order and disposition of the bankrupts with the consent of the true owner at the commencement of the bankruptcy, under such circumstances that they were the reputed owners. The county court judge decided in favour of the trustee.

The school board appealed.

Reed, K.C., and F. E. Weatherly, for the appellants.—The plant and materials cannot be said to have been in the order and disposition of the bankrupts, because they could not remove them; but if they were, the school board were not the true owners and could give no consent to their remaining in the bankrupt's order and disposition.

They cited Reeves v. Barlow, 32 W. R. 672, 12 Q. B. D. 436; Ex parte Newitt, In re Garrud, 29 W. R. 344, 16 Ch. D. 522; In re Waugh, Ex parte Dickin, 25 W. R. 258, 4 Ch. D. 524.

plant and materials by the terms of the contract, and the fact that by clause 20 they could not seize until seven days had elapsed after the giving of the notice requiring the bankrupts to proceed with the work, does not exclude their consent to the goods remaining in the order and disposition of the bankrupt: Ex parte London and Universal Bank, In re Ginger, 46 W. R. 144, [1897] 2 Q. B. 401.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case the school board were not, on the construction of this agreement, the owners of the plant or materials at the time of the bankruptcy. The language of the agreement is wholly different from the language in Reeves v. Barlow. What the interest of the school board was it is not very easy to say or to put into language. They had a contractual right, legal just as much as equitable, as far as I can see, to have these things remain on the land, for use by the builder on the land, for the benefit of the school board, for or in the construction of the building. That right, whether it ought to be described as equitable or legal, so far as it was a contractual right vested in the school board before the bankruptcy, and was a right which would not be overridden by the bankruptcy alone, but it was a right which might be overridden under the provisions of section 44 of the Act of 1883 if the facts established a case of reputed ownership. But in order that that case should be established, three things must be shown. First of all, it must be shown that the things remained in the possession of the builder. They did remain in the possession of the builder in one sense, but it was an ambiguous possession, and a possession which he could not make use of to remove the goods from the premises. It might be said, I think, in some sense, that the school board had something in the nature of an interest in the possession as well as the builder, because without their consent the goods could not be removed or made use of in any way except for the building. Secondly, it must be shown that there was a consent by the school board to the builder being in possession; and thirdly, I think it must be shown in some sense that there was a consent to the reputation by the school board. That used to be the law, and, so far as I know, it is the law still.

Now it seems to me that there is no room for those inferences of consent to be drawn, if, from the very nature of the right, the school board had no power to withdraw the goods from the possession and apparent ownership of the builder. That would be so if they were placed in his hands for a specific purpose, as I think the materials were, for the purpose of being placed by him in the building. Here there is no consent by the school board that the builder shall be the reputed owner of that of which he is not really the owner. He was entitled to be in the position of owner of those goods so long as the building went on, for the purpose of using them in the building, and the consent of the school board did not in any way go beyond that. They merely consented that the things should remain on the land for that very purpose for which they were placed there. Sometimes in some cases it is said that the true owner of the goods is not to suffer under this clause unless there is something which might be described as unconscientious in leaving the things in the way in which they are left in the possession of the debtor. Here there is certainly nothing unconscientious and nothing which would work any wrong in the event of bankruptcy. I do not know what the school board were to have done. I do not see what kind of notice they could give. The builder would not have allowed them to stick up a notice to say that the goods were not removable in case of bankruptcy.

The decision in Shuttleworth v. Hernaman, 5 W. R. 853, 1 De G. & J. 322, seems to me to be quite different. There the landlord had no need to leave the machinery on the premises at all. The tenant covenanted with the landlord to keep in the mill certain machinery as security for the rent. Then the landlord resisted the removal of the machinery by the official assignee on the ground that, according to the landlord, the covenant by the tenant had given him a lien upon the machinery, but it is obvious that, supposing the landlord had a right to the machinery, the leaving the machinery upon the premises was not a furtherance of the object for which it was placed there, and it is quite a different case from leaving materials on the ground when the whole object of the arrangement is that the materials shall be used in the building. I think there is no reputed ownership in this case.

BIGHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the date of the receiving order these chattels were the property of the bankrupt, although it is true to say that they were on the ground, upon the terms, as between the bankrupt and the building owners, that they should remain there during the progress of the works, in order that they might be used for the purpose of the works.

I think clause 10 of the contract sufficiently shows this. The expression used in clause 10 is that all plant, work, and materials brought to and left upon the ground by the contractor shall be considered to be the property of the board. That is an ambiguous expression which, if it is read with reference to the other part of the clause and with reference to the whole of the contract, becomes clear. If one goes on with the clause it is plain what it means, "and the same shall not on any account whatever be removed or taken away by the contractor, or by any other person without the express licence in writing of the architect." There would be no occasion whatever for those words if the property in the goods had vested entirely, as it is suggested it had, in the school board. And the clause goes on to say that the board shall not be in any way answerable for any loss or damage which may happen to the goods while they are upon the property. It is unnecessary to put such words into the clause if the goods are already the property of the school board. Not only do the words of the clause, in my opinion, show that the property in the goods is not in the school board, but the fact that when the works are completed the goods (as we all know) can be taken away by the builder without any further act by the building owner in itself shows that the property in the goods has never passed out of the builder. At the end of the contract he takes away his plant and he takes away any surplus materials there may be as a matter of right, without any further act to vest or re-vest the property in him. Why does he take it away? He takes it away because it is his. But though the goods were, at the date of the receiving order, the goods of the builder, there was by the contract a contingency on the happening of which the property might pass to the school board. Now that contingency is to be found in clause 20, and the trustee when his title supervened took the goods which were the goods of the builder subject to that contingency. He could have no better title to the goods; but it was a defeasible title. But then that happens afterwards which was contemplated by clause 20—the contingency which transferred the property in the goods from the builder into the building owners, the school board.

In my opinion, reputed ownership has nothing at all to do with the case.

Perhaps I ought to add that possibly the contingency of bankruptcy happening is one which would not vest the property in the school board, but the contingency contemplated by clause 20 is the trustee electing not to go on to complete the works. He elected not to complete the works, and in my opinion the property thereupon vested in the building owners.

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Deed of assignment—Assent of petitioning creditor—Delay in presenting petition.

A creditor who, knowing that the debtor has executed a deed of assignment, unduly delays the presentation of a petition will be taken to have assented to the deed.

The mere sending of a representative to a meeting of creditors, who takes no part in the proceedings, does not bind the creditor who sends him to any course that may be agreed upon at such meeting.

Appeal from the dismissal of a bankruptcy petition by the registrar of the county court at Leicester.

Upon the 29th of July, 1901, the debtor by his solicitors sent out a circular to his creditors asking them to attend a meeting on the 1st of August. The petitioning creditors sent a representative to the meeting to report what took place, but he took no part in the proceedings and neither assented to or dissented from anything that was done. The other creditors present at the meeting agreed to accept a composition of 10s. in the £ to be secured by a deed of assignment. The debtor's solicitors thereupon sent a circular to all the creditors containing a statement of the debtor's affairs and a record of the resolutions passed at the meeting.

Upon the 8th of August the debtor's solicitors sent a further circular to the creditors stating that the debtor had executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors.

Upon the 16th of August the trustee under the deed of assignment sent to all the creditors a form of assent to the deed and requested them to execute and return the same.

The petitioning creditors did not execute or return the form of assent, and on the 22nd of October they presented a petition against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy therein alleged being the execution of the deed of assignment.

The registrar dismissed the petition on the grounds that a creditor who knows of a deed of assignment having been executed and does not at once petition must be taken to have assented to it, and that the petitioning creditors' representative having attended the creditors' meeting and not voted against the deed must be taken to have assented to it on their behalf.

The petitioning creditors appealed.

Reed, K.C., and C. B. Marriott, for the appellants.—The petitioning creditors never assented to the deed of assignment, and there is no authority which goes to the length of saying that they must actively express their dissent; if they do not assent they are taken to dissent. Their representative was sent to the meeting merely to report what took place there, and his presence there could not bind them in any way.

They cited Ex parte Stray, In re Stray, 15 W. R. 600, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 374; Ex parte Michael, In re Michael, 8 Morr. 305; In re Hawley, Ex parte Ridgeway, 4 Mans. 41, 45 W. R. Dig. 9; Ex parte Woodroff, In re Woodroff, 4 Mans. 46, 45 W. R. Dig. 9.

Neilson, for the respondents.—It was held in Ex parte Ridgeway, In re Hawley, that the presence of a representative who did not dissent from the proposal of a deed of assignment was an element to be considered. In this case there is the further fact that the creditors stood by for ten weeks before they presented their petition, and that in itself is sufficient to justify the registrar's decision.

Reed, K.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case the difficulty is that the registrar has decided the case not so much on the facts as on a view of the law which is not accurate. It seems to me that two things are reasonably clear—firstly, that a creditor is not affected by notice that a deed of assignment has been executed, and is not obliged to express his assent or dissent; secondly, that a creditor's representative who attends a meeting and expresses no opinion cannot be held to bind his principals to any particular course, indeed he may have no power to do so.

On the other hand, if the representative does not expressly reserve the rights of his principals, and they for a long time abstain from doing anything, there is a great difficulty in their way. Here these creditors received notice that the deed had been executed on the 15th of August; they returned no answer to that communication and took no step of any kind until they presented their petition upon the 22nd of October. No explanation has been offered of this delay and under those circumstances I do not think they were entitled to succeed on their petition.

PHILLIMORE, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGGINS AND OTHERS v. DAWSON AND OTHERS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Ambiguity—Administration of assets—Extrinsic evidence.

A testator, after bequeathing a number of general legacies, gave and bequeathed "all the residue and remainder" of two specific mortgage funds, after payment of his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to certain persons therein mentioned. There was no general residuary bequest.

The testator possessed at the date of his will no residuary property out of which to provide the general pecuniary legacies, but at his death he had obtained more than sufficient for the purpose.

Held, that the general pecuniary legacies were payable out of the residue in exoneration of the two specifically bequeathed mortgage debts, which were only subject to the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and that there was no ambiguity in the will to admit extrinsic evidence.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, sub. nom. In re Grainger, Dawson v. Higgins, 48 W. R. 673, [1900] 2 Ch. 756, reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Collins, L.J., Rigby, L.J., dissenting), 48 W. R. 673, [1900] 2 Ch. 756, reported sub. nom. In re Grainger, Dawson v. Higgins, which had reversed a decision of Stirling, J.

By his will dated the 31st of May, 1895, the late Monsignor John Grainger, after directing that all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses should be paid, and making some specific devises or bequests, and after bequeathing a number of general legacies amounting to over £11,000, gave and bequeathed "all the residue and remainder" of two specific mortgage funds of £9,000 and £4,000 after payment of his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to certain Canons Regular of the Lateran. There was no residuary bequest.

At the date of the will the testator possessed only the mortgage debts above mentioned, other than the specific devise or bequests above mentioned, and a small balance at his bankers.

At the time of the testator's death he possessed a further sum of £10,000 which he acquired subsequently to making his will.

The facts are given in more detail in the report below.

Stirling, J., decided that the £10,000 was liable for the payment of the general pecuniary legacies in exoneration of the two mortgage debts.

The majority of the Court of Appeal, however, held that the general pecuniary legacies were payable out of the mortgage funds, after admitting extrinsic evidence to show the state of the testator's property at time of his making his will.

The legatees of the mortgage debts appealed.

Jenkins, K.C., and Cann, for the appellants.—The language used was clear. There is no ambiguity, and extrinsic evidence is not admissible.

Theobald, K.C., and Fischer Williams, for the respondents, the next-of-kin and the pecuniary legatees.—It was clear that the testator intended the legacies to be paid out of the mortgage debts.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I think that we are very much indebted to counsel for the respondents for the very able and learned exposition of the principles upon which a will is to be construed in this country; but I confess that I have not been able to entertain the smallest doubt as to what is the true solution of the question propounded for our determination. Stated very narrowly—and the more narrowly stated the better—the question for determination on this particular will turns upon two phrases, or, even more compendiously stated, upon one phrase of the will: "All the residue and remainder of the sum of nine thousand one hundred and eighty-seven pounds, lent on mortgate to Sir John Lawson, the deeds being in the keeping of Messrs. Blount, Lynch, & Petre, of Fitzalan House, Arundel-street, Strand, and of the sum of four thousand pounds, lent on mortgage to Mrs. Alicia Kirk, of the Park, Gorey, Ireland, the deeds being in the keeping of the same firm, after payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, and the expense of proving this my will." Those are the words which we have to construe; and I confess that it is to my mind absolutely amazing that anyone can entertain the smallest doubt as to what those words mean. I have read the words by themselves because, in my view of the meaning of this instrument, they are by themselves. One does not doubt that, where you are construing either a will or any other instrument, it is perfectly legitimate to look at the whole instrument—and, indeed, you must look at the whole instrument—to see the meaning of the whole instrument, and cannot rely upon one particular passage in it to the exclusion of what is relevant to the exposition and explanation of the particular clause that you are expounding. That is perfectly true as a general proposition; but I ask myself here what other words—what part of the will, what provision other than the one which I am construing—reflects any light on, or gives the smallest interpretation to, the particular words which I am called upon to expound? If I am right in saying that there is no other part of the will that cuts down, qualifies, or in any degree alters the sense of the words which I have read (and Collins, L.J., himself says: "Read by itself and cut off from its context it is, I agree, capable of one meaning only"), then I ask myself what is it in the other part of the instrument to which the Lord Justice refers by which he says that the natural and ordinary plain meaning of the words can be cut down and expounded into meaning something different from that which he has in very plain words said is the ordinary and natural meaning of the words themselves? In the course of the very learned and exhaustive argument I have not heard one word quoted from any other part of the will which affects that question. What has been done (with the utmost respect I say it) by Lord Alverstone, M.R., and the Lord Justice is to cut a sentence into two, and to read the words "residue and remainder" as if they stood by themselves. Now, it has been said, and said very truly, that "residue and remainder" are relative terms: you cannot tell what they mean until you have found out in relation to what they are used. If, as Collins, L.J., says, these words had been left by themselves and without an exposition of what they were to be read in relation to, there would have been considerable justice in the suggestion that you might read them as applicable to the residue of the whole estate after payment of its natural and just burthens. But that is not true; and all through the argument, in spite of repeated questions by me to the learned counsel, I found that in no case would they read the words as they stand in the will, but they would read the words "residue and remainder" by themselves, and said, and said truly, that those are relative words. But when I come to look at the will itself, I must construe them as they stand in the context, and in their grammatical meaning, and with reference to what is there said; and then it seems to me that the problem is solved without the smallest difficulty. The testator says, "all the residue and remainder" (now there the argument has stopped throughout over and over again, but that is not the way to read any sentence) "all the residue and remainder of the sum of £9,187"—and he repeats the same with reference to the second mortgage debt—"and of the sum of £4,000," and so on. How is it possible to say that that language is susceptible of doubt? The observations of very learned judges have been quoted to show that you must read all the words in every instrument with reference to the circumstances under which they are uttered or written. In one sense that is quite true; but the problem is not—as I think the counsel who last addressed us very truly put it—to find out the "who" or the "what"—who is to take, and what it is that the person so designated is to take. It is quite true that, where you are finding out persons or things—who are the persons designated by the will, what are the things left by the will—you may find either the person or the thing by proper external evidence of what is referred to. In the case cited—Fonnereau v. Poyntz—nothing could be more intelligible than this: A man leaves an annuity of so much; it has to be ascertained what he meant by it; the word "annuity" by itself means an annual sum, which, of course, might be a very large sum indeed; or you may find out that the testator possessed a thing which was called an "annuity" because it was the designation of it on the Stock Exchange; you may find out by external evidence what it was that he was referring to. Whatever the subject-matter of it is, you may, of course, find out by external evidence to what he refers. And here the odd thing is that the supposed ambiguous words which you are to construe are the words "residue and remainder," and yet from first to last the learned counsel have refused to refer to the words "residue and remainder" as they are used in the will. It is not "residue and remainder" absolutely; and that is the fallacy of the whole argument that has been addressed to this House. It is residue and remainder of a particular thing, and you cannot cut the phrase into two and pretend that it becomes ambiguous because you cut the language in two and take one part of a phrase which is admittedly relative and treat it as if you could read it apart from the context in which it is, and apart from the thing of which it purports to be the residue. And that is really the key to the whole of this matter. I have often said—and I think it is perfectly just—that to treat language with that violence and to say that you have arrived at the conclusion from external circumstances that the testator would have made a different disposition from what he has done if he had had the whole subject-matter in his mind, and therefore to construe his language differently, is not to construe or to interpret the language which the testator himself has used, but to make a will for him which you think that he ought to have made if he had had the whole circumstances present to his mind. Now, if I were to concede—what I certainly do not in this case, for I know nothing about it—that it is more probable that the testator would have treated the residue as being the residue of his whole estate, and not of this particular sum of which it is stated to be the residue, if he had had the facts and circumstances of his property before him—if I were to concede that, it would not help the present respondents, because in the view which I take, if you were to construe it with reference to any such question it would be making a new will for him, and not construing the will which he has made. In the case of Hunter v. Attorney-General, 47 W. R. 673, [1899] A. C. 309, I find myself saying: "The plain fact remains in this will that the testator has not declared the trust that the Court of Appeal have imagined for him, and no apt words have been found to fit or give effect to his supposed intention; and I think that your lordships are not justified in taking such a liberty of interpretation. That certainly would be a strange mode of construing a will, that because you cannot find what else he must have intended to be done with his money except something of that nature, although it is admitted that there are no words in the will to convey the intention which it is suggested that he had in his mind, you can invent provisions and impose conditions which the testator himself has not introduced." I find that Lord Davey, in the same case, said: "I can only say, with unfeigned respect for the opinion of that learned judge"—referring to the Master of the Rolls—"that he seems to me to be making a will for the testator and not interpreting the words which he has used." "The words are directly and plainly applicable to the second purpose, and, in my opinion, to that only." I say here—to paraphrase those words—the words are plainly applicable to the residue of the sums of money to which they are applied as a residue, and to that only. The language, therefore, is to my mind absolutely unambiguous. I confess that I am confirmed in the view which I entertain by the true construction of section 24 of the Wills Act. With whatever purpose, or in respect of whatever supposed defect in the law, that section was enacted, I can only say that the language there seems to me plain and unambiguous—that I am to construe this will as if the condition of things to which it refers was that immediately before the testator's death. I do not believe that, for any such purpose as is now contended, you have any right to go into the history of the testator's property and see when he came into possession of it. I say that, by way of protest against the construction proposed to be placed upon that section of the Wills Act; but, for the purposes of this case, it is enough to say that I think that, in this particular will, the language is plain and unambiguous, and that for no such purpose as has been suggested could you go into external circumstances. I am very clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

Lord SHAND.—I entirely concur with what has fallen from the Lord Chancellor on the subject of the alleged ambiguity in this will. It appears to me, with great deference to those who have thought differently, that the will is unambiguous in itself. It is only ambiguous in this sense, that it has admitted of much argument on two different views of the construction of its terms, and not only of argument, but of very strong difference of opinion on the part of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal. But although that has been so, I agree with his lordship in thinking that, in reference to the so-called ambiguity, the meaning of the testator on a sound construction of his will is that the deductions to be made from the residue therein described are only the debts, funeral expenses, and the expense of proving his will. He has, in my opinion, expressly stated that these are to be the only deductions from the residue. I agree with the learned Lord Chancellor that the "residue" to which the testator there refers, according to the plain language of the instrument, is the residue and remainder of the sums then lent upon mortgages, and of those sums only. It appears to me that it is a violent construction of this will to treat the word "residue" as referring to the residue of the testator's general estate, or because of the order in which the clauses occur, to hold that the residue of the mortgages is to be taken after deduction of the legacies, which are not mentioned as deductions to be made in the clause which specifies what the deductions are to be. I agree with Stirling, J., that what is really proposed is to read in the word "legacies" in the clause specifying deductions; and in the sound construction of the language of the will as a whole, I can find no warrant for this, or for the suggestion that legacies were to form a deduction from the residue of the mortgage debts. I must further say that I have very great difficulty indeed as to whether any such proof as has been allowed and has been so much referred to in the argument is admissible in this case. The case is not one in which either the property dealt with by the testator, or the legatees or persons to be benefited by the will, are at all doubtful. In the class of cases in which you cannot tell exactly what is given or to whom it is given because of obscure and doubtful expressions of the testator's will in regard to the particular conditions of his property, you must have recourse to extrinsic evidence in order to ascertain his meaning. But here, in the first place, the will is in its expressions and language, as I think, unambiguous; and that being so, no proof in reference to the amount of the testator's estate at the date of the will can affect its construction. It appears to me that the purpose, or the effect at all events, of the proposal to lead evidence in this case is to supply a basis for inferring the intention of the testator, and to take one away from the true construction of the will, as showing that the testator intended something different to what he has said. I agree with his lordship in thinking that, even if it could be shown that the intention of the testator was something different from the language of the will, that intention would not prevail, but that the language of the will must settle the rights of parties. The object of showing that there was a deficiency in the assets dealt with by the will as a whole is really to affect this question of intention, and I would observe that if, in order to place the court entirely in the position of the testator when he made his will, it is competent to lead evidence as to the amount of his estate at that date, it must, I think, be equally competent to lead counter evidence in order to show that, although his estate was of that amount, he had great expectations that his estate would be considerably larger in the course of a few days or a few years during which he expected to live. The one class of evidence must be admitted as a counterpoise to the other. But the importance of such evidence and its real effect can be of very little consequence, if any, because of the provision in the Wills Act to which his lordship has just referred, to the effect that under the statute the will speaks as from the date the death, and the amount and nature of the estate must be regarded as at that date and not at a date of three or four years before, when the estate might have been different altogether. On these grounds I am entirely of opinion with the Lord Chancellor that the judgment ought to be as his lordship has proposed.

Lord DAVEY.—Notwithstanding the very able argument of counsel for the respondents, I cannot bring myself to feel any doubt as to the construction of this will, nor do I think that any case has been made by the respondents for the admission of extrinsic evidence for the purpose of enabling us to construe it. On both those points I am quite satisfied with the judgment delivered by Rigby, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, and I adopt the reasons which he has given. I need not, therefore, make any lengthened observations upon the case; but I wish in particular to call attention to two passages in the judgment of that learned Lord Justice. He says this: "The first point which I think it convenient to notice is the fundamental distinction between evidence simply explanatory of the words (of the will) themselves, and evidence sought to be applied to prove intention itself as an independent fact: Wigram (3rd ed.), pl. 10. This distinction must never be lost sight of. The great majority of the cases of explanatory evidence consist of the ascertaining of persons and things insufficiently explained by the will itself. When I say that it has never been contended that a will bearing a definite construction can have another and different construction imposed upon it by extrinsic evidence, I by no means undertake to assert that in point of fact this has never been done. Before the publication of Sir James Wigram's treatise there probably were, and subsequently there possibly may have been, instances of the kind. All such instances, however, must be attributable to the result of an unconscious though an illegitimate yielding to almost necessary bias in favour of a particular intention indicated or suggested by extrinsic facts as distinguished from the explanatory effect of such facts on the words of the will under discussion." The learned Lord Justice adds in a later passage: "It must be borne in mind that a will is not ambiguous by reason only that it is difficult of construction. If it is finally held to bear a particular construction, that must govern its legal meaning notwithstanding any difficulty that the courts may have felt in arriving judicially at the construction. It is only ambiguous when, after full consideration, it is determined judicially that no interpretation can be given to it"—I will add what is apparently the meaning of the Lord Justice—without some explanation of expressions used in it which are descriptive of the subjects of the bequests or of the persons to whom the bequests are made. Like Rigby, L.J., I will not undertake to say that no case is to be found (I do not pretend to have made an exhaustive search) but I am not aware of any case in which extrinsic evidence has been admitted to enable the courts to construe a difficult will where the words themselves require no interpretation, but the difficulty is only in the construction of the sentence in which the words occur. The cases cited by counsel for the respondents do not appear to me to bear a contrary character. They were all cases where the question was as to the meaning of an indefinite or uncertain description of persons or things. And to admit such evidence as has been tendered in this case would, in my opinion, be contrary to section 24 of the Wills Act, which bids us construe a will as if it were made immediately before the testator's death. Not only would it be contrary to that section, but in my opinion it would also be contrary to the general principles which guide the courts in the construction of wills and of other instruments as well. I have already said that the gift in this will does not, in my opinion, present any difficulty of construction. No doubt the word "residue" is in itself a relative term; but in this case the testator has himself told us the meaning in which he uses the word "residue," and the subject-matter with reference to which the word "residue" is used —namely, it is to be the residue of the mortgage debts, after the payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. Am I to change my opinion of the meaning of those words, which I think very plain, because I know that at the time when he made his will the mortgage debts formed the bulk of his property? I think not. Nor do I think that I ought to admit that consideration to influence my opinion merely because other persons as well qualified, or better qualified, than myself have attached a different meaning to those words. It may be that the testator may have been imperfectly acquainted with the use of legal language; he may not have understood the legal effect of making a specific gift or what a specific gift was, and he may have used language the legal interpretation of which does not carry out the intentions that he had in his mind. I do not know whether that is so or not. But, whether that be so or not, of this I am quite clear, that that fact should not induce the court to put a meaning on his words different from that which the court judicially determines to be the meaning which they bear. The difficulty which arises from departing from this plain and simple and well-founded rule of construction is illustrated by this very case. The consequence of holding that the words "residue after payment of" "debts and funeral" and testamentary expenses means something different from what the testator has said, has led to this extraordinary result — that the court has felt itself constrained, having put that unnatural meaning upon the words which the testator has used, to determine that legacies which are primâ facie mere pecuniary legacies of £100 or more—there are several pecuniary legacies of £100, £150, £1,000, £750, and so forth — that those legacies, which are expressed in language as to the meaning of which no lawyer could possibly have any doubt, are to be held to be specific—that is, to be not what they say, a gift of £100, but a gift of an aliquot portion of a mortgage debt. That is only an illustration of the danger of departing from what has been sometimes called the golden rule of construing every instrument according to the natural meaning which the words bear in the instrument in which you find them. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the judgment of Stirling, J., restored.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I so thoroughly concur in every word that was said by the Lord Chancellor in giving judgment just now, that I do not feel that I could usefully add one single word. His reasons for the judgment at which the House has arrived seem to me to be not only sound law, but extremely good, ordinary sense. Therefore I satisfy myself by concurring with that judgment. I think the judgment of Stirling, J., ought to be restored, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I understand and respectfully appreciate the view taken of this will in the Court of Appeal and ably supported by the learned counsel for the respondents. But I am entirely unable to see ambiguity in this will, for I find the subject of the gift to the canons to be expressly defined in the words of the gift. I can see no relation in the word "residue" to the prior legacies and a direct relation to the debts, funeral expenses, and the expense of proving the will.

Order of the Court of Appeal reversed and order of Stirling, J., restored. Cause remitted to the Chancery Division.

OLIVER v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Principal and agent—Power of attorney—Forged signature — Transfer of stock — Stockbroker — Implied authority—Liability—Indemnity.

Any person who, by representing himself as having the authority of the principal, induces another person to enter into any transaction, into which he would not have entered but for the representation, is liable personally for the damage that occurs if the representation turns out to be untrue to the injury of the person to whom it was made. Thus a stockbroker who executes a transfer of stock as attorney under a power is liable for any loss occasioned by the fact that a signature on the power has been forged, though it has been forged without his knowledge and he honestly believed it to be genuine.

Collen v. Wright, 5 W. R. 265, 7 E. & B. 301, 6 W. R. 123, 8 E. & B. 647, and Furbank's Executors v. Humphreys, 35 W. R. 92, 18 Q. B. D. 54, followed.

This was an appeal of W. J. Starkey from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 49 W. R. 391, [1901] 1 Ch. 652).

In December, 1897, the firm of Starkey, Levison, & Cooke, stockbrokers, of which the appellant was a member, received instructions from a solicitor named F. W. Oliver, for whom they usually acted, to apply for a power of attorney for the sale of a sum of £2,633 12s. 6d. Consols standing in the books of the Bank of England in the names of F. W. Oliver's brother, E. Oliver, and F. W. Oliver himself as trustees.

The firm accordingly obtained the form of power, and forwarded it for execution to F. W. Oliver, who returned it purporting to be signed and executed by himself and E. Oliver, and appointing the appellant and E J. Levison, another member of the firm, as attorneys for the sale and transfer.

The appellant alone, however, demanded to act on the power, both signatures to which he honestly believed to be genuine; and on the 23rd of December, 1897, the bank transferred the Consols under it, into other names, after having first, in accordance with their custom, compared the signatures with genuine ones of the Olivers in their possession, and written to inform them of the proposed sale. The letter, however, never reached E. Oliver, since a wrong address had been given.

On the 8th of March, 1898, the bank transferred to other persons £147 5s. 4d. bank stock also standing in the names of the two Olivers under a power obtained by F. W. Oliver and returned by him in precisely the same way.

F. W. Oliver died on the 7th of July, 1899, and E. Oliver then for the first time heard of these transactions of which he had previously been in entire ignorance; and his signature to both powers had been forged. He thereupon brought an action against the bank claiming a declaration that the transfers were void by reason of the forgery, and also claiming replacement of the stocks and payment of interim dividends or interest, and on proof of the forgery obtained judgment.

The bank, however, had issued a third-party notice to the appellant's firm claiming indemnity from them on the representations of authority made in the powers and transfers, and on the implied warranty that the signatures were genuine; on the hearing of this third-party claim, Kekewich, J., while granting no relief against the other members of the firm, ordered the appellant to pay to the bank all that the bank were bound to pay to the plaintiff in the original action, including costs, and the costs of the third-party notice.

From this decision Starkey appealed.

Sir R. T. Reid, K.C., Upjohn, K.C., and Stewart Smith, for the appellant.—We do not dispute the authority of Collen v. Wright, 5 W. R. 265, 7 E. & B. 301, 6 W. R. 123, 8 E. & B. 647, but the true grounds and limit of that decision must be considered. It is limited in its application to cases falling within it, and must be strictly interpreted. Otherwise it will be possible to bring an action based on implied warranty where an action of deceit could not be brought, and the rule laid down in Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337, will be seriously invaded. Collen v. Wright applies only to cases of inducing to enter into a contract, and is not an instance of a wider law.

They also cited Lewis v. Nicholson, 18 Q. B. 503; Jenkins v. Hutchinson, 13 Q. B. 744; Randell v. Trimen, 18 C. B. 786, 5 W. R. C. L. Dig. 179; Weeks v. Propert, 21 W. R. 676, L. R. 8 C. P. 427; Merry v. Nickalls, 20 W. R. 929, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 733; Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82, and referred to most of the other cases mentioned in the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J.

H. D. Greene, K.C., Latham, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the bank, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The facts of this case are very simple. [His lordship stated them, and continued:] The powers of attorney were produced to the bank in the ordinary course, and the brokers demanded that on the production of this authority the bank should perform their statutory duty, and the bank did perform it in pursuance of the powers. The sole question is whether, as the law stands, there is raised by implication of law a warranty by the brokers of authority on which they asked the bank to act, since they purported to act as agents of the principals, the Olivers. In my judgment the law does raise such an implication. In spite of the ingenious arguments of Sir R. Reid and Mr. Upjohn, who asked us to determine what was the principle of Collen v. Wright, and how far it extends, I think we have only to decide (1) does this case come within Collen v. Wright? (2) If it does, has there been any decision overruling or, perhaps, (3) so narrowing that decision, as to prevent it applying here? I think no decision has had that effect; on the contrary, I think the subsequent cases show demonstrably that this case is governed by Collen v. Wright. The weight of that decision itself is much enhanced by the fact that Cockburn, C.J., dissented from it and put many of the considerations urged on this court to-day, stating his opinion that no such implied contract ought to be raised, and pointing out that it had not been raised in the past, firstly, because an action lay for the false representation, and secondly, because if it turned out that the alleged agent was not an agent he could be made liable as principal. Both statements were wrong in law, and, indeed, invented grounds to support Cockburn, C.J.'s, belief that the person misled in such circumstances had no remedy; and I agree with the judgment of Willes, J., in that case and with the principle he lays down, that one who professes to enter into a transaction as agent impliedly promises that his professed authority exists. Collen v. Wright, however, was only a decision applicable to cases where one purports to be acting as agent for another: other cases—e.g., Derry v. Peek—have arisen where other false representations have been made, and I am only assuming now that Collen v. Wright applies to cases of representation made by a purporting agent in a matter of business. Mr. Upjohn urges that it is confined to cases where the agent purports to make a contract on behalf of another; but though these were the actual facts of Collen v. Wright, I cannot think that Willes, J., intended to limit the decision to cases of inducement to enter into a contract, and later decisions support this view. The judgment of Lord Esher in Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys is entirely contrary to the view that Collen v. Wright applies only if there is an inducement to contract, for he extends it to all cases where one person, by untruly asserting that he has the authority of the principal, induces another to enter into a transaction which he would not have entered into but for that assertion. I think this covers the present case, and the only way of escape is to limit the meaning of "transaction" so as to exclude cases such as the present one. But I think no possible meaning of "transaction" can be found which would exclude it, and as Lindley, L.J., says in the same case that the exception to the general rule that an action will not lie for honest misrepresentation extends to all cases where an agent assumes authority and induces another to deal with him on the faith of it. I think this case falls within the very words of the judgment in Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys, while in Dickson v. Reuter's Telegraph Co., 26 W. R. 23, 3 C. P. D. 1, the same view of the effect of Collen v. Wright is taken by the court. It has been suggested that Derry v. Peek has in some way overruled Collen v. Wright, and also that Low v. Bouverie shows that in the Chancery Division cases such as Collen v. Wright have been treated as overruled. But the fact that in Derry v. Peek the House of Lords decided that no action of deceit will lie without actual fraud does not prove that no implied warranty can be raised in other cases, or throw any doubt on Collen v. Wright; and as to Low v. Bouverie, Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ., both speak in their judgments of actions on warranties in such a way as to lead one to suppose that they thought Derry v. Peek had left Collen v. Wright unaffected; and though Kay, L.J., did not deal with the relation of Derry v. Peek to Collen v. Wright, he plainly thought the Court of Chancery had in former days power to make a person liable for an innocent misrepresentation, and that this power was still in existence. I think Collen v. Wright is still good law, and that the judgment of Kekewich, J., should be affirmed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree. The first question is whether the principle of Collen v. Wright should be applied here. It is has been argued for the appellant that that decision is of very limited application, and only to be followed in cases similar to it; but this argument cannot prevail here, for it was urged in Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys, and Lord Esher and Lindley, L.J., negatived it. I accept the law as laid down by them, and the only question, therefore, is whether it is applicable here. I think the course of dealing between Mr. Starkey and the bank amounted to a transaction, for if the power of attorney had been good the legal position of the holders of the stocks would have been changed, and as it was, that of the bank was altered, and the bank were liable to an action if they refused to transfer in pursuance of their duty. Then it is said that the bank took their usual precautions to verify the signatures to the powers, and that therefore we ought not to raise an implication of warranty. But for this purpose, would have had to be shown that the bank relied on their precautions and on those only; since if a misrepresentation is relied on, it does not signify that other inducements to the same end existed; in support of which proposition I may refer to Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, 33 W. R. 911, 29 Ch. D. 459. Here the bank acted on Mr. Starkey's representations also, and not on their precautions alone.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely concur in the judgments that have been delivered, and will not take up time by saying more.

Appeal dismissed.

SCOTT v. PITT-RIVERS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Secret trust.

A testator built a museum and laid out pleasure grounds on a part of his estate, to which he admitted the public free, but carefully guarded against the public acquiring any right in respect thereof. By his will he devised his real estate, including the museum and grounds, to his first and other sons successively for life and in tail male. By a codicil to his will he devised the museum and grounds, with £300 per annum for their maintenance, to his eldest son and his heirs male, and also appointed two trustees for the purposes only of the museum and grounds. Evidence showed that the testator wished that his son should maintain the museum and grounds as in his lifetime, but that the public should acquire no rights therein, and that the son accepted the gift on these terms.

Held, that the intention of the testator having been that the public should acquire no rights, it was impossible to say that an effectual trust had been created binding on the son which could be enforced against him in favour of the public.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 49 W. R. 425, [1901] 1 Ch. 352).

The testator, General Augustus H. L. F. Pitt-Rivers, had built a museum at Farnham on a part of his estates and also laid out another part which was called the Larmer grounds as pleasure grounds. During the testator's life the public had been permitted to have free access to the museum and the Larmer grounds; but the testator always insisted on his own paramount right to the museum and the grounds, and on certain days closed them to prevent the public from acquiring any rights.

The testator died on the 4th of May, 1900. By his will, dated the 12th of June, 1892, he devised his freehold property, including the museum and the Larmer grounds, to trustees upon trusts to raise out of the income thereof certain rent-charges in favour of his widow and children; and subject thereto he devised his estates to his first and other sons successively for life, with remainders over in tail male.

The testator made the following codicil to his will dated the 20th of November, 1899: "(1) I bequeath my museum at Farnham, in the county of Dorset, together with its contents and the objects of curiosity in my house at Rushmore which are intended to be placed in the said museum to my eldest son A. R. L. F. Pitt-Rivers and his heirs male. (2) I bequeath my Larmer grounds . . . to my eldest son A. R. L. F. Pitt-Rivers and his heirs male. (3) I also bequeath unto my eldest son A. R. L F. Pitt-Rivers and his heirs male the sum of £300 per annum, the said sum of £300 per annum is to be for the future maintenance of the said museum and Larmer grounds and the articles of interest therein and thereon. (4) I direct that the said museum and Larmer grounds with the articles of interest therein and the con shall be kept in a good state of preservation, and I further direct that the said sum of £300 is to be a further charge upon my estates in the counties of Wilts and Dorset. (5) I appoint my son-in-law John Lubbock, Bart. (since Lord Avebury), . . . and Chas. Hercules Reed . . . to be the trustees only for the purposes so far as necessary in connection with the future maintenance of the said museum and Larmer grounds and the objects of interest therein and thereon."

A summons was taken out by the executor of the will to have it determined whether the testator's eldest son took the gifts made to him by the codicil beneficially or subject to a secret trust to maintain and use the museum and Larmer grounds as in the testator's lifetime for the benefit of the public; and as to what, if any, estate the trustees appointed by the codicil took in the museum and grounds and the £300 per annum.

Evidence was adduced to show the intention of the testator with respect to the maintenance of the museum and Larmer grounds after his death. This evidence consisted of correspondence which passed between the testator and his solicitors, Messrs. Farrer & Co. and Messrs. Creech & Co., and of the evidence of the son and of Messrs. Creech as to a conversation which took place between the testator and his son.

The effect of this evidence is dealt with in the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J.

Kekewich, J., held that the museum and Larmer grounds were given to the defendant A. R. L. F. Pitt-Rivers as tenant in tail, and the £300 to him absolutely as personal estate; but, on the evidence, subject to a secret trust which must be enforced for the benefit of the public. His lordship therefore declared that the gifts made by the codicil to the defendant A. R. L. F. Pitt-Rivers were made to and accepted by him for the express purpose that the museum and Larmer grounds should be used and maintained as in the lifetime of the testator and, despite the testator's intention that the public should acquire no rights, for the benefit of the public; and that the defendant and those claiming under him held the property subject to a trust for such user or maintenance. His lordship also declared that the two trustees appointed by the codicil took no estate or interest in any of the properties given by the codicil, and had no duties to perform.

The defendant A. R. L. F. Pitt-Rivers appealed.

Haldane, K.C., P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and W. M. Cann, for the appellant, referred to Hughes v. Stubbs, 1 Hare, 476; McCormick v. Grogan, 17 W. R. 961, L. R. 4 H. L. 82.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.

Renshaw, K.C., and F. L. Wright, for the trustees of the codicil.

Warrington, K.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the heir expectant.

Sheldon, for the executor.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L J.—The question in this case is whether by reason of what happened between the testator and his son Mr. Pitt-Rivers a trust has been created which is binding on the conscience of Mr. Pitt-Rivers, and therefore enforceable in equity against him. There is no suggestion here that a trust has been created by the codicil of the 20th of November. The suggestion here is that there has been such a distinct promise made by Mr. Pitt-Rivers to the testator, his father — in consideration of which his father may be taken either to have executed the codicil or to have refrained subsequently from revoking it—that that promise will be enforced against Mr. Pitt-Rivers. In order to constitute such a promise binding upon the person who has taken a benefit under the will it is absolutely necessary that the trust should be communicated to the donee, and that he should accept it. We have, therefore, to see here whether there is such a promise proved. It has been discussed very often what are the essentials which are necessary in order to induce the courts to give effect to a trust which has not been expressed in the way in which the Wills Act requires that testamentary intentions should be expressed. But in this case there is no need to go into any fine questions about that at all. The court is relieved by the evidence from the necessity of so doing. Secondly, the court never gives the go-by, if I may use the expression, to the provisions of the Wills Act by enforcing upon anyone testamentary intentions which have not been expressed in the shape and form required by that Act, except for the prevention of fraud. That is the only ground upon which it can be done. But I am not going here to enter into any sort of question as to how distinct the promise need be in order to induce the court to enforce that promise and the trust arising under it. I will deal with this promise —because the evidence enables me to dispose of the case if I do so—as if it were a mere question between A. and B. whether the bargain was entered into, and I do not look for any greater distinction than is required when one is asking oneself apart from questions under the Wills Act, "Aye or no, is the promise established here?" In my judgment no such promise has been established here as can be enforced as a trust on the conscience of Mr. Pitt-Rivers, the son. Really, if the evidence of the conversation in the father's room on the 20th of December be looked at—whether you take the evidence of the son himself, or take the evidence of the two Messrs. Creech —it does not seem to me possible to come to the conclusion that there was here an express promise in words. Indeed, as far as I understood the arguments, it was hardly suggested that there was. If you look at the conversation, all that can be inferred properly from the evidence of those three witnesses, to my mind, is that the son said to his father that he would continue to use this property for the amusement and the enjoyment of the public in the same way as his father had done. I will treat the words, therefore, as being ambiguous. What was the meaning of his continuing to deal with the property in the same way as his father had done? It might mean, possibly, that he would continue as the owner of the property of his own free will and voluntarily to entertain the public and allow the public to use this property in the same way as his father had done as a matter of grace. If it meant that, I do not suppose anyone would say that there was any promise of such a kind as to create a trust. Or it might possibly mean that he would, apart from his own will, but as part of the wish of his father, treat this property as trust property dedicated to the use and amusement of the public. I am assuming that the evidence shows a conversation which might mean either one of those things. In my own personal opinion I think that really the balance of evidence is very much in favour of the first interpretation. But it is said that if you bear in mind that the son here not only had the conversation with his father, but that he also heard the letters read which had passed between Messrs. Farrer & Co. and Messrs. Creech, writing on behalf of the testator, you ought then to consider the words, in the light of those letters, as words spoken between persons who were bearing those letters in mind. It is said that then you will come to the conclusion that the intention of the father was not to be content with anything which should depend upon hope or goodwill, or anything of the sort, but meant to place the property in such a position that really his son would by law be compellable to continue to appropriate the property to these purposes. Here, again, I can only say that even if one imputes to the son that he did carry this correspondence in his head, I then should not come to this conclusion that by this conversation he promised his father that he would so deal with the property, because I really do not draw that conclusion myself from the correspondence. It seems to me that the father was extremely anxious that the property should remain the property of the owner of Rushmore, and that anything that was done with the property should be done by the owner of Rushmore voluntarily, that is, by his own will as distinct from the will of the testator from whom he took the property. In order really to understand the correspondence between Messrs. Farrer & Co. and Messrs. Creech, one should bear in mind what the father says in the letter which was written, I think, some five years before the codicil was executed. He had had a letter from the son, in which the son says: "My dear father,—I quite agree with you that it would be a pity if the museum was left away from the property. It would be a great bore for the owner of Rushmore to have a hostile county council show so near. I see clearly that the holder of the property after your time will have very little to spend if he can keep the place together. You say that I am always perfectly indifferent to business. How do you know? The only little business I had to do has been done here. I am always very glad to hear what you propose to do with the property, but I do not know how I am to make it my business. I certainly think that this museum ought to be the property of the owner of Rushmore, as it would be a record of diggings, &c., that have taken place on the estate." The answer of the father to that, dated the 3rd of August, 1894, contains this passage: "I am glad to see by your letter received to-day that you take a reasonable view of my wishes in regard to the museum and other establishment here. I shall be glad to feel that it is not necessary for me to make special provisions for the keeping up of these things which would deprive the owner of Rushmore of the pleasure and credit of keeping them up of his own free will and make the people of the neighbourhood gradually come to look upon them as a right. Whereas my great object is that the estate, viewed as an institution for the benefit of its surroundings, should continue to be regarded as voluntarily contributing to the pleasure and benefit of the people about." It seems to me that that letter makes it perfectly plain that the testator at that moment was determined if he could to leave this property with the museum and other things upon it in the hands of the owner of Rushmore in such a way that anything that was done with it for the amusement or benefit of the people would be something done of his own free will for those people. And it seems to me that that is absolutely inconsistent with the trust which we are now asked to say the son promised the father he would carry out. On the other hand there is no doubt that the father, having that wish, also had a strong desire to have some certainty that his son would really keep up the museum in the way in which he could wish it to be kept up, and would spend enough money upon it. In that state of mind he draws the codicil himself. Before this correspondence takes place I do not really see the slightest ground for suggesting that he had in any way departed from his views as expressed in the letter of the 3rd of August, 1894, from which I have just read an extract. Being in that state of mind the testator then draws that codicil. Upon that if the son had then been called in to the father's room without there being any correspondence with Messrs. Farrer at all and had been asked whether he approved of his father's will, I cannot conceive that anybody could have said, that by saying that he approved he thereby made any promise creating a trust, the result of which would be to prevent him as the owner of Rushmore from keeping up the museum of his own free will. But it is said that this correspondence with Messrs. Farrer makes the difference. I do not wish to go into that at length: it really is not necessary. But Messrs. Farrer suggest that really the best way for him would be to express a hope which they tell him will not be legally binding, and then trust that his son will be inclined, acting for himself, to follow out the same course. Then when the testator is not satisfied with that, because no doubt it does not seem to bind the son sufficiently firmly, Messrs. Farrer point out to him the other alternative. But it is Scylla and Charybdis. It is plain that that which the father was so set upon, that the people should have no rights at all whatsoever, that the owner of Rushmore for the time being should do these things and get the credit of doing these things of his own free will, would be impossible if the alternative suggestion which Messrs. Farrer pointed out was carried out—that is say, if he had the intervention of trustees who should obtain the necessary leave from the court. Then when that correspondence has been read, the father has read to the son the codicil which had been previously drawn for him by Messrs. Creech —whether at his dictation or not I am not quite sure. We are asked to say that in consequence, then, of the son having promised the father that he would continue things as they were in his father's lifetime, a trust has been created which the court ought to enforce; that is to say, a trust has been created by the giving by the son of a promise which it would be unconscientious for the son not to perform. I cannot agree. I find no such promise at all. The only promise I do find is a promise which to my mind is much more consistent with the absence of a trust like that which is suggested here, than it is with the presence of it. I think, therefore, that the decision of Kekewich, J., was wrong, and that it ought to be reversed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case Kekewich, J., in the first place decided that the codicil as it stands created no trust, but simply contained absolute gifts in favour of the testator's son. But he held that it appeared from the evidence that the testator communicated the existence of this codicil to the son and at the same time disclosed to him his wishes with reference to the property, and exacted from the son an assurance that those wishes should be fulfilled. Under these circumstances he came to the conclusion that a trust had been created which could be enforced as against the son at the instance of the Attorney-General as representing the public. Now what were the wishes which were thus communicated to the son? In the first place the learned judge says this: "He"—that is, the testator—"certainly did intend him"—that is, the son—"to maintain the museum and grounds and to allow the public access thereto, and the son certainly accepted the gift of both with the assurance that this should be done." Then he adds this: "When giving the property already mentioned to the son for the purpose of maintaining the museum and grounds as heretofore the testator insisted that the public should have no rights." I think that the conclusions of fact at which the learned judge arrived as stated by him are justified by the evidence. The learned judge then proceeded to consider what was the effect of the communication of the wishes as found, with the result which I have stated. He came to the conclusion that a trust had been created which could be enforced. With the utmost respect I am unable to agree with that conclusion on that state of facts. It seems to me that when once you arrive at the conclusion that the public were to have no rights it is impossible to say that an effectual trust has been created, and looking at the whole evidence, which I shall not go into, I think that what the testator really meant to do was that which in the Irish case of M'Cormick v. Grogan, Ir. Rep. 1 Eq. 313, the Lord Justice of Appeal stated to have been the object of the testator whose bequests were the subject of consideration in that case. He considered there that the purpose was to set up after the decease of the testator not a trustee but as it were a second self, whom, while he communicates to him confidentially his ideas as to the distribution of his property, he desires to invest with all his own irresponsibility in carrying them into effect. The truth is that the testator, though he had with the utmost liberality afforded admission to the public to the museum and grounds, had anxiously guarded throughout his whole life against the public acquiring any rights against him. It appears from the evidence that he was equally anxious that no such rights should be acquired by the public against his successor, and I think the result is that he was satisfied by his son and successor undertaking an honourable obligation to carry on the museum and the grounds which had been thrown open to the public during the testator's lifetime in the same manner and to the same extent, and no further, as the testator himself had done. I agree, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree and I have very little to add. It seems to me that the testator's wish, as expressed by him to his son, was inconsistent with the true idea of a charity. The public were to have no rights. It may be that he desired to create that which not being in the view of the law charity would be void as a perpetuity. But I cannot see that the son is in any way bound to do more than to agree to hold the property upon the terms verbally expressed to him by the testator, and these terms do not create a charitable trust.

Appeal allowed.

ST. JAMES AND ST. JOHN, CLERKENWELL, VESTRY v. EDMONDSON & SON. (a.)

Metropolis—Management Acts—Street—"New street"—Sewering—Expenses—New buildings on one side of old street—Sewer put in on new side—Liability of frontagers—Highway forming boundary of metropolis—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 52, 53

An old highway which formed the boundary between the parish of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex, and the parish of Clerkenwell, in the County of London, had buildings erected on the Hornsey side of it for almost its whole length before 1856, when the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation. On the Clerkenwell side there were then only a few houses. Recently the Clerkenwell side also had been covered with buildings, and in 1898 the Clerkenwell Vestry laid down a sewer under their part of the highway to receive the drainage of the houses on their side. It was found as a fact that the road, taken as a whole, was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation.

Held, that, for the purpose of determining whether the frontagers on the Clerkenwell side of the road were liable under sections 52 and 53 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, to contribute to the expense of making the sewer as for the drainage of a "new street," the road must be treated as a whole, and the Clerkenwell side could not be treated as being by itself a new street.

Judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J. (49 W. R. 171, [1901] 1 K. B. 264), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.), on a special case stated by justices of the County of London sitting at Highgate: 49 W. R. 171, [1901] 1 K. B. 264.

The appellants were the Vestry of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell. The respondents were Messrs. Edmondson & Son.

A complaint was preferred by the appellants under sections 52 and 53 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, against the respondents, stating that the appellants during the years 1897 and 1898, in accordance with the provisions of the Metropolis Management Acts, executed certain works—viz., the construction of a sewer, and the works appertaining thereto, in a new street known as Colney Hatch-lane, for or in respect of certain premises in the said street of which the respondents were the owners, and that the appellants had thereby incurred expenses of which the amounts apportioned in respect of the respondents' premises were £130 6s. 8d. and £7 2s. 10d. respectively, and that the respondents had not paid the said sums nor any part thereof.

Colney Hatch-lane was an old highway forming the boundary between a detached portion of the parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, in the County of London, and the parish and urban district of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex. The actual boundary was nearly in the centre of the lane, but the greater part of the surface was within the parish of Clerkenwell.

Before the year 1856, when the first of the Metropolis Management Acts (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) came into operation, buildings had been erected on the Hornsey or Middlesex side of the lane along nearly the whole of its length, but on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane there were at that time only about seven or eight buildings at various points. the entire length of the lane was 2,993ft., and the character and extent of the buildings was shown on the ordnance map published in 1862. Since the year 1856, and more particularly within the last few years, the remainder of the Clerkenwell or London side had been laid out for building, and the greater part of the frontage to the lane was now covered with buildings.

In or about the year 1887 the Hornsey Local Board laid a sewer on their side of the lane for the drainage of the houses in their district. By agreement between that board and the appellants, two of the houses on the Clerkenwell side were drained into that sewer until the new sewer, the cost of which was in dispute, was constructed; and by agreement between the same board and the owners of two other houses on the Clerkenwell side, those owners connected their drains with the Hornsey sewer.

On the Clerkenwell side of the lane there was no sewer of any kind save a surface-water sewer, which had been laid for the drainage of the road itself, partly by the owners of adjoining land and partly by the appellants, and for a short distance an old brick sewer running obliquely across the lane and taking the drainage of three or four of the houses on that side.

The part of the parish of Clerkenwell which comprised the eastern side of Colney Hatch-lane was wholly detached from the rest of the parish, and was entirely surrounded by the county of Middlesex. For this reason it was found to be impracticable to provide an outlet into the metropolitan main drainage system from this part of the parish. By the Metropolitan Board of Works (Various Powers) Act, 1887, s. 44, the Metropolitan Board of Works (now the London County Council) were enabled by agreement with the local authorities of certain adjoining districts, or any of them, to cause any sewer or sewers constructed or to be constructed by such board in the said detached portion of Clerkenwell to communicate with the sewers of one or more of such authorities, and an agreement for this purpose was made in the year 1896 by the London County Council with the Friern Barnet Urban District Council, and an outlet for the sewage of the said detached part of Clerkenwell into a sewer of the London County Council, and thence into the Friern Barnet sewers, was provided in pursuance of the said agreement in the year 1897. As soon as such outlet was provided, the appellants laid down under their part of Colney Hatch-lane the sewer which was the subject of this case for the drainage of the houses and buildings which then were or might thereafter be erected on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane, and such sewer was completed in the year 1898.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that so much of Colney Hatch-lane as was within the parish of Clerkenwell was a "new street" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts, and that it had become a new street by reason of the erection of buildings fronting it as above mentioned; that in order to determine whether it had become a new street no regard could be had to the portion of the lane in the parish of Hornsey or to the buildings on the Hornsey side, these being in a different parish, district, and county, and subject to entirely different statutes.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that Colney Hatch-lane, taken as a whole, had become a street in the ordinary sense of the term by reason of the buildings erected along it before the year 1856, and was an old street when the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation, that no part of such street could become a new street subsequently by reason of the erection of additional buildings along it, and that the portion of the lane which was in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself without regard to the portion which was in Hornsey, or to the buildings on the Hornsey side, for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts.

The justices found that Colney Hatch-lane, taken as a whole, was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation, and they were of opinion that that portion of the lane which was in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street, and for those reasons they dismissed the summonses.

On the hearing of the special case, the Divisional Court upheld the decision of the justices.

The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Section 52 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1852, enacts as follows: "Where any sewer shall, after the passing of this Act, be constructed by any vestry or district board in or for the drainage of any new street, or of any house or houses erected since the 1st day of January, 1856, the expense of constructing such sewer and the works appertaining thereto . . . shall be borne and defrayed by the owners of such street or houses and of the land bounding or abutting on such street respectively, and the said expenses shall be apportioned by the vestry or district board in such proportion as they may deem just."

Macmorran, K.C. (C. F. Pritchard with him), for the appellants.—For the purpose of considering whether that part of the road which is in Clerkenwell is a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Act, that part should be treated by itself without regard to the other part of the road which is in Hornsey. The justices were wrong in thinking that the road must be treated as a whole. By section 112 of the Act of 1862 "new street" includes part of a street: see Richards v. Kessick, 57 L. J. M. C. 48. It would be absurd to construe this Act in such a way as to allow the fact that there have been houses on the Hornsey side of the road for many years to affect the question whether the part of the road which is in Clerkenwell is a new street. On this question depend certain rights and liabilities of the frontagers on the one hand, and of the whole body of ratepayers of Clerkenwell on the other. Those rights and liabilities ought not to be affected by something which has been done in past years entirely outside the parish of Clerkenwell by persons who were not even metropolitan ratepayers. The Clerkenwell part of the road, taken by itself, is a new street by reason of erection of houses along it since 1856: Pound v. Plumstead Board of Works, 20 W. R. 177, L. R. 7 Q. B. 183.

He referred to Property Exchange (Limited) v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 84 L. T. Rep. 689, 49 W. R. Dig. 120, and White v. Fulham Vestry, 74 L. T. Rep. 425, 44 W. R. Dig. 108.

Alexander Glen, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal ought to be dismissed. The question arises with regard to a certain old highway which forms the boundary between the parishes of Hornsey, in Middlesex, and Clerkenwell, in London. The actual boundary line runs somewhere near the middle of the highway, and is, as I understand, rather nearer to the Hornsey side of the road than to the Clerkenwell side. The Vestry of Clerkenwell, as the authority under the Metropolis Management Acts, are desirous of treating this highway as a new street in order that they may exercise their power of making the owners of houses fronting or abutting on it, pay the expenses of constructing a new sewer and sewerage works. If it is not a new street, then they have not got that power. Their contention is that that part of the highway which is within the parish of Clerkenwell may be deemed to be a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts.

The justices found that before the first Metropolis Management Act came into operation this highway had become a street by reason of the houses which had been built on the Hornsey side of it, and that it was therefore not a new street, but an old street. It seems to me that that is a question of fact. The question whether a particular highway has become a street, and when it became a street, cannot be a question of law, but must be a question of fact. Neither is this a case in which we have to trouble ourselves as to the area of an old highway, for no additions have been made to this highway. All that appears is that long before the sewer in question was constructed houses were built on the Hornsey side of the road in such numbers that the highway became a street. That being a question of fact, I think that the matter is concluded.

It seems to me that the argument of the appellants rests on a confusion between the physical fact of a particular highway being a street and the rights and liabilities of persons arising from the fact of its being a street. It introduces into the question of whether a highway is a street the question of what were the rights of the various owners of houses abutting on the highway with respect to the highway. The justices found that this highway was a street, within whosoever jurisdiction it was, and the Divisional Court affirmed their decision. In my opinion the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think there is great force in the observation of Kennedy, J., that, in the absence of authority, to create one more artificiality in the understanding of the expressions "street" and "new street" is certainly not to be desired. In my opinion Colney Hatch-lane was and is one street, and that an old street, and it ought not to be treated as two streets, an old and a new street.

Will—Remoteness—Restraint on anticipation—Separability of class.

A restraint on anticipation imposed by will on a class of females is valid as regards members of the class born in the testator's lifetime, though void for remoteness as regards those born afterwards.

Herbert v. Webster, 15 Ch. D. 610, 28 W. R. Dig. 197, followed

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Petition.

By his will, dated the 8th of February, 1834, a testator gave his real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and as to one-fourth share of the proceeds thereof upon trust (subject to the payment of £1,000 to his daughter Betsy) to invest and stand possessed of the same upon certain trusts as to the income thereof during the life of his said daughter Betsy, and after her death upon trust for all her children who should attain twenty-one years or be married in equal shares, and as to one other share of the proceeds thereof upon trust (subject to the payment of £1,000 to his daughter Esther) to lay out the same in like manner and stand possessed thereof upon the like trusts and with the like powers, restrictions, and declarations in all respects, and particularly against anticipation, for the benefit of his daughter Esther and her children as were thereinbefore given, expressed, and declared concerning the fourth share for the benefit of his daughter Betsy and her children.

The will contained a declaration that the dispositions therein made for his daughters and their children and also for any persons being females should be for their respective own sole and separate use and benefit, notwithstanding any coverture, to the end that the same might be for their respective separate use, maintenance, and support, and not be paid to them by anticipation.

The testator died on the 3rd of March, 1850. On the 19th of March, 1844, his daughter Esther married; there was issue of the marriage seven children, of whom the petitioner (a daughter) was one; some of the children (including the petitioner) were born before the testator's death, and some afterwards.

On the 10th of April, 1874, the petitioner married, and on the 21st of February, 1885 (during her coverture), she mortgaged her reversionary one-seventh part of one-fourth share in the estate of the testator

On the 17th of September, 1900, this one-fourth share became divisible.

On the 31st of July, 1901, the then sole trustee under the testator's will in pursuance of the Trustee Act, 1893, having notice of the conflicting claims of the petitioner and of the legal personal representative of the mortgagee, paid certain moneys representing the share of the petitioner into court.

The petitioner accordingly presented a petition praying that these moneys might be paid out to her.

A. Grant, for the petitioner.—The mortgage was void because the restraint on anticipation imposed on such of the females as were born in the testator's lifetime is not obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities: Herbert v. Webster, 15 Ch. D. 610, 28 W. R. Dig. 197, which overrides all earlier cases to the contrary. In that case Hall, V.C., refused to follow his previous decision in In re Michael's Trusts, 46 L. J Ch. 651, 25 W. R. Dig. 318. In all cases where the restraint can attach it ought to attach; whether it can attach or not depends in this case on whether the female was born before or after the testator's death: Wilson v. Wilson, 7 W. R. 26, 28 L. J. Ch. 95; In re Russell, 44 W. R. 100, [1895] 2 Ch. 698. In In re Ridley, 27 W. R. 527, 11 Ch. D. 645, Jessel, M.R., to whom Wilson v. Wilson was not cited, felt himself bound by earlier decisions to decide the contrary.

R. J. Parker, for the legal personal representative of the mortgagee, cited in addition Armitage v. Coates, 35 Beav. 1, and Cooper v. Laroche, 29 W. R. 438, 17 Ch. D. 368.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the trustee, took no part in the argument.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—I am bound by the decision of Hall, V.C, in Herbert v. Webster, which, I think, embodies the sounder view, and I, therefore, hold that the petitioner was restrained from anticipation during coverture

SEALEY v. TANDY. (a.)

Licensing law—Public-house—Right to refuse entry—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 18.

The occupier of licensed premises (other than an inn) may request any customer to leave the premises, even though he be not drunk, quarrelsome, violent, or disorderly.

Case stated by a magistrate dismissing a charge of assault against the respondent.

The appellant was the occupier and licensee of a public-house which was licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, but was not an inn.

On the 25th of February, 1901, the respondent entered the appellant's premises, from which he had several times previously been ejected and had been forbidden the house. The appellant ejected the respondent and received a severe kick in so doing.

The magistrate was of opinion that the respondent had not been guilty of any violent or disorderly conduct and that the kick given by him to the appellant was given in the course of resisting ejection, and that the appellant sought to eject the respondent on account of his disorderly conduct on former occasions. On these findings the magistrate dismissed the summons on the ground that the appellant's right to eject the respondent was limited by section 18 of the Licensing Act of 1872, and that on the authority of Dallimore v. Sutton, 62 J. P. 423, 46 W. R Dig. 93, the appellant could not eject the respondent unless he had been violent, drunken, quarrelsome, or disorderly. The question for the decision of the court was whether the magistrate was right in so holding, or whether the appellant could at any time require the respondent to leave his premises even though he had not been drunken, violent, quarrelsome, or disorderly, and eject him if he refused.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Bruce Williamson, with him), for the appellant.—The magistrate was wrong in holding that Dallimore v. Sutton decided on this point. That case only decides that a man must come within the category of persons named in section 18 in order to be convicted of refusing to leave licensed premises. There is no obligation on the part of a licence-holder to supply anyone, and the respondent had no right to be there. The right of entry is limited to a traveller at an inn, and this was not an inn nor was the respondent a traveller.

He cited Reg. v. Armagh Justices, [1897] 2 Ir. R. 57; Lamond v. Richard, 45 W. R. 289, [1897] 1 Q B. 541; Reg. v. Rymer, 25 W. R. 415, 2 Q. B. D. 136.

The respondent did not appear.

Nov. 8.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case stated by the magistrate who had dismissed the summons for assault because he considered that the proceedings out of which the assault arose were occasioned by the appellant (who is the occupier and licensee of a public-house) requesting the respondent to leave the premises and on his refusal attempting to forcibly eject him; and that therefore whatever followed he could not entertain the proceedings for assault.

The learned magistrate seems to have thought that the rights of a publican to request a person to leave his premises depended on section 18 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and that unless the person was drunk, violent, quarrelsome, or disorderly at that time he could not make such a request. We think he has overlooked two elements in this case. Firstly, that the house of the appellant was not an inn; and, secondly, that the person who was turned out or attempted to be turned out was not a traveller. These distinctions have been cited in many cases, in Reg. v. Armagh Justices and also in Reg. v. Rymer and other cases which have been cited to us. In our opinion the distinctions are well founded, and the occupier of a public-house has a right to request a person to leave whom he does not wish to remain on the premises. In our opinion the licensee of or occupier of licensed premises has a right to request a person to leave, except in the case of a traveller at an inn. The case must go back to the magistrate in order, if necessary, that the question of assault may be tried. The objection which the magistrate took was not well founded, and the appeal must be allowed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that there is, and always has been, a very great difference between the old kind of inn and the modern public-house. In a passage in the judgment of Holmes, J., in Reg. v. Armagh Justices, it is said that the English inn was coeval with English literature. I have no doubt that the learned judge was thinking of the inn as described in Chaucer, and perhaps as described by Dr. Johnson. I could not help recalling, as I heard that, the passage in which Dr. Johnson said one of the characteristics of an inn was that you were made welcome, and that the more noise you made, the more trouble you gave, the more welcome you were. Having made this statement he proceeded, as Boswell said, to repeat with great emotion a well-known verse.

This particular person did not make himself welcome. He was a person who belonged to a disorderly gang, who would not be a good customer as the publican well knew, and the latter therefore acted on his undoubted right in saying, "I am quite ready to serve some customers, even noisy customers, and I serve them, but you are the kind of customer who not only makes a noise but will do me no good, and I will not serve you; I have the choice like other shopkeepers and I shall not serve you" It seems to me in acting so the appellant was acting for the public advantage because the other customers might very well have complained if he were to allow a person who to his knowledge was a member of a disorderly gang to frequent his premises. If he allowed one he must all of the gang, and by allowing such a gang to frequent the house he would undoubtedly endanger his licence. I think, therefore, that he was not only acting well within his rights when he told the respondent to leave his premises, and the respondent ought at once to have done so.

REX v. ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.
In re GORE.
Ex parte COBHAM AND GARBETT. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Mandamus—Confirmation of bishop-elect by Archbishop or Vicar-General—Objections as to doctrine—25 Hen. 8, c. 20.

There is no jurisdiction in the Archbishop of Canterbury or his Vicar-General to entertain, upon the confirmation of the election of a bishop-elect, objections raised to such confirmation alleging ecclesiastical offences—the contravention of the articles of religion by the publication of false doctrine, want of prudence and discretion, and unfitness to fill the office of a bishop.

Semble, that a mandamus will not lie to the Archbishop to compel him to inform his mind as to the fitness of the bishop-elect before he proceeds to confirmation.

In this case cause was shown against two rules nisi for a mandamus directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. C. A. Cripps, K.C., the Vicar-General, commanding them or one of them, at a court to be therefor duly holden in the matter of the confirmation of the election of the Rev. Canon Gore, D.D., to the bishopric of Worcester, to permit and admit to appear in due form of law Alexander William Cobham and Edward Henry Garbett, to oppose the confirmation of the said election; and to hear and determine upon such opposition, and upon the articles, matters, and proofs thereof.

The facts of the case and the arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgments of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 10.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following written judgment: These were two rules in the same terms moved on behalf of two gentlemen of the names of Cobham and Garbett calling on his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury and Charles Alfred Cripps, Esq., Vicar-General, "to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them commanding them, or one of them, at a court to be therefor duly holden in the cause or business or matter of the confirmation of the election of the Rev. Charles Gore, D.D., to the bishopric of Worcester, to permit and admit to appear in due form of law the said Alex. William Cobham, chairman of the Church Association, to oppose the said confirmation of the said election of the said Rev. Charles Gore, D.D., and to hear and determine upon such opposition, and upon the articles, matters, and proofs thereof." Cause was shewn against these rules on behalf of the Crown and on behalf of the Archbishop and Vicar-General. It appeared from the affidavits that the Rev. Canon Gore having been duly nominated in letters missive from his Majesty the King was elected Bishop of Worcester by his Dean and Chapter of Worcester acting under royal licence, and was then presented for confirmation to the Archbishop. On the 16th of January the Archbishop of Canterbury had issued a citation substantially in the form which has for many years been used on such occasions, but to which was added the following note or addition: "Persons claiming to be heard as objectors must deliver notice of their objections in writing at the office of the Provincial Registry, No. 3, Creed-lane, Ludgate-hill, before 4 p.m. on Tuesday, the 21st of January inst. No objection will be considered unless such written statement has been delivered. The Vicar-General will sit in chambers at committee room No. 2 at the said Church House, at 10 a.m. on Wednesday, the 22nd inst., to consider any objections which may have been delivered, and no objector who does not appear in chambers and establish his right to appear and be heard can appear or be heard during the business of confirmation." In accordance with the direction contained in such note certain persons acting in the same interest as Mr. Cobham appeared in chambers and handed in to the Vicar-General printed objections, which were verified by affidavit, and Mr. Garbett and certain other gentlemen handed in certain other objections in writing, to which it is not necessary to refer in detail. It is sufficient to say that the objection handed in on behalf of Mr. Garbett alleged that the Rev. Canon Gore, the bishop-elect, had committed ecclesiastical offences, and had published false doctrine, and had thereby contravened the articles of religion, and that he was by reason of such publications unfit to be entrusted with the care and superintendence of a diocese. The other set of objections alleged, among other things, that Canon Gore was not a prudent and discreet man, and not at all a fit and proper person to fill the office of bishop, by reason of certain passages in his published works, and, further, that he had been a member of certain societies mentioned in the objections. The learned Vicar-General, after considering the nature of the objections, declined to hear any of the objectors in support of them, and after taking the names of the objectors, gave his decision that they were not objections which he could entertain. He gave reasons for arriving at that decision, set out in the shorthand notes verified by affidavit and read before us.

The question raised is, no doubt, one of extreme importance. We have been greatly assisted by the arguments of the learned counsel who have appeared before us on both sides, and also by the full report of the arguments which took place in the case of The Queen v. The Archbishop of Canterbury, reported in 11 Q. B. 483, and also by Mr. Jebb. Without that assistance it would have been impossible for me to prepare my judgment within so short a time after the argument; but I have endeavoured to prepare the reasons for the judgment which I am about to give as quickly as possible, because we are aware that it is very important in the interests of the diocese that there should be no delay in dealing with the matter. One main ground of the contention of the learned counsel in support of the rule was that the Vicar-General was sitting as a court to which opposers had been summoned by virtue of the citation of the 16th of January, and that they were entitled in accordance with the terms of the citation to state any ground of opposition to the election or confirmation of Canon Gore, and therefore to raise by way of opposition the charges of ecclesiastical offences and the other objections referred to in the notices. The case was in the first instance launched when the rule was moved, as a claim for a mandamus to compel a court of limited jurisdiction to exercise the jurisdiction which it was bound to exercise at the instance of the parties who demanded its exercise. I am of opinion that the rules could only be made absolute if that position can be maintained, and that unless it is made out, no mandamus ought to issue. It was on this basis that the case was considered by the judges of the Queen's Bench in The Queen v. The Archbishop of Canterbury: see the judgment of Coleridge, J., at p. 577, and the judgment of Patteson, J., at p. 633 of the report in 11 Q. B., and the authorities upon the point which are collected in Tapping on Mandamus, pp. 230 et seq. This point will be found of considerable importance in view of an alternative contention urged on behalf of Mr. Cobham by Mr. Haldane, to which I will refer later, to the effect that the court ought also to grant a mandamus to compel the Archbishop of Canterbury to consider these particular objections in order to inform his mind as to whether or not Canon Gore was a fit person to be confirmed and consecrated as a bishop. Dealing with the ground first mentioned—the claim thus set up is a claim that any member of the public, or at least any inhabitant of the diocese interested, who desires to oppose the confirmation and consecration of any person who has been elected a bishop may appear in answer to the citation of the Archbishop and call upon the Vicar-General or the Archbishop to hear and decide alleged charges of heresy, false doctrine, or other alleged ecclesiastical offences, or, secondly, to inquire into and give judgment upon general objections to the fitness for the episcopal office of the person nominated by the Crown, duly elected by the dean and chapter, and presented to the Archbishop for confirmation. It was not disputed by the learned counsel who supported the rules that, in order to make good this first contention, we must hold that the act of confirmation done by the Archbishop or the Vicar-General was the act of a court having jurisdiction to hear and determine such questions at the instance of the persons raising them.

The question primarily depends upon the true construction to be put upon the Act 25 Hen. 8, c. 20. Briefly summarized that Act by section 4 enables the king on every voidance of an archbishopric or bishopric to grant to the dean and chapter a licence to proceed to the election of a person named in a letter missive sent by the king, and provides that the dean and chapter shall elect and choose the person so named. By section 5 it provides that, if the dean and chapter elect and choose such person, then their election shall stand good and effectual to all intents; and further, that the king may by letters patent under the great seal signify the election to the Archbishop and require and command him to confirm the election and to invest and consecrate the person so elected. Section 4 contains a further provision that, if the dean and chapter defer or delay the election for more than twelve days, the king may by letters patent nominate and present to the said office such person as he thinks able and convenient. The 7th section provides that the failure of the dean and chapter to elect in accordance with the king's licence and letters missive or the refusal of the Archbishop to confirm, invest, and consecrate such person within twenty days after the king's letters patent have come to his hands shall involve the one or the other in the dangers and penalties of the Statute of Præmunire. Upon the construction of this statute, speaking for myself, I can add little if anything to the judgment of Erle, J., in which I entirely concur. There is in the statute no mention of any examination or inquiry by the Archbishop; but he is directed to confirm the election within a period of twenty days, nor does the statute on the face of it in terms contemplate or directly or indirectly suggest that the Archbishop can in any way question the fitness of the person nominated by the Crown unless such power is involved in the use of the word "confirm." If the Archbishop had such a general right the position of the Crown would be extraordinary and, as was pointed out by the Attorney-General in reply, far worse than the patron of an ordinary living in relation to his patronage. Without now enlarging upon a matter from some aspects of considerable importance, I may point out that bishoprics have always had largely the character of donatives; and, if the Archbishop possessed the right to veto the nominees of the Crown, I know of no legal proceeding by which the king can enforce his rights as patron. We have nothing to do on this application with any question of refusal or unwillingness on the part of an Archbishop executing his high office to confirm or consecrate; the Archbishop would do so upon his own responsibility, and would incur the risk of præmunire contemplated by the statute. No question was, or could be, raised before us upon the argument of these rules as to the consequences of such an act. I mention this because both in the argument of Bishop Hampden's case (Jebb) and on the argument before us what appear to me to be extravagant suggestions were made that the Archbishop might be compelled to confirm as bishop a man who was not a priest in holy orders, a person under the age of thirty, a Jew or Turk, a pronounced infidel, or one having some other obvious disqualification, and there is a strong passage in the judgment of Coleridge, J. (11 Q. B., at p. 604, Jebb, p. 465) to the same effect. We are not dealing with any such case, and, in my opinion, these considerations do not assist us. We have only to read the history of the last 150 years of our own times to know that the choice of persons to fill the high office of a bishop is a matter of most anxious consideration by the Crown, and that advice is given by those who are most competent to guide in the selection of fit persons.

We have in this case to deal with the claim of those on behalf of whom these rules were moved, to appear upon this citation before the Archbishop or his Vicar-General and to demand a judicial decision upon the objections which they have raised. I have not omitted to notice the limit of twenty days fixed by section 7. I am rather inclined to agree with the argument presented by Mr. Danckwerts and other learned counsel that this limit should not be considered absolutely binding if an objection was lawfully raised which would lead the Archbishop to refuse or postpone confirmation. But, upon the other hand, a set limit of days does seem wholly inconsistent with the idea that the statute referred to a recognized practice whereby opponents might raise questions which might not possibly be determined except by protracted litigation. To meet the plain objection which arises upon the words of the statute, it was urged that the words "confirm such election" in section 5 and "confirm" in section 7 refer to a practice of confirmation alleged to be well known which was said to have existed in normal circumstances in the Church of England at some period prior to the passing of the Act, a practice under which it was contended that there was a duty on the part of the Archbishop before confirming any person, although such person had been named by the king and duly elected by the dean and chapter, to inquire at the stage of confirmation as to his fitness, having regard to the qualifications of a bishop as laid down in the canons of the Church, and that as a consequence persons who were of opinion that the person named was not fit to be a bishop would be entitled to appear before the Archbishop and be heard. It was not suggested that this practice was actually existing in the Church of England at the date of the passing of the Act of 1533; on the contrary, Mr. Haldane admitted, and made it a part of his argument, that what he called the normal practice had been interrupted from 1316 up to 1533, a period of upwards of 200 years. But he contended strenuously that prior to 1316 the practice at any rate of examination by the bishop had taken place under what he called the normal state of things, and that the words "and confirm" used in sections 5 and 7 were meant to refer to that pre-existing practice, involving, as he said, the right of opposers to appear before the Archbishop and raise objections. It was also contended that the forms which were used shortly after the passing of the Act, and which have continued in use substantially in the same form from that time down to the present—a period of upwards of 375 years—must have been intended to recognize the right of the opposer to be heard and demand judicial investigation. If the evidence supported the contention that there was at the time of the passing of the Act such a practice it would have been necessary to consider more closely the true effects of the words in section 4 of the Act, "their election shall stand good and effectual to all intents," and, further, whether the continuance of any such practice was consistent with the express provisions of the statute. I must not be thought to express any opinion that, even if such practice had been established, persons could have claimed the benefit of it, having regard to the clear language of the statute. But, after the most careful consideration of the many matters, historical and legal, which have been brought before us, I am clearly of opinion that there is no evidence of the existence of any such established practice prior to the passing of the statute, and that the forms, which, as I have said, have been used without alteration from that time to the present, were not intended to refer to or to revive any practice of the kind. The uniform practice in usage since the year 1533 is practically conclusive against the contention that it is possible to construe the statute as referring to any such practice or right. It is absolutely essential to keep clearly in view the distinction between the state of things in the Church when bishops were really elected by some electoral body and when the metropolitan had, as such, the responsibility of inquiring into and confirming the choice of the electors after that choice had been made. From the earliest days of the Church it has no doubt been recognized that a bishop should possess certain qualifications. They are to be found in many ancient ecclesiastical works and were in great part based originally upon the Epistles of St. Paul. Speaking of the foreign canon law, I think it is established that from very early times, when the choice of bishops was by actual election, there was inquiry and occasionally examination by a superior authority—not infrequently the metropolitan—as to the qualifications of the person elected; see, among other authorities, the decretum of Pope Nicholas, Corpus Juris Canonici, pt. 1, p. 79, Richter's edition, 1879, which, I think, refers to Pope Nicholas II., who lived about 1058, and which was read to us by Mr. Haldane. So far as the foreign canon law is concerned, and the practice of the early Church, I think that substantially the same directions could be found at a very much earlier date; but I need scarcely say that, whatever may be the view adopted when any question arises in the Ecclesiastical Court, the foreign canon law, unless accepted in this country and thereby having become English canon law, does not form part of that law of England which we are administering to-day. The work of Lancelottus, to which reference was made both in the argument before us and in Hampden's case, appears to me to be treating of the qualification of bishops and the examination of bishops-designate according to the foreign canon law, and not to be treating of the practice or order of confirmation in England either before or after the statute; and I understand the reference in the judgment in Evans v. Ascuithe, Jones 158, Palmer 457, to be a reference to him as a writer in that capacity. See Palmer, p. 472. Turning now to the evidence before us of the practice in England prior to the statute and during the period suggested by Mr. Haldane as being the normal period—namely, prior to 1316—we were referred to the cases taken from Wharton's Anglia Sacra mentioned in the argument of Mr. Badeley, Jebb, pp. 345-349. None others were cited to us on the argument of this case, and having regard to the great learning of the counsel who argued Hampden's case, I should doubt whether any can be found. I am not in a position to add to them from my own knowledge or research. I have carefully examined in the Anglia Sacra the cases therein cited. All except one, that of Wakeryng, occurred between 1189 and 1316. They do seem to me to establish that during that period in some instances a day was given for opposers to appear—see the case of Rochester in 1316 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1, 357); that in some cases the Archbishop did decline to confirm the election on grounds based upon the canon law—see the case of Winchester in 1274 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1, 315); and in some cases was an appeal to Rome—see the cases of Ely in there 1256 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1, 637), Worcester in 1302 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1), 531, and Ely in 1310 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1, 640); and that in some cases there was an examination as to competence and doctrine before confirmation—see the case of Durham in 1213 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1, 735), and Rochester, 1227 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1, 348). The only case later than 1316 which has been mentioned to us was that of Wakeryng, Bishop of Norwich, in 1416 (Anglia Sacra, vol. 1, 417), which does not assist the argument. Beyond the above points, however, nothing can be gathered from the particulars given of the character of the objections, if any, raised by the opposers. It is, however, most important to note that, as far as I can gather from the statement in Anglia Sacra, in every one of these cases prior to 1316 there had been a real election either by the dean and chapter or by the prior and convent, so that they relate to a period when there was a real election to be confirmed. It is to this period—namely, the beginning of the thirteenth century, 1227, that the Legatine Constitutions of Otho and Othobon refer. They no doubt express the English canon law, but they have no reference to the actual state of things at the time of the passing of the statute, or for many years before. But from about the year 1316 down to the passing of the statute in 1533, a period of over 200 years, an entirely different state of things seems to have prevailed. At one time the popes were insisting upon the right not only to confirm, but to select; at another the Crown was resisting the Papal claims. Sometimes the struggle would appear to have been between the pope on the one side and the metropolitan or the electing corporation on the other, be it dean and chapter or abbot and convent. Confirmations at times took place at Rome, at times in England under Bulls from the Pope, and during the last fifty years immediately preceding the statute some authorities state that the King had successfully defended his claim to nominate independently of any interference by the pope: Green's History of the English People, and Stubbs's Constitutional History. In my opinion, during a period of more than 200 years prior to 1533 there was no recognized practice at all; but it is sufficient to say that there is no evidence of any such normal practice as that which was contended for by the counsel who supported the rules, and that, therefore, it is, in my opinion, impossible to say that in using the word "confirm" the statute was referring to a procedure well known and understood at the time in any such sense as the argument of the applicants assumes. I must notice one other argument. It was said that "confirm" must be used with reference to the canon law and that, inasmuch as by the ancient foreign canon law a bishop had to possess qualifications, and it was the duty of the archbishop before ordaining a bishop to be satisfied that he possessed the qualifications, to that extent the canon law was recognized by and incorporated with the statute. I am wholly unable to assent to this line of argument. I need not cite authorities to show that it is well established that the foreign canon law only forms part of the law of England in so far as it has been adopted into the English common law, ecclesiastical or civil, or recognized by statute; and, unless it can be contended that by the law of England apart from the foreign canon law the word "confirm" used in the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 20, imported this duty on the part of the archbishop and the correlative right of opposers, the foreign canon law cannot, in my opinion, be appealed to for the purpose of establishing that any such duty or right existed. If it could be successfully maintained that an examination of the fitness of a bishop-elect, to take place at the stage of confirmation, was at the date of the passing of the statute considered a necessary condition of the consecration and appointment of all bishops, the matter would stand on a very different footing.

But it was contended by the counsel for the Crown and the Archbishop, and not disputed by the counsel who supported the rules, that in a considerable number of instances no confirmation took place; and, as illustrative of this, it was stated by Mr. Dibdin in the course of his argument that at the present time out of upwards of 100 bishops of the Church of England not more than twenty-five would be elected subject to confirmation. That this was to a certain extent a state of things contemplated by the statute and ending at, and shortly after, its passing cannot be disputed. It is, in my opinion, very important to observe that in the case contemplated by the statute itself—namely, of an archbishop or bishop being nominated by the king by letters patent in default of election—no confirmation is to take place, but the statute enacted that the person so nominated is to be invested and consecrated by the archbishop. Again, in the case of the bishops of the Irish Church under 2 Eliz. c. 4 (Ireland), no confirmation was necessary. It is not quite clear to me whether the bishops appointed under the statute 31 Hen. 8, c. 9, are cases in point—at any rate except during the period between that date and the repeal of that statute by 1 Philip and Mary, c. 8, when they came under the general law. I think it will be found Evans v. Ascuithe did, at any rate, show that Bristol, one of the six sees established by the Act 31 Hen. 8, c. 9, was under the general law in the time of Charles II. I have not had time to look and see whether there was any general law at the time of the passing of the statute of 31 Hen. 8, which would put those sees under it. I am not quite sure about it. I do not stop to consider the case of Colonial and Indian bishops, or the appointment of bishops of St. Albans under the statute of 1875, and Liverpool, Newcastle, Wakefield, and Southwell under the Act of 1878, because they are of a much later date; but the practical contemporary statutes to which I have referred show that at that time the confirmation of a bishop by an Archbishop was not in all cases an essential step in the appointment of a bishop. In the case of bishops other than those elected by deans and chapters in in use when elections really had to be inquired into, and that the reference in Ayliffe, to which I have already referred as to the summoning of persons nominatim (p. 245) who had opposed the election, and in general where there had been no opposition, gives an indication of the genesis of the forms. We were referred by the Attorney-General to the practice on the confirmation of the election of deans (Coke upon Littleton, 96*a*). The forms in use upon these occasions are set out in Oughton's Ordo Judiciorum, vol. 2, p. 97, et seq., form. 227. The commission to the Vicar-General there directs him to approve, ratify, confirm, "ac si opus fuerit, ac res ita exegerit . . ."annul and make void the election. The whole passage is important, and will repay examination in connection with the matter under discussion. The citation set out at p. 99, which corresponds in many respects with the citation in use in the case of a bishop since 1535, was published in a similar manner. A comparison between these documents and those added on the occasion of the confirmation of a bishop after 1533 leads me to surmise that in all probability the view suggested by Mr. Bramwell Davis is correct—namely, that the forms are based on forms in use before the statute, having been originally framed to meet the practice existing as far back as the twelfth, or even the eleventh century, in the case of the confirmation of elections generally, and that the important and fundamental differences which exist between the two forms, subsequent to the statute may be due to the fact that old forms were properly adapted to the new state of things, the words "infirmandum, annullandum, irritandum, et cassandum" being omitted and the words confirmatio and confirmari alone retained, the public notices and citation of opposers being advisedly retained in case there should be any defect in the election, and also to preserve the public character of the proceedings. I have not been able to find in Oughton a corresponding form in the case of the confirmation of a bishop; the earlier chapter on the subject in this work I have already referred to. It must be remembered that ever since the statute, although, in my opinion, the proceedings by way of confirmation are formal in the sense that no general opposition can be raised at that stage to the fitness of the person elected, they were still a proceeding of a solemn character, in which, after the original licence, return of the election, Letters Patent, and other necessary steps were formally proved, confirmation by the Archbishop, or his representative the Vicar-General, followed. It seems to me not unnatural that the desire to maintain the dignity and public character of the act of confirmation and election should have led to the retention of the ancient practice of summoning opposers to appear if they thought fit.

It was further contended that, because the proceedings include a summary petition which alleges the various steps, and contains among other allegations a statement (see Jebb, p 64) that the bishop-elect is a learned person and fulfils some of the qualifications which were from the earliest days considered necessary for a bishop, and that as this allegation in Parker's case was supported or formally proved by the evidence of two witnesses, who deposed to the various paragraphs of the summary petition, this showed that the proceedings were in the nature of proceedings before a court, and that opponents could traverse those allegations, be heard upon them, and the Vicar-General might either pass judgment, or, if he thought fit, delay the confirmation, and refer the matter to the Archbishop. It is to be noted, however, that these witnesses are called by the proctor for the dean and chapter; and, in my judgment, they are the formal proof of matters which have to be given, if I may borrow an expression from the Probate Court, in solemn form as laying the foundation for the confirmation. We were informed by the Attorney-General and Mr. Dibdin in the course of the argument that a summary petition is a petition which has evidence, to use their expression, "attached to it," but is not proved like a formal suit by libel or articles. It was urged by Mr. Bramwell Davis that because the writs, as set out in various volumes of Rymer's Fœdera both before and after the statute, were in the same form, it must be assumed that the forms and practice in use immediately after the statute had been in use before. Even assuming this to be the case, I do not think it assists us materially in dealing with the question, because the writs, as I understand them, only direct the Archbishop to confirm, but do not contain any words indicating that which was included or covered by the word confirmation. I should, however, observe that an examination of the forms as set out in Parker's case shows that they could not have been in all respects the same as those before the statute, because reference is made in them to the statute. For the same reasons the statute 3 Hen. 5 (1418), set out at p. 350 of Jebb, does not carry the matter any further, as it only refers in general terms to confirmation. We were pressed to say that the opinion of Bishop Fell, p. 389 of Dr. Nicholls's Commentary on the Book of Common Prayer, cited at p. 390 of Jebb, is only consistent with the view that there was a judicial inquiry into the qualifications of the bishop at the stage of confirmation. Having regard to the object with which these words were written, as indicated by Mr. Baddeley in his argument in the Hampden case, and looking to the language of the passages quoted themselves, they fall far short of any such proposition, and cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as authorities upon the legal questions argued before us.

There is, in my opinion, another fundamental difficulty in the view that the proceedings of confirmation before the Vicar-General are to be regarded as the proceedings of a court, in which it is the duty of the Vicar-General or the Archbishop to adjudicate judicially upon the grounds of the objections raised by the opponents. It is to this that I alluded when I referred earlier in my judgment to the necessity, if the arguments in support of the rule are correct, for independent legal proceedings to be taken at the stage of confirmation. This difficulty arises from the fact that, as far as I can see, the bishop-elect, though present at the confirmation and taking certain oaths there, is not a party to the proceedings in the proper sense of the word. The proceedings are initiated by the dean and chapter, and the citation is not addressed to the bishop-elect. If charges of ecclesiastical offences can at that stage, and as a part of those proceedings, be preferred against the bishop-elect, there is no trace of any machinery or practice for getting him before the court for this purpose, or for dealing with the numerous questions of procedure or costs which are likely to arise. I put this difficulty to Mr. Danckwerts, who contended, as part of his argument, that among the objections raised by the opposer for whom he appeared were charges of ecclesiastical offences. He replied that it would be the duty of the Vicar-General to permit the opposer to appear and bring in articles, or, in effect, to commence formal criminal proceedings against the bishop-elect. I can see no trace of any such procedure, and it seems to me to be utterly foreign to the nature of the proceedings on confirmation, as it has existed in the United Kingdom for upwards of 600 years.

When pressed with the difficulty which lay in the way of contending that the proceeding of the Vicar-General was in the nature of a judicial proceeding by a court of limited jurisdiction, and that a mandamus would go, at the instance of the party aggrieved, to compel the court to exercise its jurisdiction, Mr. Haldane based his contention upon another ground—namely, that the Archbishop had a duty to inform his mind before he confirmed the bishop-elect, and, that being so, he was bound to inquire into any objection raised by objectors and postpone the confirmation until he had so inquired; or, in other words, that he was bound to inform his mind upon any matters which the objectors chose to raise. I hope I have not done the argument injustice. I endeavoured to appreciate it, and have refreshed my memory by reference to the shorthand note. If the application for mandamus can only be based on the duty of the Archbishop to inform his mind as to the fitness of the bishop-elect before he proceeds to confirm the election, or consecrate the person elected, it must fail. We cannot direct him to inform his mind in any particular way. The distinction between such a case and the case of refusal to exercise jurisdiction is well pointed out in the judgments of the Court of King's Bench in The King v. The Archbishop of Canterbury, 15 East. 117 (referred to in the judgment of my brother Wright), and the judgment in Reg. v. Bishop of Chichester, 7 W. R. 629, 29 L. J. Q. B. 23 at p. 30. As I have pointed out at the beginning of my judgment, no question of that kind can possibly arise before us, and there is, so far as I know, no precedent for a mandamus being granted in such a case as that suggested by Mr. Haldane.

If the claim of the opposers to appear, based upon their charges against the bishop of ecclesiastical offences, cannot be supported, I am clearly of opinion that the other vague allegations contained in the objections are not charges which any ecclesiastical court could entertain; nor can they be regarded as grounds which, in the view of the law already indicated, either the Vicar-General or Archbishop should entertain at the stage of confirmation. So far as the objections were based upon charges of heresy or ecclesiastical offences, there is a further objection which should, I think, receive attention. It has been invariably laid down by writers on ecclesiastical law that such charges must be alleged with precision and particularity (see, among others, Ayliffe, p. 345), so that the person charged may know exactly what offence is alleged against him. This view of the law has been repeatedly enforced by the Ecclesiastical Courts and Privy Council. As I understand them, these decisions rest not on any modern rule or practice, but upon the nature of the alleged offences, as, for instance, breaches of the statute 13 Eliz, c. 12. If this be so, it seems to afford an additional argument against the possibility of such charges being entertained in such proceedings as those which are now under consideration.

A point was raised in argument by the Attorney-General on which I do not express any opinion, but which I ought not to leave entirely unnoticed. These proceedings for confirmation have for a great many years taken place before the Vicar-General. As far as I can gather from the authorities cited on the argument and from some others which I have been able to consult, the court of the Vicar-General does not entertain contentious cases. This is clearly laid down in Oughton's Prolegomena, p. 16, and is supported by Ayliffe's Parergon, p. 160; Lyndwood, liber 2, tit. 4, p. 104; and there is the high authority of Lord Stowell in the case of Thorp v. Mansell, 1 Haggard's Consistory Cases, 4*n*, in which the limit of the jurisdiction of the Vicar-General in such matters is clearly pointed out. But inasmuch as the letters patent to Mr. Cripps appointing him Vicar-General also appointed him official principal, I am not sure that the objection raised by the Attorney-General is of substance; the point may require further consideration should the extent of the jurisdiction of the Vicar-General ever become a matter for decision. It is not, in my opinion, necessary to decide that in no case can any objection be raised at the stage of confirmation which might have to be investigated by the Vicar-General or the Archbishop, as, e.g., an objection to the validity of the election or the genuineness of the documents produced, the identity of the person elected with the person named in the letters missive, or possibly some action or conduct of the bishop-elect since the time of his election; but I hold, for the reasons I have given, that the Vicar-General ought not to entertain, still less adjudicate upon, charges of the character alleged in the objections tendered by either of the opponents to the confirmation in this case.

As regards the note or addendum to the citation, I need only repeat that which I said upon the motion for the rules nisi, that, in my opinion, it would be no ground for mandamus that the Archbishop or Vicar-General had required objections to be presented in writing before the actual ceremony; but I may add that, in view of the questions that have been raised, I think it a proper course, so that the character of the proposed objections, if any, may be fully considered.

For the above reasons, which I have expressed, I fear, at too great length, and yet not with the clearness with which I might have expressed them had more time for research and consideration been at my disposal, I am clearly of opinion that these rules should be discharged. I cannot part with the case without observing that it seems to me worthy of consideration whether the form of public citation, which ought to be retained for some purposes, should not be modified so as to meet the real case and remove the possibility of the observation that it is a temptation to people to raise questions at an unsuitable time and place. If the facilities for trying questions of heresy or other ecclesiastical offences are not sufficient the law should be amended. But, if the view which I have expressed is correct, I venture to deprecate the attempt to raise in a proceeding wholly unfitted for the purpose matters which must have received the anxious consideration of the responsible advisers of the Crown before the name of any person is inserted in the letters missive to the dean and chapter.

WRIGHT, J., read the following judgment: I can add nothing of importance to the judgment which has just been read; and it is only because of the division of opinion in Bishop Hampden's case that it is necessary to state the manner in which I arrive at the same conclusion as my lord. Even if the case depended solely upon the language of the statute 25 Henry 8, c. 20, I should have strongly inclined to the opinion of Erle, J. that the language of the statute precludes the Archbishop from entertaining judicially any objection whatever to the election made in accordance with the sovereign's command. If, indeed, anything were brought to his notice by opponents or otherwise which might suggest to him that the sovereign had been deceived or misinformed, he might, in my opinion, properly delay confirmation or consecration until the sovereign's direction could be taken. But it seem to me nearly impossible to construe the statute as authorizing the Archbishop to declare judicially that the election which the statute says is to stand good and effectual to all intents, and which he is expressly directed to confirm, is void. If it had been intended to give him such a power or discretion some provision must have been made for the manner and consequences of rejection. And, I think, there is much force in the Attorney-General's argument that it is incredible that the Crown should have been intended to be in a worse position than a private patron, who can enforce his nomination by quare impedit. No doubt the Crown has, in the præmunire a more effectual remedy in a case in which it is appropriate than the subject has and it is appropriate enough if the Archbishop has no jurisdiction or discretion; but it would not be appropriate for determining whether the Archbishop has rightly exercised a jurisdiction or discretion vested in him by law. But the case does not depend solely on the language of the statute. About 350 years have elapsed since the statute was passed, and it is admitted that there has not during all that time been any case in which the Archbishop has entertained an objection to the election of a bishop on the Crown's nomination. Nor does the case stand as if the matter had never been considered. It was definitely raised so early as 1629 in Mountague's case, and it has been the subject of observation and discussion by text writers during the whole period since the passing of the statute. It has twice, at least, been the subject of decision by eminent civilians—in the case of Bishop Hampden and again in the case of Bishop Temple—and, in my judgment, there is a great preponderance of opinion in favour of this construction. We do not know with any accuracy what was the reality of opposition to confirmation of elections of bishops before the statute of Henry VIII., but we have abundant and uncontradicted evidence that since the statute the opposition has been treated as a mere form. We have a complete register of the proceedings at the confirmation of Archbishop Parker in 1559, shortly after the date of the statute, and substantially the same forms have been continued to the present day, and they show in the most convincing manner that although an ancient form of objection has been preserved, it has never since the statute retained, if it ever possessed, any reality. The only judicial inquiry has been whether the proper forms of election have been followed, and whether the bishop-elect was qualified as the law requires; and even this inquiry has always, so far as we know, taken the form of summary and ex parte proof by the electoral chapter without any admission of traverse by objectors.

Then, even if it is still necessary to cite opposers, and even if they ought to be heard to state their objections, I think that the only conclusion would be that the opposers have no locus standi to do more than to suggest to the Archbishop the matters of objection, not as matters for decision by him, but at most as matters which in his discretion he may take into consideration for the purpose of deciding whether he will make any representation to the Sovereign; and if so, mandamus will not lie. The case is not like Rex v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 1812, in 15 East. at p. 140, where the Archbishop was bound to exercise a judicial discretion as to the licensing of a lecturer, and where it was said that he ought not to reject proper means of information to guide his judicial discretion. Here there is no judicial discretion to exercise as to the particular objections raised. The principal opposer's objection in this case is one of heresy, and where the Archbishop is called upon to defer the confirmation on a ground of this kind it is not immaterial to ask what means he has for trying such a question. Consistently with the forms in use for 350 years there is no room for such an inquiry. No procedure is provided, or ever has been provided for it. The bishop-elect is not made a party. No sentence could be pronounced. If in such a case a mandamus were to go we should in effect be directing the Archbishop to try and determine issues of heresy without any established form of procedure and without power to pass any sentence or to do anything but inform his own conscience. I know of nothing to show that he can have any such right or power which could properly be described as jurisdiction; and if he has not what amounts to jurisdiction, the mandamus cannot go.

RIDLEY, J., read a written judgment, which was in the following terms: But for the importance of this case I should not have thought it necessary to add anything to the judgments of my lord and my brother Wright, with which I agree. The question is, whether a mandamus ought to go to the Archbishop of Canterbury to order him to hear and decide on objections made by the applicants on doctrinal grounds to the confirmation of the election of the Rev. Canon Gore to the bishopric of Worcester. The answer depends upon the proper construction of the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 20. Does that statute place on the Archbishop the duty of hearing objections put forward and of judicially determining, after hearing them, on the validity or invalidity of the election, and on the fitness or unfitness of the person elected? Or, on the other hand, on proper evidence being offered, informing the Archbishop that the election had been in fact held according to the congé d'élire, and as to the personal qualifications of the elected, is he bound to confirm? I am not proposing to examine all the authorities which have been quoted in the very learned arguments addressed to us on the hearing; but I shall endeavour to summarize and to bring the results to bear on the main question—namely, the construction of the statute.

First of all, the usages prevailing at the time of the passing of a statute are of importance, and must be considered when the meaning of the phrases or expressions which it contains is to be determined, though they cannot be used to contradict the plain terms of the enactment. What, then, was at the time the usage or custom in England as to the election, confirmation, and consecration of bishops? I think the fair deduction from the authorities is that bishops were at this time appointed by the pope on the nomination of the Crown, and that the election by dean and chapter had long become a formal matter: Green's History of the English People, vol. 2, p. 160; Stubbs's Constitutional History, vol. 3, pp. 339-341. But it is necessary to inquire more precisely what was the nature of the confirmation required, and I think that in the earlier centuries, and as a part of the foreign canon law, it is probable that the ecclesiastical authority did, before confirming a bishop, summon objectors and determine their causes of objection. Authority was quoted to that effect, and it would seem, from Justinian Novel 123, that, in those times, if objections were found on inquiry to be without substance, those who made them were subject to expulsion from the province. There is no trace of any such custom or law in England, although it appears that down to the year 1316, according to the instances quoted from Wharton's Anglia Sacra, objectors were summoned and were heard, and that in some cases confirmation was refused. These instances occur chiefly in the thirteenth century, after the Charter of King John. Between the year 1316, however, and the reign of Henry VIII. no instance was quoted in which objectors had appeared; and I think this much is certain—that during this period of nearly 200 years, although it was the duty of the archbishop to inform himself of the identity of the bishop-elect and of his qualifications, he did not at the ceremony of the confirmation hold anything like a judicial inquiry. During this same period, with a long interval (to which I need not further allude), the confirmations were in the hands of the pope. In some instances he issued bulls, ordering the confirmation to be held in England, but when that was not done it took place at Rome, and objectors to a bishop elected to an English see could hardly have appeared there to make their objections. At the outset of this period (though with vicissitudes) it seems that the Papal influence was predominant upon the whole; but later on, in return for the annates, the Popes were willing to accept the nominees of the Crown. "They had other objects in view than the influencing of the National Churches, and the end of their spiritual dominion was at hand": Stubbs's Constitutional History, vol. 3, p. 341. There is no instance, I believe, to the contrary of this in the reigns of Henry VII. or Henry VIII.—a period of about fifty years, reckoning to the date of this statute. If that is correct, it shows that at the time now in question the ceremony of confirmation was one of form rather than of substance; nor do the historians seem to have considered that it required any special mention while discussing, as between the Crown, the pope, and the deans and chapters, the right to the election and appointment of bishops—a fact, in my opinion, of much cogency. Certainly it was not a judicial process. It should be added, however, that in the documents it still appears to have been stated, as a matter of form, that opposers had been cited and had not appeared.

In this state of things the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 20, was passed, which begins by reciting what is known as the Annates Act (23 Hen. 8, c. 20), and then enacts that it shall stand, and that no annates shall be sent to Rome, and no bulls received from Rome. Thus was done away with the jurisdiction of the pope in this country. No doubt this was one of the main objects of the statute; but I pause to say that I cannot accept the argument of Mr. Haldane, who contended that it was the only one. To do so is to give no effect to the further sections of the statute, and particularly to section 3, which, in a preamble of its own, states that "it is not plainly and certainly expressed in the recited statute in what manner and fashion archbishops and bishops shall be elected, presented, invested, and consecrated within this realm." Another object of the statute, therefore, was to setttle that matter for the future. Section 4 directs that the dean and chapter shall within twelve days elect the person named in the letters missive of the king; and in case of default that the king may nominate and present to the archbishop such person as he may think able and convenient for the vacant bishopric, and then comes section 5, which enacts, first, that in case of such nomination and appointment the archbishop shall, with all speed, invest and consecrate without any recourse to Rome, and, secondly, that in case the dean and chapter shall elect the person named in the letters missive their election shall stand good and effectual to all intents, and the person so elected shall be reputed and taken by the name of the lord-elect of the bishopric; then, the oath and fealty appointed for the same being made to the king by the person so elected, the king shall signify the election to the archbishop, commanding and requiring him to confirm the said election, and invest and consecrate the person so elected. Section 7 further provides that, if the archbishop shall refuse and do not confirm and consecrate the person so elected or nominated within twenty days he shall incur the penalties of Præmunire. Now, upon the natural meaning of the words contained in these enactments, I accept the reasoning of Erle, J., in the Hampden case (11 Q. B., at p. 566). It appears to me clear that the intention was to give the nomination of bishops to the king. As to the choice of person, no one was to have power to interfere. Certainly if the dean and chapter do not elect the person named, then the nominee of the king, thought by him able and convenient, is to be consecrated by the archbishop without any power in the latter to refuse or delay; and it is is extremely difficult to follow an argument contending that in the alternative case, where the dean and chapter do elect the person named, there is to be any difference in the power left to the archbishop. It can hardly be contended that the king's nomination is to be without question in the one case where his letters are not obeyed, and is to be questioned in the other where they are obeyed. I further agree with Erle, J., that, if these words be taken in their strict natural meaning a command to confirm gives no authority to annul. A cogent argument in the same sense is, in my opinion, to be founded on the enactment that the election shall "stand good and effectual to all intents." Yet, according to the argument for the rule in this case, it is precisely in that event—namely, in the event of the person named being elected—that there is to be a discretion in the archbishop in the exercise of which he might annul the election.

This being the natural meaning of the statute, it is argued that we must read it otherwise, because the word "confirm" had a recognized sense at that time, in which we must read it — namely, that it included an examination into the validity of the election, and the qualifications of the elected, and a judicial determination upon all objections put forward before the confirming authority. By this reading would be given to the archbishop power and authority to disaffirm and annul the election, a power and authority which is at least foreign to the general scope of the statute if not contradictory of its terms that he should have. If the word had at the time such a definite meaning, it may be that it should be so read, although it is strange that, having so important an effect on the operation of the statute, it should have found no place in the recited statute, or in the preamble. But the true answer to this argument is that it has not been made out that the archbishop did in fact at that time (even if he ever had done so) hold any such court, or exercise any such authority or jurisdiction. This, as is shown in the elaborate judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and so far as can now be ascertained, is the result of the authorities.

Next it was argued that the practice ever since the time of Henry VIII. has been such as to support the contention of those who apply for the rule. But this, again, is not the fact, for it appears to have proceeded on the former lines. Archbishop Parker's case has not been treated as an authority, and the circumstances were unusual: but in this particular it does not seem to have differed from other instances, for the evidence was not given by an opposer; and, on examining the register of that case, it appears that in the citation of opposers it was there expressly stated that, whether opposers should come or not, the court would proceed. These words are to be found at more places than one in the record: see p. 62 of Mr. Jebb's report of Dr. Hampden's case. I think it is clear that the words attributed to Dr. Rives in Mountague's case (1628) cannot be treated as an authority for this purpose; and there is no later instance to be found in which opposers have either appeared or been heard, except in the cases of Dr. Hampden and Dr. Temple. With regard to the passage quoted from Bishop Fell's Epistle of St. Clement (see Jebb's report of the Hampden case, p. 389), in which he says, "et nemine comparente, (quod tamen non semper evenit)" it appears that this publication dates from about 1669, and therefore these words, which indicate that on some occasions opposers might appear, may be taken as referring to Mountague's case, which had happened about forty years before.

It was further argued that as the words of the statute are "confirm, invest, and consecrate," if from our decision it follows that confirmation is a form, it must also follow that consecration is so. I would strongly repudiate this contention. Consecration of a bishop to his sacred office can never be a mere form; it is the solemn and sacred service performed by the Church, by which the bishop-elect is admitted to execute his office. Confirmation, on the other hand, is merely the confirmation of an election already held. Consecration will be performed according to the solemn ritual of the Church in that behalf, and after examination held as prescribed by that ritual. Confirmation may be in any form—possibly not dictated by any law, though probably shaped by precedent. And, so far as confirmation is concerned, if the election by the dean and chapter was to be nothing but a form, solemn indeed, yet but a form, I can see no reason why the confirming of it should not be a form also. But it is hardly necessary to point out that this has no application to consecration.

There are other reasons in favour of the construction of the statute, which I think the right one, and I have not omitted them in arriving at this decision. Thus, where is the form of procedure? How is the court to determine such questions as those raised in this case? Are they to be heard in the absence of the person concerned? Between whom are the issues to be joined, and how are they to be considered? If that was intended, the Legislature surely must have made provision on these subjects. There is also a forcible argument derived from the recital in 1 Edw. 6, c. 2, and there is the high authority of Coke, Gibson's Codex, and others, in later times, including Dr. Lushington. And, on the other side, I find no authority which has similar weight. I am, therefore, of opinion that the rules should be discharged.

EDWARDES v. BARRINGTON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Lease of theatre—Covenant not to assign—Grant of right to supply refreshments—Breach of covenant.

The lessee of a theatre covenanted "not to assign, demise, or otherwise part with the indenture" of lease "or any estate or interest therein" without the licence of the lessor. Subsequently the lessee granted to a third person the free and exclusive licence and right to use the refreshment-rooms and bars in the theatre.

Held, that his so doing was not any breach of the covenant.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (sub. nom. Daly v. Edwardes, 49 W. R. 244) affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.), 49 W. R. 244, affirming a judgment of Kekewich, J., reported 48 W. R. 360.

By an underlease dated the 8th of February, 1894, the appellant Edwardes being lessee of certain premises situate in Cranbourne-street, and known as Daly's Theatre, demised them for a term of twenty years from the 25th of December, 1893, at the yearly rent of £5,500 to Augustin Daly. Mr. Daly covenanted not at any time during the term thereby granted to assign, demise, or otherwise part with the indenture or any estate or interest therein for all or any part of the said term to any person or persons whomsoever without the licence of the lessor or his assigns first had and obtained in writing under his or their hand or hands for that purpose; but such consent was not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible tenant, it being the intention that the lessee (Daly) should be at liberty at all times to produce and perform by himself and company or his licensees any first-class comedy, drama, or opera without the necessity of applying to the lessor or his assigns for his consent in that behalf, but that such licensees should not be at liberty to assign, underlet, demise, or otherwise part with their term without the licence of the lessor first had and obtained as aforesaid.

There was also a proviso for re-entry if the rent was in arrear for twenty-one days, or on breach of any covenant by the lessee.

At the date of the underlease the exclusive licence to supply refreshment in the theatre and of advertising, had become vested in Frank Warr & Co.

By an indenture dated the 15th of April, 1898, Daly, in consideration of the sum of £1,400 then paid to him and of the weekly rent or sum of £15, granted to F. Warr & Co. the free and exclusive licence and right to the use of all the refreshment-rooms, bars, smoke-rooms, wine cellars, and offices then or at any time thereafter during the term of the agreement, in or connected with Daly's Theatre aforesaid, together with the free right of and access by the said tenants, their servants and agents, to and from the same by and through the various entrances and exits of the said theatre, and of access to and from all parts of the said theatre and premises necessary or convenient for the purpose of exercising the rights thereby granted, and also the exclusive privilege of advertising therein, for the term of 15¾ years less ten days.

One of the conditions was that the landlord Daly might, by notice in writing, determine that agreement, and the term thereby created, in the event of the rent being in arrear for twenty-one days, or other the events therein mentioned; and that upon the happening of any or either of the events, all the rights and privileges thereby granted to the tenants F. Warr & Co. should at once cease and determine. Another, that the bars should in all respects be conducted in a proper and orderly manner, and in accordance with the rules of the theatre. It was further provided that Augustin Daly should have full power to discharge any servant or servants of F. Warr & Co. who should have misconducted himself, herself, or themselves to the prejudice of the good conduct of the theatre.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No licence for this agreement was obtained from Mr. Edwardes, who, on the 4th of September, 1898, entered into and took possession of the theatre on the ground that the agreement of the 15th of April, 1898, was a breach of the covenant contained in the underlease. Mr. Daly thereupon issued the writ in this action, and claimed a declaration that the entry was not authorized by the underlease of February, 1894, and asked for an injunction. Mr. Daly died in 1899, and the action was revived by his administrator, the present respondent.

Kekewich, J., and the Court of Appeal held that there had been no breach of covenant; and that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief he claimed.

The defendant Edwardes appealed.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—As has been very clearly pointed out, the whole question turns here upon the construction of two documents, and I have come very clearly to the conclusion that the judgment of Kekewich, J., and the judgment of the Court of Appeal confirming it were right. I do not deny that the documents themselves present a beautiful confusion of thought and language by the gentlemen who have contrived them, which was calculated to create the difficulties which all the judges who have had to deal with this matter have expressed. Those who drew up the documents have used words inappropriate to the particular thing with which they were dealing. But they are not words of art, and it is frankly and most properly conceded that we must, if we can, find out from the language of the instrument, having regard to the relations between the parties and the object which was on the face of the instrument apparent, what were the real intentions of the parties. And really but for the extremely confused and inaccurate use of technical words from time to time in the course of these instruments the object is clear enough. The lessee of a theatre is making a bargain with a refreshment contractor, and he wants proper accommodation for those whom he invites to his theatre to be provided by some person who shall preside over and have the command and the profits of the refreshment department of the theatre. The mode in which the parties have contracted is that which really makes the difficulty. But when one looks at the whole thing there is not one word which necessarily, as a matter of art, decides the question. Then let us see what the words are that they did use. They did not say that they demise, for instance, but they say that the person with whom the contract is made is to have the use of certain parts of the premises, and—I confess that I follow the language and the reasoning of the Lord Chief Justice very much—if you look through the whole thing you see what is the object of it. No doubt both parties intended that the one should be the exclusive refreshment contractor, and that the other person who was the lessee of the theatre should have certain control and certain powers of dealing with that part of the theatre which was reserved for refreshment—the refreshment bars, cupboards, &c. If that is the real meaning of the parties, is there anything in the language which they have used which prevents that intention from being carried out? I think not. I think the instrument most unfortunately framed—framed apparently by attempting to adapt a common form of lease of land to the contract into which the parties were entering; and from time to time language is used—I think the strongest case is where you find the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and the payment of rent and so on—which is more appropriate to the ordinary transactions by way of conveyance and lease and covenants in a lease. But still, when I look at the whole and see the relations between the parties, and that which both parties were contemplating to be done respectively by one and the other, I come to the conclusion that the decision which was arrived at by the courts below is correct, and I also come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the language of the instrument in question which prevents us from carrying out the real intention of the parties. That being so, I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I move your lordships accordingly.

BYNOE v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Negligence—Breach of duty—False evidence—Wrongful conviction—Conviction unreversed—Cause of action.

An action to recover damages for a breach of duty whereby the plaintiff was wrongfully convicted of an offence, or for negligently giving untrue evidence whereby the plaintiff was so convicted, cannot be maintained while the conviction stands.

Application for leave to appeal from an order of Jelf, J., dismissing the action on the ground that the plaintiff's statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

The first nine paragraphs of the statement of claim were as follows:

(1) The plaintiff was at the time of the matters hereinafter complained of a fully-qualified physician and surgeon, holding the double qualification and registered on the General Medical Register, residing and carrying on the profession or business of a general practice in medicine, surgery, and dental surgery, at 1, Endsleigh-gardens, London, N.W.

(2) By virtue of divers Acts of Parliament, charters, and provisions of Government passed, granted, and made as well for the profit of the defendant corporation as for the public benefit, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England (hereinafter called the Bank of England) were constituted and are the issuers and custodians for value of a portion of the national currency, that is to say, of the note issue of the Bank of England.

(3) It is one of the duties of the Bank of England as such issuers and custodians as aforesaid to check the return from circulation of Bank of England notes, and for that purpose to keep proper books of account, and to make and preserve entries showing the dates on which and the times at which the notes of the Bank of England are severally returned from circulation, and to be and remain prepared, in the interests of public justice, and for the prevention of fraud, with evidence of the dates and times and generally of the circumstances of such returns from circulation respectively.

(4) On the 14th, 15th, and 16th of January, 1892, the plaintiff was put upon his trial at the Central Criminal Court on a charge of forgery.

(5) In the course of the said trial it became and was held by the presiding judge who tried the case to be material to the issue, and of the utmost importance and necessity in determining the value of the alibi set up by the defence, and which alibi the judge declared was "perfect" up to one o'clock, that the prosecutor should prove on what day and at what time or times of such day certain Bank of England notes of the aggregate value of £415 were returned to the Bank of England from circulation, and by whom.

(6) The Bank of England, in pursuance of such duty as aforesaid, attended, by their proper officer—viz., by the defendant Charles John Williams, at the said court, and by such officer informed the court, purporting to give such information from the records of the Bank of England that the said notes were returned to the Bank of England from circulation at one and the same time and by the same person "after lunch" on the 5th of May, 1891.

(7) The said information which was supplied to the court as aforesaid from the records of the Bank of England was, and has been admitted both by the Bank of England and by the defendant Charles John Williams to have been, erroneous and given from erroneous and negligently prepared records, and was given by the defendant bank falsely and negligently, and in breach of their duty as aforesaid.

(8) Owing to the negligence, misfeasance, and breach of duty of the Bank of England as aforesaid the plaintiff was wrongfully convicted on the said charge and has thereby suffered damage.

(9) As against the defendant Charles John Williams, and through his negligently giving such false evidence as aforesaid, the plaintiff was wrongfully convicted and has thereby suffered damage.

On the application of the defendants, Jelf, J., dismissed the action on the ground that the statement of claim showed no reasonable cause of action, and refused leave to appeal.

The plaintiff applied for leave to appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: The plaintiff was unrepresented by counsel in this case, and no authorities were cited by the defendants. We, therefore, thought it well to look a little closer into the law before giving judgment. The plaintiff asks leave to appeal from an order of Jelf, J., dismissing his action on the ground that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action. The claim is against the Bank of England and their officer, Charles John Williams, on the grounds stated substantially in paragraphs 3 to 9 of the statement of claim. This claim is obviously open to many objections based on the immunity of witnesses and other points, some of which might possibly have been cured by amendment. There is, however, one broad principle lying at the root of the whole matter, to which we drew attention during the argument—viz., that, as long as a conviction stands, "no one against whom it is producible shall be permitted to aver against it." See note to Duchess of Kingston's case, 2 Smith's Leading Cases (10th ed.), p. 713, where the authorities are collected. In a modern case, Basébé v. Matthews, 15 W. R. 839, L. R. 2 C. P. 684, the point was raised that this doctrine could not be held to defeat an action for malicious prosecution which resulted in a conviction from which, as here, there could be no appeal, and which, therefore, remained unreversed. That case arose on a demurrer which admitted malice and want of reasonable and probable cause. The court, however, overruled the argument. Byles, J., said: "I think we should be disturbing foundations if we were to admit that there is any doubt that the criminal proceeding must be determined in favour of the accused before he can maintain an action for a malicious prosecution. If this were not so, almost every case would have to be tried over again on its merits. In my judgment, it makes no difference that the party convicted has no power of appealing. This doctrine is as old as the case of Vanderbergh v. Blake, Hardres, 195, where Hale, C.B., says that 'if such an action be allowed'—that is, an action against a custom-house officer for seizing goods which were afterwards condemned as forfeited by judgment of the proper court—'the judgment would be blowed off by a side-wind.'" Montague Smith, J., was of the same opinion, and cited the judgment in the case of Castrique v. Behrens, 3 E. & E. 709, at p. 721, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 37, in which Crompton, J., said: "There is no doubt, on principle, and on the authorities, that an action lies for maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause setting the law of this country in motion to the damage of the plaintiff, though not for a mere conspiracy to do so without actual legal damage. . . . But in such an action it is essential to show that the proceeding alleged to be instituted maliciously and without probable cause has terminated in favour of the plaintiff, if from its nature it be capable of such termination. The reason seems to be that, if in the proceeding complained of the decision was against the plaintiff, and was still unreversed, it would not be consistent with the principles on which law is administered for another court, not being a Court of Appeal, to hold that the decision was come to without reasonable and probable cause." Montague Smith, J. continued: "The only ground upon which Mr. Wood (the plaintiff's counsel) has attempted to distinguish this case from the current of authorities is that here the plaintiff had no opportunity of appealing against the conviction. If we yielded to his argument, we should be constituting ourselves a Court of Appeal in a matter in which the Legislature has thought fit to declare that there shall be no appeal. It was intended that the judgment of the magistrate in a case of this sort should be final. It cannot be impeached in an action."

A witness charged with negligence only is clearly not in a worse position than a prosecutor who admits malice and want of reasonable and probable cause. It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff has no possible cause of action, and his application must be dismissed.

In re CHETWYND'S SETTLEMENT.
SCARISBRICK v. NEVINSON. (a.)

Trustee—Settlement—Discharge of one trustee without appointing a substitute—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), ss. 11, 25.

The court has power, under its inherent jurisdiction in administering the trusts of a settlement, to discharge a trustee, when there are other trustees remaining, without appointing a trustee in the place of the retiring one, but it has not such power under the Trustee Act, 1893.

This was originally a summons asking under section 25 of the Trustee Act, 1893, for the discharge by the court of a trustee under the marriage settlement of a Mr. and Mrs. Chetwynd, leaving three trustees remaining without appointing anyone in his place.

The court refused this application, but gave leave to amend the summons by asking for administration of the trusts of the settlement by the court and making the retiring trustee plaintiff and all other parties interested defendants.

The summons was adjourned into court for the purpose of obtaining a decision on this point.

Prior, for the three defendant trustees.

Mrs. Chetwynd was not represented.

FARWELL, J.—This is an application by a trustee, who is desirous of being discharged, against the other three trustees, the two life tenants and the children of the marriage. Since the summons was taken out the husband and wife have been divorced and an order was made varying the settlement to which I need not refer. When the case came before me originally in chambers it was an action under the Trustee Act alone. I was then of opinion, and now am, that the court had, under that Act, no power to allow a trustee to retire unless the court could appoint the other remaining trustees as trustees in the place of themselves and the retiring trustee, as to which there was considerable conflict of opinion. Jessel, M.R., thought it was possible, but Cotton, L.J., thought it was not, and in In re Aston, 31 W. R. 801, 23 Ch. D. 217, Jessel, M.R., in deference to the opinion of the other judges and in order that the practice in Lunacy and Chancery might be the same, withdrew his opinion, and the Court of Appeal declined to make the order. The result is that the court does not allow trustees to retire under the Trustee Act simply. I suggested that the court always had power to allow a trustee to go, under its inherent jurisdiction. The summons was therefore amended by asking for administration and joining all persons interested as defendants with the trustee who wished to retire as plaintiff. In my opinion the trustee is perfectly reasonable in his desire to retire. He has served for ten years as trustee and is sixty years of age. I adopt what was said by Lord St. Leonards in Courtenay v. Courtenay, 3 Jones & Lat. 519, at p. 533: "It is quite a mistake to suppose that a trustee who is entitled to be discharged from his trust is bound to show to the court that there is some other person ready to accept the trust. The court refers it to the Master to appoint a new trustee, but if no person will accept the trust it may find itself obliged to keep the trustee before the court and not discharge him. The court will, however, take care that the trustee shall not suffer thereby." He referred there obviously to a sole trustee, or a case of two or more other trustees who were unwilling to be reappointed. The right of a trustee who is not capriciously retiring is not dependent on finding someone to take his place, but the court may think it necessary to keep the trustee before it for the purpose of any future question.

Here I have no such difficulty, as I still have three trustees remaining. Section 11 of the Trustee Act, 1893, enables parties to do that out of court which I now propose to do in court. I therefore feel no difficulty in discharging the plaintiff from being trustee without appointing anyone in his place. No vesting order is required, I simply discharge the plaintiff from being trustee.

A patentee of an invention already patented in a foreign country (which is a party to the international convention), desiring to ante-date his English patent under section 103 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, *must apply for that purpose within the seven months limited by the section, and subsequent application to ante-date is too late, even although the English patent is applied for within the seven months. Action.

This was an action for the infringement of four patents of which the plaintiffs, the Willson Laboratory Co., were the registered owners, the first-named plaintiffs being their licensees.

At the trial the plaintiffs abandoned the action as regards the first three patents, and relied only on the latest one, which was granted to T. L. Willson, of

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

New York, No. 16,705 of 1894, and which related to the manufacture of calcium carbides used in the manufacture of acetylene.

The defendants denied that they had infringed, and alleged that the patents were invalid. Among their particulars of objections the defendants alleged that the inventions claimed by the letters patent were published prior to its date by a paper relating to electric furnaces, read by Sir W. Siemens in 1880 before the Society of Telegraph Engineers, and published in their transactions; also by specifications of (among others) Willson (U.S.A.) of the year 1892, and Acheson (U.S.A.) of the same year, which were published in the Patent Office Library, and by a paper by a M. Moissan, printed in the Comptes Rendus of the Academie des Sciences, also published in the Patent Office Library on the 16th of March, 1894. The invention had previously to the patent relied upon, been patented in the United States of America, and in view of the preliminary objection which was taken to the paper of M. Moissan being given in evidence as a prior publication the following facts are material:

On the 28th of February, 1894, the patentee, of whom the plaintiffs were the successors in title, made an application in the United States of America in respect of the invention the subject of this English patent.

On the 16th of March, 1894, there was the publication in the Patent Office Library of Moissan's paper.

On the 1st of September, 1894, the patentee lodged his application for a patent in this country. That application was in common form. He did not apply under section 103 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, for the patent to be dated in his favour as of the 28th of February, 1894, the date of the application in the United States. The seven months limited by section 103 expired on the 28th of September, 1894. Subsequently, on the 20th of June, 1895, just before lodging his complete specification, his solicitors wrote to the comptroller to the effect that the patentee wished to avail himself of his rights under section 103 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883. The comptroller replied on the 21st of June, 1895, that he would not be justified in antedating the patent under that section, as no application for such a prior dating had been made within seven months of the date of the foreign application. On the 27th of June, 1895, the patentee lodged his complete specification, which was accepted on the 30th of November, 1895, and the letters patent were sealed as of the 1st of September, 1894.

At the trial of the action a preliminary question arose as to whether under the circumstances the paper of Moissan could be treated as a publication prior to the patent.

Moulton, K.C., and Colefax (Roger Wallace, K.C., with them), for the plaintiffs.—The case comes within sub-section 2 of section 103 of the Act, and consequently the publication of a description of the invention subsequent to the foreign application does not invalidate the patent. The case of British Tanning Co. (Limited) v. Groth, 8 Rep. Pat. Cas. 113, 13 W. R. Dig. 148, is not the same as this, as in that case there was no application to the comptroller for the antedating of the patent, as there was here before the delivery of the complete specification.

C. A. Cripps, K.C., Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., A. J. Walter, and J. A. Bucknill, for the defendants.

BUCKLEY, J.—On the 27th of June, 1895, the patentee lodged his complete specification, which was accepted on the 30th of November, 1895, and his letters patent were sealed as of the 1st of September, 1894. That being so, the publication by M. Moissan on the 16th of March, 1894, was a prior publication, unless the patentee's application dates back to the 28th of February, 1894. Mr. Moulton argues that it does so. I am of the contrary opinion. It seems to me that the effect of section 103 is this. Where a man has made an application in a foreign state, he is entitled under section 103, sub-section 1, to a patent for his invention in priority to other applicants, and such patent shall have the same date as the date of the foreign application. The effect of section 103 is that a man who has applied to a foreign state has two alternatives, and he may take which he likes. He may take a patent to run from the date of his prior application in the foreign state, which will, of course, be for the lesser term of years, having regard to the time that has expired since that date. Or he may, if he is so minded, take a patent to run for fourteen years from the date of his English application. He is entitled to that under section 103, if he asks for it. He is not bound to ask for it, but he is entitled to it if he does. Then the section goes on: "Provided that the application is made in the case of a patent within seven months from his applying for protection in the foreign state with which the arrangement is in force." Now, what is the application there spoken of? In my opinion it is the application under this section—the application upon which the applicant says: "Of the two alternatives offered me, I will take the patent dating back to the date of my English application." Now it seems to me that his election of exercising the option to which he is entitled must be made within the seven months. Let us see what reason there is for that. Suppose A. is a person who has applied subsequently to the date of B.'s application in the foreign country, but before B.'s application in this country. If B. avails himself of section 103 he ranks in priority to A. If not, he comes after A. Now, what is the period within which A. is entitled to have his rights in that respect determined? He is entitled to know what they are, I conceive, within the seven months. He is entitled to be able to say, "Within the seven months I will or I will not go on with my application," according as the man who applied abroad before him, and in England after him, avails himself of the earlier or later date. It is said that sub-section 2 of section 103 is some indication to the contrary. I agree that the wording of sub-section 2 of section 103 is a little difficult, but I read it as being a sub-section dealing only with the state of things which is to take place if the man avails himself of this section, or, to put it shortly, that the sub-section is to be read as if it were "shall not invalidate the patent which may be granted under the provisions of this section." It was not intended if the man had made a foreign application, and an English application, that if he took his grant under his English application he should in all cases be protected from prior applications. This would be inconsistent with all the rest of the section. Romer, L.J., in British Tanning Co. (Limited) v. Groth, 8 Rep. Pat. Cas., at p. 122, said that sub-section 2 was only intended to apply as part of the general provisions of section 103 to cases where the patentee was availing himself of the privileges given to him by that section. If I may properly say so, I entirely concur with that expression of opinion. Now here the seven months elapsed on the 28th of September, 1894, and before that time this patentee had not sought to avail himself in any way of the section. Subsequently, on the 20th of June, 1895, he was desirous of doing so, but the Patent Office declined to seal his patent as of the prior date, and in my opinion rightly. Whether rightly or wrongly, the patent which is being sued upon is in point of fact of the date of the 1st of September, 1894, and it appears to me that that is conclusive on this point. It seems to me, therefore, that the alleged anticipation by Moissan is one of which the defendants will be in a position to avail themselves.

The trial then proceeded and his lordship found that the patent had been anticipated and was invalid, and that there had been no infringement and he dismissed the action with costs.

The defendants asked for a certificate that their particulars of objections were proven, or were reasonable and proper, not only as regards those given in respect of the patent relied on by the plaintiff, but also as regards the patents abandoned at the commencement of the trial.

BUCKLEY, J., refused to grant a certificate as regards the abandoned patents upon the authority of Mandleberg v. Morley, 11 R. P. C. 1.

The defendants then asked for a certificate as to all the particulars of objections given in respect of the patent relied on, not only as to Moissan's papers and an American specification which had been held to be anticipations, and for which his lordship certified, but also as regards the papers of Sir W. Siemens and others which were used, not as anticipations, but to show the nature of certain furnaces used in connection with the patent.

Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., A. J. Walter, and J. A. Bucknill (C. A. Cripps with them), for the defendants—It has been the practice to require all specifications intended to be referred to at the trial to be mentioned among the particulars of objections, and if they are not so mentioned they are not allowed to be put in evidence. They are therefore reasonable and proper.

Colefax (Moulton, K.C., and Roger Wallace, K.C., with him), for the plaintiffs.

BUCKLEY, J.—Under section 29, sub-section 6, I have to certify that a particular of objection is reasonable and proper. The defendants have asked me for the costs of the particulars of objections, of which I will take as an instance the specification of Siemens' arc furnace. It appears to me that this specification was no objection at all to the validity of the plaintiffs' patent. The patent mentioned a thing called a Siemen's arc furnace. To ascertain what that was it might be necessary to prove the specification of Siemens which claimed it. That would be a matter of evidence. I suppose a witness could have been called and asked what a Siemens' arc furnace was. The defendants suggest that that could not be done in a patent action unless the specification was mentioned among the particulars of objection. That does not commend itself to my intelligence, and I do not see how it can be so. You may prove anything that is material in an action, subject to this limitation, that if it is an objection you must give particulars of it under the statute, if it is not an objection you may prove it without having done so. I therefore do not certify with respect to the Siemens' or the Cowle's specifications, which were referred to merely for the purpose of ascertaining what electric arc furnaces are.

Colefax asked for a certificate that the validity of the patent relied on had come into question, and referred to Haslam & Co. v. Hall, 5 Rep. Pat. Cas. 1, and suggested that the patent might be upheld in the Court of Appeal, and that it was doubtful whether they could grant the certificate.

BUCKLEY, J.—I cannot think that the learned judge said what he is reported to have said in Haslam & Co. v. Hall, because his observations seem to lead to a conclusion the contrary of that at which he arrived. I refuse the certificate.

BARNES v. RICHARDS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Contract—Setting aside—Contract of service—Dismissal—Undue pressure.

In an action for salary due and damages for wrongful dismissal the defendants pleaded, inter alia, that by an agreement entered into by the plaintiff and the defendants, which agreement was embodied in a deed, the plaintiff had tendered his resignation, which had been accepted by the defendants, and that the plaintiff had accepted a certain sum of money in complete satisfaction and discharge of all his claims against the defendants. In his reply the plaintiff pleaded that he was induced to execute the deed by the defendants threatening unlawfully to imprison him unless he executed the same, and that he executed the deed in fear that the threat would be carried out, and that he had given no real or free consent to such execution. At the trial of the action two questions were left to the jury:

(1) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement by threats of the defendants of criminal proceedings or imprisonment? To which the jury returned the answer, "No."

(2) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement by undue pressure exercised by the defendants to force the plaintiff to enter into the agreement? To which the jury returned the answer, "Yes."

Held, on further consideration, that the answer of the jury to the second question was not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to get rid of the deed and to fall back upon his original claims, and that judgment must be entered for the defendants.

Further consideration.

In this action the plaintiff claimed for balance of salary due and damages for wrongful dismissal.

The plaintiff in his statement of claim stated that in July, 1897, the defendants, the proprietors of Collins' Music Hall, Islington, appointed the plaintiff their manager at the said music hall at a salary of £200 per annum.

The plaintiff served the defendants in this capacity until the 27th of September, 1900, when the defendants, as the plaintiff alleged, wrongfully dismissed him from their service.

The defendants in their statement of defence denied that they wrongfully dismissed the plaintiff from their service and alleged that he tendered his resignation as manager and that they accepted such resignation. They further alleged that on the 27th of September, 1900, there were cross-claims between the plaintiff and the defendants and that it was on that day agreed between the parties that all such claims should be satisfied and discharged by the defendants paying the plaintiff the sum of £300 in satisfaction of all claims existing between them, and in pursuance of such agreement the defendants paid to the plaintiff the sum of £300, which the plaintiff accepted in complete satisfaction and discharge of all his claims against the defendants, and the defendants and the plaintiff then executed a deed which embodied the above agreement, and in which the plaintiff acknowledged receipt of the £300, and the defendants and the plaintiff covenanted with each other and acknowledged that the resignation had been tendered and accepted as from the above date, and each released the other from all claims.

Under the circumstances the defendants denied that they were indebted to the plaintiff at all.

The plaintiff in his reply pleaded that he was induced to execute the deed "by the defendants threatening unlawfully to imprison the plaintiff unless he would execute the same, and the plaintiff executed the said deed in fear that the said threat would be immediately carried into execution." The plaintiff further pleaded that he executed the deed "when he was so taken by surprise and overwhelmed by the said threat . . . that he gave no real or free consent to the said execution of the said deed, which was produced for his signature by the defendants immediately after they had made the said threat in order that the plaintiff might be induced to execute the same when surprised and deceived, as the plaintiff was by the said threat."

The case was tried before Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and a special jury in December, 1901. Two questions were left to the jury by the learned judge:

(1) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement of the 27th of September, 1900, by threats of the defendants or Mr. Rutland, the defendants' solicitor, of criminal proceedings or imprisonment?—Answer, "No."

(2) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement of the 27th of September, 1900, by undue pressure exercised by the defendants or Mr. Rutland to force the plaintiff to enter into the agreement?—Answer, "Yes."

The question whether the answer to the second question was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to get rid of the deed and to fall back upon his original claims was then reserved for further consideration.

Bray, K.C., Arthur Powell, and W. Higgins, for the plaintiff.

The facts of the case and the arguments of counsel on the further consideration sufficiently appear in the following reserved judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment:

This was an action for balance of salary due and damages for wrongful dismissal brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, and tried before me with a special jury on the 11th, 12th, and 13th of December last. The defence set up, on which the question arises, was that all the claims made by the plaintiff were settled in consideration of the payment of £300 pursuant to the terms of an arrangement made on the 27th of September, 1900, and embodied in a deed of the same date made between the plaintiff and the defendants.

The plaintiff replied that he was induced to execute the deed by the defendants' unlawfully threatening to imprison him, and that he was taken by surprise and overwhelmed by the threat, and in consequence of the threat gave no real or free consent to the execution of the deed. I left the following questions to the jury: (1) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement of the 27th of September, 1900, by threats of the defendants or Mr. Rutland of criminal proceedings or imprisonment? To which the jury returned the answer, "No." (2) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement of the 27th of September, 1900, by undue pressure exercised by the defendants or Mr. Rutland to force the plaintiff to enter into the agreement? To which the jury answered "Yes," and they assessed the damages provisionally at £100. I reserved for further consideration the question whether the answer to the second question was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to get rid of the deed and to fall back upon his original claims. The case was argued before me on Monday, the 13th of January last, and I took time to consider my judgment. The case is one of considerable difficulty, and, in the view I take, there is no decision exactly upon the point which I have to consider. A brief outline of the facts will be desirable before dealing with the arguments which were raised before me.

The plaintiff had been engaged by the defendants for the year 1897 as the manager of Collins' Music Hall. At a subsequent date he was also appointed managing director of the London Music Hall, which was owned by a limited company, of which the defendants were the principal shareholders.

The plaintiff was responsible for working accounts of both establishments, and these accounts were audited weekly by a firm of accountants, and, up to the 27th of September, 1900, no question had been raised as to any irregularities by the plaintiff in his accounts or in the discharge of his duties.

On that day, being the occasion of the usual weekly meeting at the Collins' Music Hall, the defendants and their solicitor, Mr. Rutland, attended.

The plaintiff was called in and asked to explain a number of items relating to the accounts of both music halls, as to which it was suggested that irregularities had occurred. The total amount in many of the items was not large, and as to many of them he was able to give a satisfactory explanation, but as to certain others he was unable, at the time, to give an explanation which was satisfactory to the defendants. The discussion, which lasted from about 11 o'clock in the morning until five or six in the afternoon, was interrupted in the course of the day by Mr. Rutland, the defendants' solicitor, being obliged to go away on some other business. On his return an arrangement was come to which was embodied in the deed. The plaintiff was to send in his resignation and to accept the sum of £700, being £300 in respect of his claim for salary from the Collins' Music Hall, and £400 in respect of the loan which he had made to the London Music Hall, and to sign the deed of release set out by the defendants in their statement of defence.

The original case set up by the plaintiff on the pleadings was that the defendants and Mr. Rutland had threatened him with prosecution and arrest, and that he had executed the deed under pressure of those threats. As has already been pointed out, this case was negatived by the finding of the jury, but it was contended by Mr. Bray for the plaintiff, both in his opening and in his reply, that I should leave to the jury the question of whether or not the plaintiff was a free agent at the time that he executed the deed in question.

After consideration I left to the jury the second question, which they have answered in the affirmative. It was contended by Sir Edward Clarke and Mr. Gill on behalf of the defendants that I ought not to have left this question to the jury, because the only substantial answer raised by the plaintiff's reply was founded upon the alleged threat of prosecution or imprisonment, which had been negatived by the jury.

If the finding is sufficient to enable the plaintiff to get rid of the deed, I think that I ought not to give effect to this contention on behalf of the defendants. The point was raised by Mr. Bray in his opening statement and maintained throughout the trial. No objection was taken in point of form, and I should have allowed an amendment in order to raise the question had it been necessary. I have therefore to consider on the merits whether such a finding is sufficient to enable the plaintiff to set aside the arrangement embodied in the deed. It was contended before me that there was no evidence which I could properly have left to the jury in support of that finding, and as this point may require further consideration, and also because it is necessary in dealing with the question which I have to decide, I think I ought to state the evidence which gave rise to the question, and also what I understand the finding of the jury to mean.

The evidence which gave rise to the contention, assuming that the plaintiff was entitled to raise it, was that the defendants admitted that in the course of the long discussion, they had held that the plaintiff's explanation was unsatisfactory, and that upon the advice of Mr. Rutland, the solicitor, they had determined to, or would, suspend him in order that there might be a thorough inquiry into his accounts. There was no clause in the agreement enabling the defendants to suspend the plaintiff or to give them any special rights in that respect, but it was contended by Mr. Bray, in the course of his argument before me, that the defendants had, as employers, the right to suspend the plaintiff from his duties pending investigation. It was stated by the plaintiff that in the case of such an employment as that of manager of a music hall, suspension was a very serious step, and would be regarded as such by persons acquainted with music hall business, in fact it was in consequence of this suggestion, or expression of intention, that the plaintiff said he asked the defendants to allow him to resign. There were certain other minor pieces of evidence which it is not necessary for me to refer to, as, for instance, the statement that his explanations were not satisfactory, but what I have stated was the main ground upon which the allegation of pressure was raised, and I therefore held, and still think, that it was impossible for me to say that there was no evidence to support the finding of the jury upon the second question.

In considering the question of law it is necessary to deal separately with the two causes of action on which the plaintiff founds his claim—(1) wrongful dismissal, (2) a claim for salary which he alleged was due to him up to the date of ceasing to be manager. As regards the wrongful dismissal, since the argument, I have again gone carefully through the evidence, and I can see no evidence of any dismissal at all. The admitted facts appear to be these: Upon the defendants' suggestion that they proposed or had determined to suspend the plaintiff in order that there might be a full investigation into the accounts, he asked them whether they would accept his resignation. This they consented to do, and he thereupon resigned, and although in a letter of the 4th of October he claims damages for wrongful dismissal, he never attempted to resume the position of manager after the 27th of September. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the plaintiff resigned and was not dismissed, and that no damages can be claimed in respect of any wrongful dismissal.

As regards the amount claimed for salary I have more difficulty. That seems to me to depend upon whether the finding of the jury in answer to the second question is sufficient to set aside the arrangement made. The strongest cases in favour of the plaintiff are among those cited by Mr. Bray and Mr. Powell in the course of the argument: Evans v. Llewellin, 1 Cox Ch. Cas. 333; Wood v. Abrey, 3 Madd. 417; and probably Ormes v. Beadel, 2 Giff. 166, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 17, and on appeal 9 W. R. 25; and Barrett v. Hartley, 14 W. R 684, L. R. 2 Eq. 789, at p. 797. But I think that the finding of the jury, understood in the sense that I understand it, and which I have already indicated, fails to bring the case within any of the decisions in which courts of equity have set aside arrangements of compromise. The passage in the judgment of Lord Chelmsford in Williams v. Bayley, L. R. 1 H. L. 200, at p. 216, 14 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4, on which I framed the second question, must, I think, be taken in conjunction with the preceding sentence and the subject-matter under discussion, and not as laying down any general proposition or rule which can be applied in all cases: see also the observations on this case in Flower v. Sadler, 10 Q. B. D. 572, which was not cited in the argument before me.

In the present case the plaintiff undoubtedly had a claim against the defendants for a sum considerably in excess of the amount received, £300. On the other hand the defendants claimed to have an investigation of the accounts. The plaintiff was the person who had the best means of knowing what the result of such investigation would be. As I have already said, it was conceded in the argument before me that the defendants were entitled to suspend the plaintiff and have an investigation. Accepting, as I am bound to do, the finding of the jury that the plaintiff was induced to make the agreement of the 27th of September, 1900, by undue pressure exercised by the defendants or Mr Rutland to force him to enter into the agreement, I still think that such pressure does not in law entitle the plaintiff to say that he is not bound by the arrangement come to. I have not overlooked the point raised by Mr. Bray with reference to the fact that the wafers which appeared on the deed when produced were not upon the deed when it was executed, but were affixed subsequently by some clerk of Mr. Rutland. Mr. Bray claimed in his argument that upon these facts the case of Davidson v. Cooper, 11 M. & W. 778 and 13 M & W. 343, was a conclusive authority in his favour. The circumstances of that case were very different, and no question of mutual arrangement or agreement outside the deed arose as in this case; but if the question were material I am by no means sure that the necessary evidence was gone into at the trial to enable Mr. Bray to raise the point. I am not satisfied that there was no impression upon the paper or want of execution before the wafers were affixed, and I doubt whether, having regard to the cases which will be found collected at p. 138 of the 17th edition of Roscoe's Nisi Prius Evidence, the objection can be maintained. But in this case the matter does not seem to me to be material, inasmuch as the real question is whether or not the plaintiff was bound by the arrangement which he entered into on the 27th of September. I have only to add that in his letter of the 4th of October the plaintiff alleges that the only ground upon which he claims to set aside the arrangement was the alleged threat of prosecution. With regard to the objections taken by the defendants, first, that the plaintiff ought to have taken independent proceedings, and, secondly, that he had acted upon the arrangement and ratified it by retaining the two sums of £300 and £400, I think that as regards the first it is now clearly established that, if the plaintiff could in equity have set aside the deed, that can now be set up in other proceedings as an answer to any claim or defence in which the deed is relied upon (Seear v. Cohen, 45 L. T. Rep. 589, 30 W. R. Dig. 49); and, as regards the second point, inasmuch as a larger sum of money was admitted to be due to the plaintiff, apart from the arrangement of the 27th of September, I do not think that his retention of the cheques was sufficient to have prevented him from contending that he was not bound by the arrangement. For the reasons which I have already given I think that judgment must be entered for the defendants with costs.

Information by the Attorney-General, which stated as follows:

"1. The London Missionary Society is a body of persons not incorporated but associated for certain charitable purposes of a religious character and possessed of considerable invested funds which are held by trustees appointed by the society and are dealt with and disposed of by directors in whom the management of the affairs of the society is from time to time invested.

2. In the year 1899 the said London Missionary Society accepted from Mr. Charles Thomas Munday Burton, of Andover Lodge, Ealing, a director of the society, an offer of a sum of £500 in lieu of a legacy subject to a contract or reservation for the payment of £25 per annum to the said Charles Thomas Munday Burton during his life and after his death to his wife, Mrs. Martha Burton, during her life in case she should survive him.

3. The said arrangement (as appears from the following extract from the minutes) was confirmed and carried out by a resolution passed at a meeting of the directors of the society on the 11th of February, 1889—viz., "That in consideration of the payment to the London Missionary Society of £500 in lieu of a legacy by a director (Charles Munday Burton, Esquire) who does not wish his name to appear in any published or announced list of subscriptions the present trustees and their successors in the trusteeship of the society be and hereby are authorized to pay the sum of £25 per annum in quarterly payments (the first payment to be made in months after the receipt of such capital sum) during the life of the said Charles Munday Burton, Esquire, and a like payment to his present wife, Mrs. Martha Burton, during her life should she survive him.

4. The said sum of £500 was given and paid by the said Charles Munday Burton to the society, and the funds of the society held by their trustees became and were pursuant to the said arrangement charged with the payment of the annual sum of £25 during the lives of the said Charles Munday Burton and his wife and the life of the survivor of them, and the said annual sum was duly paid thereout by the said trustees accordingly.

5. The said Charles Thomas Munday Burton died on the 12th of May, 1895. His widow, the said Martha Burton, died on the 5th of May, 1900.

6. Upon the death of the said Charles Thomas Munday Burton estate duty became payable by the society and its trustees under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), incorporating section 38 (1) and (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and section 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, on the said sum of £500, being a gift to the society of which bonâ fide possession and enjoyment was not assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise.

7. Upon the death of the said Martha Burton succession duty at the rate of 11½ per cent. became payable by the society and its trustees on the said sum of £500 in respect of the determination of the said payment of £25 to Mrs. Burton under the Succession Duty Act. 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 7, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, s. 21.

8. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have caused application to be made to the society and their trustees and to the defendant to deliver proper accounts in respect of the said sum of £500, and to pay the duties which ought to be paid in respect thereof as aforesaid, but they have refused and still refuse to deliver such accounts and to pay such duties, and contend that no such duties are payable.

9. The defendant is the secretary of the said society."

The information prayed that it might be declared that the said sum of £500 ought to have been included in an account to be delivered pursuant to section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, incorporating section 38, sub-section 2 (a), of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and section 11, sub-section 1, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, on the death of the said Charles Thomas Munday Burton, and that estate duty was and is to be charged and paid on such account as by the said Acts provided; and that succession duty at the rate of 11½ per cent. became payable on the death of the said Martha Burton in respect of the determination of the said annuity of £25 per annum on the said sum of £500 under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888.

The society in their answer to the information pleaded that the said sum of £500 was not given, but was paid by Burton to the society. None of the funds of the society became, pursuant to any arrangement, charged with the annual sum of £25. The said annual sum was never in fact paid by the trustees out of the funds of the society. It was paid by the directors as one of the ordinary outgoings of the society. Upon the death of Burton, estate duty did not become payable by the society. If, contrary to the contention of the society, the sum of £500 passed on the death of Burton, it so passed by reason only of a bonâ fide purchase from him within the meaning of section 3 of the Finance Act, 1894, and was, therefore, exempted from taxation. The only property (if any) which passed on the death of Burton in reference to the arrangement between him and the society was the annual sum of £25, which was exempted from taxation by section 15 of the Finance Act, 1894. Alternatively, the society pleaded, only such part of the said sum of £500 was to be deemed to have passed on the death of Burton as remained after deducting such sum as when invested would satisfy the instalments of the annual sum of £25. Upon the death of Mrs. Burton no succession duty became payable by the society. The annuity was bonâ fide purchased by Burton from the society by payment of £500. If, contrary to this contention, there is any succession, it is taxable under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 16, and therefore the rate of duty was 10 per cent. and not 11½ per cent.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—This case has been brought about owing to the decision in Earl Grey v. The Attorney-General, 48 W. R. 383, [1900] A. C. 124, the Inland Revenue desiring that the system under which such transactions as the present arise should be settled. The real point in this case is whether this transaction was a purchase of an annuity, as the defendant contends, or, as the Crown contends, a gift with a collateral benefit retained by the donor so as to make it fall within section 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 Vict. c. 7), which amended section 38, sub-section 2, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881. It is necessary to determine whether in this case there was a gift or whether there was a purchase, and only if it can be determined there was a purchase can section 3 (2) of the Finance Act, 1894, be applied to this transaction. This was not the case of a purchase, there being no purchaser or vendor of this annuity, it was not a commercial transaction at all, but it was a gift; further, it cannot be both a gift and a commercial transaction. This sum of £500 is therefore liable to estate duty (see Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99), and it does not come within section 3 (2) of the Act of 1894. The whole point of that sub-section lies in the words "paid to the vendor or grantor for his own use or benefit." That section does not apply unless there is a purchaser for a consideration. The transaction must come under the word "purchase," and that is not the word to describe the present transaction: vide Austen-Cartmell's Finance Acts (3rd ed.), p. 33. As to the claim for succession duty this transaction cannot be considered a bonâ fide sale so as to take it out of liability to succession duty under section 7 of the Succession Duty Act of 1853. If it is not a bonâ fide sale then it is not a sale at all.

Micklem, K.C. (Harman with him), for the defendant.—No estate duty is payable in respect of this sum of £500. However, if any duty is payable it is payable on the sum of £290 only. [PHILLIMORE, J.—If anything is payable under section 2 it is cut down by section 3.] This transaction was a purchase favourable to the society. If it was partly a purchase and partly a gift, no doubt so far as it was a gift it came into operation at once. There is no complication so far as the gift is concerned, and estate duty would be payable on the death of the husband, but no succession duty became payable on the death of the widow. The annuity was bonâ fide purchased from the society: Fryer v. Morland, 25 W. R. 21, 3 Ch. D. 675.

Vaughan Hawkins replied.

PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case, on the 11th of February, 1889, the directors of the London Missionary Society resolved as follows: "That in consideration of the payment to the London Missionary Society of £500 in lieu of a legacy by a director (Charles Munday Burton, Esquire) who does not wish his name to appear in any published or announced list of subscriptions, the present trustees and their successors in the trusteeship of the society be and hereby are authorized to pay the sum of £25 per annum in quarterly payments (the first payment to be made in months after the receipt of such capital sum) during the life of the said Charles Munday Burton, Esquire, and a like payment to his present wife, Mrs. Martha Burton, during her life should she survive him."

Before the resolution was arrived at two letters had passed from Mr. Burton to the society which I think it well to read: "1st March.—I have not been able to get to the city since last I had the pleasure of seeing you at the Mansion House, and as I cannot tell when I may be well enough to venture so far again, will you kindly send on to me for approval the amended document which we arranged should be written out anew." And on the 7th of March: "Permit me to thank you for your very kind letter which came to hand last night. I can assure you that payment to the society of the anticipated legacy has been made with a glad heart, in which my wife has cordially joined, and the completion of which brings us rest and peace." Then follow expressions showing his interest in the work and his devotion to the cause of religion.

I am told that this class of arrangement is not infrequent with missionary societies. It appears in this particular case that the commercial value of the annuity stipulated for would be £210, and therefore the society benefit to the extent of £290 if this is to be treated as an ordinary commercial arrangement.

Mr. Burton died in May, 1895, after the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, and his widow died in May, 1900. The Crown now claims, first of all, estate duty upon this sum of £500; and, secondly, succession duty. Now, I have to determine both these points. Section 2, sub-section 1 (c), of the Finance Act, 1894, renders liable to duty "property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the word 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a volunteer were omitted therefrom."

That section must be read as if the joint sections of the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, were written out in full therein, and the effect of those two sections is well and, I think, accurately given at pp. 106 and 107 in Hanson's Death Duties (4th ed.) as follows: "Any property taken as a donatio mortis causâ made by any person dying after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four, or taken under a disposition made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise, which shall not have been bonâ fide made twelve months before the death of the deceased, or property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift, and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

Now I think it has been suggested by the Crown that this sum of £500 is taxable as "property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift, and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor." My opinion is adverse to such contention. I do not think that Earl Grey v. Attorney-General has any bearing upon this case at all. The whole question decided by that case is that property out of which the donor reserves benefits for his life is not property which has been assumed and retained to the entire exclusion of the donor. In the present case the property was a sum of £500, and as it was entirely taken by the society without any reservation at all, and as the annuity which the society contracted to pay was not in any way charged upon this property, nor was there property in any way appropriated to the payment of it, I am quite clearly of opinion that that part of the section does not apply.

There remain the words in section 11 of the Act of 1889—namely, "property taken under any gift, wherever made . . . retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

These words are not very apt, but I think I must take it, particularly after the decision of Attorney-General v. Worrall, that they mean that where property is given and, in consideration of that gift, there is a contemporaneous arrangement by contract to pay to the giver something for his life, that gift is not such an out-and-out gift as to be exempt, and I so assume in deciding this case. Therefore this sum of £500, being property given, but given upon terms that there should be an annual payment to the donor for his life and onwards, would be taxable under section 2 (1) (c) if the matter ended there. But then comes section 3 (2), which is a reservation or a taking out of the taxing disposition of certain property passing under certain forms of arrangement. I am clearly of opinion that that is a distinct remission of duty which, but for that section, would have been incurred, and I so construe that section. Now, there is a great difficulty about it, because sub-section 2 of section 3 is in a different plane of thought, or in a different denomination from the sections of the two Customs and Inland Revenue Acts which are to be read into this Act. If those sections had been written out in full in this Act I cannot conceive that any draughtsman would have passed sub-section 2 of section 3, with those words before him exactly in the language in which it stands, but I have got to construe it as the Legislature has left it, and the only way in which I can do that is to say this: Where only the Customs and Inland Revenue Act applies it may be that there is no such thing as a purchase for partial consideration. It is evident that there are certain cases in which there will be a purchase with some consideration, which nevertheless will be a taxable purchase. That is the effect of the decision in the case of Attorney-General v. Worrall. There may be cases where there are cross-gifts, and where, though one gift is in consideration of the other, for the purposes of taxation each gift is to be treated as gratuitous, and whichever comes to be the taxable one is to be taxable accordingly. But under section 3, sub-section 2, the case is otherwise, and under that section there may be an arrangement under which property is consciously purchased for considerably less than its value, there being a gift to the purchaser of the balance over the true commercial value of the property. In other words, there may be, as it were, in one case cross-claims, and in the other case a set off, and the only amount which is taxable is that which is left after the set off has been discharged. That is my construction of this case. I think this money, as I have already said, is clearly taxable under section 2 (1) (c). But then I am directed to allow a deduction from the value of the property for the purpose of estate duty, by section 3, sub-section 2. The whole £500 is in the first instance taxable; then as much of it as is purchase is to be deducted under section 3 (2), and as in this case the commercial value of an annuity of £25 for the two lives is £210, that sum must be deducted, and therefore only £290 remains to be taxed.

I cannot pass from this matter without dealing with the way in which it was put most powerfully before me by counsel for the Crown: You must first determine whether it is a gift or whether it is a purchase, and only if you determine that it is a purchase can you apply section 3, sub-section 2. My answer to that is: That is a mistake arising from confining your attention entirely to the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, and not reading the Finance Act, 1894, including those two sections read into it, as one Act. When you come to read them as one Act and not as two Acts, historically one after the other, it is to my mind clear that you can have something which is both purchase and gift—pro tanto purchase, and pro tanto gift—and that that must be the meaning of section 3 (2). Therefore in my opinion there must be judgment for the Crown on the question of estate duty, but on £290 only.

The succession duty question is, I think, more difficult than that of the estate duty. The claim is made under section 7 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, which section is an addition to the ordinary taxing section—section 2—and would apply in a case like the present if there be no bonâ fide sale. It is true there is no property to succeed to upon the death of Mr. Burton and his wife; but the section says that the disposition shall be deemed to confer, at the time appointed for the determination of the benefit, a beneficial increase in the property as a succession. Therefore if this be not a bonâ fide sale and comes within this section the Crown is entitled to duty on the full £500. There is no question here of partition between the £290 and the £210; it is on the full £500 or on nothing. But there arises the very formidable objection which Mr. Micklem has pointed out—namely, the nearer to a full consideration you get the annuity, the greater the duty to be paid. Now that, to my mind, is absurd, and that leads me to consider whether the true meaning of this section is not this, that where the annuity or life estate or interest purchased is so much greater than the purchase-money that the sale is not to be deemed a bonâ fide sale, then the section applies; in other words, that this section does not apply to a case where a smaller life interest is given than the purchase-money in fact would bring, but only in cases where a large life estate is created really by way of settlement, and that settlement is endeavoured to be concealed by the fact that a sum of money has been given for the purchase. I am inclined to think that that is the meaning of section 7 and that the sale is only to be assumed to be not bonâ fide when it is not bonâ fide by reason of the life interest created in the settlement being too large. However, I do not decide that point, because, assuming for the moment in favour of the Crown that this is a case such as the section applies to, I have then got to consider what is a bonâ fide sale within the meaning of the Succession Duty Act, and I do not think that a sale is not a bonâ fide sale within the meaning of the Act because it is at under-value or even at a considerable under-value. I think where a substantial consideration passes—substantial not only absolutely but relatively—that there is an element of bargaining in the matter; it is a bonâ fide sale though in reality very much more is given for the life interest than in fact is required. Having regard to the expressions in the letter of the 1st of March and to the fact that this class of arrangement is not uncommon and that the duty would be imposed upon the directors of this society to see that at any rate the society was not injured by this arrangement, I consider that this was a bonâ fide sale within the meaning of the section. I feel certain that the directors would see that they were not granting too large an annuity, and to that extent at any rate the element of consideration and bargaining would enter into the transaction. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the Crown is not entitled to succession duty, and is only entitled to estate duty on the £290.

Judgment accordingly. No order as to costs.

From C. A. (Scotland). Dec. 17.

BLAIR v. DUNCAN AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Will—Charity—"Such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper"—Uncertainty.

A testatrix bequeathed half her residue to be "applied for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper."

Held, that such bequest was void for uncertainty.

Decision of the Court of Session in Scotland (3 Ct. Sess. Cas. 5th Ser. 274, 38 Scot. L. R. 209) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland by John Blair, the sole trustee and executor of the late Miss Agnes Wilson Young, who by her will dated the 5th of December, 1898, bequeathed the residue of her estate to her brothers Archibald Young and the Rev. James Gerard Young, Doctor of Divinity, equally between them, and if either predeceased her then the whole to the survivor.

By a codicil the testatrix made the following directions: "Referring to the will which I have signed today, I direct that in the event of either of my brothers predeceasing me the half of the residue, and in the event of both predeceasing me the whole of the residue, shall be applied for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper."

The Rev. Dr. Young predeceased the testatrix. Archibald Young became her heir-at-law and sole next-of-kin, and brought this action for a declaration that the charitable gift was void. Since his death his interests were represented by the respondents.

The Court of Session decided that the gift of half the residue to charitable or public purposes was invalid.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I do not propose to repeat what I said at some length in Income Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531, nor do I think it is necessary to appeal to the decision in that case for the purpose of the decision of this. I will only say that in my view the decision of that case is an authoritative determination, and, in speaking of a taxing Act which applies to both countries, the decision of that case must of course be supreme. But, speaking of a Scottish instrument and the interpretation to be given to the word "charitable" in Scotland, I should regard the decision of Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate, 15 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th Ser. 682, as still an authoritative exposition of the law of Scotland. I am not quite certain that it is important to consider that question at any length here, because, in the view that I take of this particular testamentary disposition, it appears to me that it is impossible to deny that the words on which the main question turns—namely, "charitable or public"—are used disjunctively. Under those circumstances, it appears to me that it would be equally the law of England as it would be the law of Scotland that the disposition here given to A. B., to determine what particular public purposes should be the objects of the trust, is too vague and uncertain for any court either in England or Scotland to administer. The result of that is, as it appears to me, that the decision of the court below was perfectly right; and I move your lordships, therefore, that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The whole argument of the appellant was founded on the alleged analogy between a bequest for public purposes and a bequest for charitable and benevolent purposes, which are objects of peculiar favour in the law both of Scotland and of England. In my opinion the analogy clearly fails, and I concur in thinking that a bequest for public purposes to be taken by a person or persons named by the testator, unlike a bequest expressly limited to a charitable purpose, is not sufficiently definite, but is too vague and wide to form the subject of a valid bequest.

I will only add that I concur in the judgment of Lord Robertson, which his lordship has given me the opportunity of reading and considering.

Lord DAVEY.—The short question on this appeal is whether a trust for such "charitable or public purposes" as the executor may select is a valid disposition of the testator's property according to the law of Scotland, or is void for uncertainty.

Your lordships were exhorted by the Lord Advocate to dismiss from your minds all preconceived notions derived from the English law of charities, and I have done my best to humbly obey that exhortation. There is no doubt that the English law has attached a wide and somewhat artificial meaning to the words "charity" and "charitable," derived, it is said, from the enumeration of objects in the well-known Act of Elizabeth, but probably accepted by lawyers before that statute. In the law of Scotland there is no such technical meaning attached to the words. In the course of the argument there was some discussion as to the meaning attached by Scottish judges to the words "charitable purposes." I think that those words include a wider range of objects than such as are of a merely eleemosynary character, and I find authority for saying so in the opinion of Lord Watson in the Pemsel case.

But I do not find it necessary to pursue or elaborate the discussion of this topic in the present case, because it is, in my opinion, clearly established that, whatever may be the legal definition of the expression, the courts of Scotland will give effect to a disposition in favour of charitable purposes to be selected by a named individual. In other words, such a trust is treated as being sufficiently definite to be the subject of a valid disposition.

There are three cases in this House to which your lordships' attention was called. In Hill v. Burns, 2 Wils. & S. 80, a bequest to trustees was held valid, whereby a testatrix appointed the residue of her estate to be applied by her trustees in aid of "the institutions for charitable and benevolent purposes established or to be established in the city of Glasgow, or neighbourhood thereof," to be appropriated in such manner as to the trustees might seem proper. In Crichton v. Grierson, 3 Wils. & S. 329, a gift to trustees of a residue to be applied in such charitable purposes and bequests to such of the testator's friends and relations as might be pointed out by his wife, with the approbation of the majority of the trustees, was also held valid. Lastly, in Miller v. Black's Trustees, 2 Sh. & McL. 866, a bequest for such charitable and benevolent purposes as the trustees might think proper was held valid.

If, therefore, the words in the present case were merely "charitable purposes," or were "charitable and public purposes," I think effect might be given to them, the words in the latter case being construed to mean charitable purposes of a public character.

But the words we have here are "charitable or public purposes," and I think these words must be read disjunctively. It would, therefore, be in the power of the trustee to apply the whole of the fund for purposes which are not charitable, though they might be of a public character. Now I am not aware of any case in which effect has been given in the Scottish courts to a trust for "public purposes," and I find in the cases which have been referred to indications that such a trust would not be considered valid. In Crichton v. Grierson Lord Lyndhurst, L.C., states the question thus: Whether effect may be given to a power of selection amongst the individuals comprised in "particular classes of individuals and objects"; and he answers the question by saying that according to the authorities in the law of Scotland, a person may make such a disposition. Can it be said that "public purposes" is within the description of a particular class of individuals or objects? I think not. Illustrations were given at the bar, and might be multiplied to any extent, of purposes which would come within the description of "public," and the statement of which would reduce the gift almost ad absurdum. The Lord Advocate argued that the expression "public" was no more vague than "charitable." I do not agree, although an exhaustive definition of "charitable" might be difficult, and to attempt it would be unwise. At any rate, it is positivi juris that the courts will give effect to a gift for charitable purposes to be selected by an individual. It may be that the law of Scotland is more liberal to the interpretation of bequests for charitable purposes than other bequests, as was said by Lord Gifford in advising this House in Hill v. Burns. In M'Lean v. Henderson's Trustees, 7 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th Ser. 601-611, Lord Moncreiff expressed himself in words which show that in his opinion a bequest might be void for uncertainty if not within the category of charitable bequests.

It appears to me that the point to which I have directed my observations is put clearly and concisely by Lord Young when he says he could not on authority or principle sustain public purposes as a valid direction to a testamentary trustee.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord BRAMPTON.—In an event which has happened the testatrix by a codicil to her will directed that one-half of the residue of her estate shall be applied for such "charitable or public purposes" as the testamentary trustee nominated in her will should think proper. It is not disputed that if the word "charitable" had stood alone the devise would have been sufficiently definite and valid; but it is urged by the respondents that the addition of the words "or public purposes" renders the devise indefinite and void because of its vagueness. It seems to me that the addition of those words would confer upon the trustee the power at his option to set aside charitable purposes altogether, and apply the whole of the bequest solely to any one or more of innumerable public purposes comprised within an unlimited area. In short, the intentions of the testatrix are on the face of the will and codicil left, so far as relates to the "public purposes" to be benefited, in absolute uncertainty.

I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON.—The argument at your lordships' bar, able and ingenious as it was, makes it necessary to remember that the question now before the House is whether a bequest of money for such public purposes as the trustee under the will thinks proper is or is not valid (for I am clearly of opinion with your lordships that the gift to public purposes is disjoined from that to charitable purposes).

Now, it is a significant fact that this question, on its merits, has been little if at all discussed by the learned counsel for the appellant. If a bequest by A. to any public purpose to be selected by B. is defensible on its merits, it must be on of two grounds; either that by law A. may validly leave money to be given to any purpose whatever named by B., or that the purposes named—namely, "public" purposes—are not vague and uncertain.

The former of these propositions was asserted by the appellant, but no more than asserted, on the authority of the opinions delivered in the Court of Session in Hill v. Burns. When those opinions and the authorities cited in them are examined, it will be found that they give no support to the proposition that a bequest is valid which consists merely of a direction that a certain sum of money shall go to any purpose that a nominated trustee may think proper. The case then before the learned judges was not such an unlimited power at all, but a direction to trustees to select as the object of the legacy such of the benevolent and charitable institutions in Glasgow as they thought fit. And in speaking of alienum arbitrium they were defending the bequest against the objection that the intervention of alienum arbitrium to any extent made the legacy void. This is perfectly plain by the reference by the Lord President to the cases of Trustees of Brown v. His Relations, Mor. Dict. 2318, and of Snodgrass v. Buchanan, Mor. Dict. Service of Heirs, App. 1, in both of which the alienum arbitrium was invoked merely to select from among the testator's own relations. There is, so far as I know, no authority for the broader proposition that according to Scottish law a good bequest is made by A. when he directs B. to make a will for him as regards either the whole or part of his estate, and it is contrary to the fundamental idea of testamentary disposition.

What has been established as regards the intervention of a trustee is thus stated by Lord Lyndhurst, L.C., in Crichton v. Grierson, and the passage touches the very core of the present case. He says that "according to the authorities in the law of Scotland it is quite clear that a man may, in the disposition of his property, select particular classes of individuals and objects, and then give to some particular individual a power after his death of appropriating the property or applying any part of his property to any particular individuals among that class whom that person may select." This is the rule which has got to be applied in the present case, and the question is, Has this testatrix done what Lord Lyndhurst describes?—has she selected a particular class or particular classes of objects among which her trustee is to select?

Now, as I have already remarked, we have not had much argument from the appellant on this question by itself and apart from the medium of the decision about charities. I cannot say that I am surprised, for it seems to me that this testatrix has done nothing like selecting a particular class or particular classes of objects. She excludes individuals, and then leaves the trustee at large with the whole world to choose from. There is nothing affecting any community on the globe which is outside the ambit of his choice.

Now, I have not heard anyone say that this bequest is not vague and uncertain; what is said is merely that a gift to any charitable purpose, to be selected by a trustee, is equally vague, and that the law allows the validity of a gift to any charitable purpose, to be selected by a trustee. The soundness of this argument must therefore be considered.

First of all, I do not agree that "charitable purposes" is as wide or nearly as wide as "public purposes." Even giving to the word "charitable" the widest extension ever allowed to it, there are, as I should believe, many public purposes completely outside it. Giving to the word "charitable" its proper meaning as it occurs in a Scottish testament, its comprehensiveness still further falls short of the word "public." As was suggested at the bar, the trustee would be within his powers if he gave this £1,000 to the election fund of any of the political parties that he pleased. It would be equally within his powers to subscribe the money towards raising a Yeomanry regiment. Each of these purposes is "public," neither is "charitable." Innumerable other illustrations might be given.

A great deal of the appellant's argument was directed to enforcing the relevancy of the decisions about the word "charitable," by showing that they could not be distinguished from the present case. With this view your lordships had presented to you an elaborate and interesting discussion of the difference between the law of charities in England and the law of charities in Scotland.

Much that was advanced is unquestionably sound (although I consider it inconclusive of the present question). "Ever since its institution," said Lord Watson in Pemsel's case, "the Court of Session has exercised plenary jurisdiction over the administration of all trusts, whether public or private, irrespective of the particular purpose to which the estate or income of the trust may be appropriated; and there has consequently been no room for those numerous questions as to a trust being charitable or not, which have arisen in England under the Statute of Elizabeth." The relations of the Court of Session to charities had been based on the same general ground by Lord Cuninghame and Lord Cockburn in Ross v. Heriot's Hospital, 5 Ct. Sess. Cas., 2nd Ser. 569, and it cannot be doubted that this is an accurate statement of the law. Nor do I think that exception can be taken to the interesting comparison of the laws of the two countries given by Lord Stormonth Darling in Cobb v. Cobb's Trustees, 21 Ct. Sess. Cas., 5th Ser. 38 (although I do not concur in the deductions drawn by that learned judge, so far as bearing on purposes other than charitable).

But while charitable trusts are, as matter of legal doctrine, merely one class of trusts, and while their prominence in legal decisions results from nothing more than their being the most numerous class of public trusts, I do not think that it is true that they have been uniformly treated by the courts in Scotland exactly as other trusts would be treated. The courts have, I think, as matter of historical fact, reflected more or less, consciously or unconsciously, the bias which disposes every one favourably towards charity; and this never appeared more plainly, or was avowed more frankly, than in the decision of your lordship's House in the Morgan case (Dundee Magistrates v. Morris), 3 Macq. 134. To this favour for charities I ascribe the decision in favour of the validity of a bequest for such charitable purposes as a trustee may select. Accordingly, when I am asked to apply, by analogy, to public purposes decisions about charitable purposes, I decline to do so. The proper inference from those cases is, not that the law that the testator must select a particular class or particular classes of objects before he can leave it to a trustee to select the object of the bequest is relaxed, but merely that it is settled that charitable purposes form such a particular class. On the merits of the question now before your Lordships I am unable to hold that the designation of public purposes is a compliance with the rule.

Younger, K.C.—It was arranged between the parties that the costs (subject to your Lordships' approval) should come out of the fund in dispute.

JACOBS v. MORRIS. (a.)

Principal and agent—Power of attorney—Power to borrow—Loan to agent—Money paid into principal's banking account—Misapplication by agent—Money had and received to use of lender.

A power of attorney authorizing an agent to purchase goods in connection with the business of his principal, and where necessary in connection with any purchases made on behalf of the principal or in connection with his said business, to draw and accept bills of exchange and sign the name of his principal to cheques on the banking account of the principal, does not confer on the agent a general power to borrow.

Money borrowed by the agent under such a power in the name of his principal and paid into the principal's banking account, and then drawn out by the agent and applied to his own purposes, cannot be recovered by the lender from the principal, as money had and received to the use of the lender, unless the principal knew, or could in the ordinary course of business have known, of the transaction, or unless the principal had the benefit of the money so paid into his account.

Marsh v. Keating, 1 Bing. N. C. 198, considered.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from the decision of Farwell, J., reported 49 W. R. 365, [1901] 1 Ch. 261.

The plaintiff, Louis Jacobs, was formerly a partner in a firm of tobacco merchants who carried on business in Melbourne under the firm, Jacobs, Hart, & Co. In 1898 the plaintiff became the owner of the business. Since 1882 the firm had had an agency in London, and for the period of two months in 1888 the plaintiff was the London agent.

In 1893 or 1894 Leslie Jacobs, the plaintiff's brother, who was a defendant to this action, became the London agent.

On the 24th of January, 1899, the plaintiff executed a power of attorney by which he appointed Leslie Jacobs attorney "in and throughout the United States and the continents of America and Europe and all other parts of the world (other than Australasia and New Zealand) for me and in my name, or in my said trading name, to purchase, and to make and enter into, sign and execute any contract or agreement with any persons, firm, company or companies for the purchase of any goods or merchandize in connection with the business carried on by me as aforesaid, or for the purchase or acquisition by me of any patent rights, or of the right to the exclusive or partial use of any patent or invention, or for the purchase or acquisition of the right to act as the sole or partial agent of any person, firm, or company, and to make such purchase or acquisition either for cash or on credit, or partly for cash and partly for credit, as my said attorney shall, in his discretion, think advisable." After some other provisions, which it is not necessary to state, the document continued: "And for me and on my behalf, and where necessary in connection with any purchases made on my behalf as aforesaid, or in connection with my said business, to make, draw, sign, accept, or indorse any bill or bills of exchange, promissory note or promissory notes, notes of hand, or bills of lading which shall be requisite or proper in the premises, and to sign my name or my said trading name to any cheques or orders for the payment of money on my banking account in London."

A banking account in the name of the firm had been kept continuously since 1882 with the London and Westminster Bank, but since 1893 that account had been operated upon by Leslie Jacobs exclusively, and he had used it partly for the plaintiff's purposes and partly for his own.

Messrs. Morris (also defendants to this action) were a firm of cigar importers, carrying on business in Cullum-street, London. Ever since 1889 they had had dealings with the plaintiff's firm, and they were well acquainted with Leslie Jacobs.

On the 12th of June, 1899, Leslie Jacobs, purporting to be acting on behalf of the plaintiff's firm, applied to Messrs. Morris for a loan of £4,000. He represented that by the power of attorney, which he produced, he was authorized to borrow on behalf of the firm; that the firm contemplated manufacturing cigarettes; and that he wanted cash to pay for machinery for this purpose and for buying leaf tobacco. Upon the faith of these representations and without looking at the power of attorney, Messrs. Morris agreed to advance the £4,000 at 4 per cent. interest, upon the security of bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff's firm, and upon the condition that the plaintiff's firm should push the sale of a brand of cigars, of which Messrs. Morris were the owners, in the colonies. Messrs. Morris accordingly handed to Leslie Jacobs two cheques for £2,000 each, each of which was drawn to the order of Jacobs, Hart, & Co., in exchange for which he handed to them four bills of exchange, each for £1,000, and accepted by him on behalf of the plaintiff's firm. The cheques were paid by Leslie Jacobs to the credit of the banking account of the plaintiff's firm, and the amount was subsequently drawn out by Leslie Jacobs and was applied by him to his own purposes. For the purpose of putting the London agent in funds to pay for goods purchased in London on account of the plaintiff's firm, an arrangement was come to between the firm and their Australian bankers, who had a branch in London, to make advances in the following manner: When Leslie Jacobs bought goods for the firm he took the invoice and the shipping documents to the London branch of the Australian bank, together with a bill of exchange drawn by him in the name of the firm upon the firm itself. Upon these documents the London branch handed him a cheque for the net amount of the invoice under a letter of credit given by the Australian bank to the firm, and sent by the firm to Leslie Jacobs. Leslie Jacobs then paid the money into the firm's account at the London and Westminster Bank, and paid for the goods by a cheque drawn in favour of the sellers on the same account. The plaintiff had no knowledge of any borrowing under the power of attorney for the general purposes of the business, and he had no knowledge of the transactions in question in this action until after the money had been misappropriated.

This action was commenced in November, 1899, against Messrs. Morris and Leslie Jacobs, and by it the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from negotiating the bills for the £4,000 upon the ground that they were accepted without the plaintiff's authority. The plaintiff also brought charges of fraud against Messrs. Morris, but these charges were disproved at the trial. Messrs. Morris counterclaimed against the plaintiff and Leslie Jacobs for payment of the sums due on the bills, with interest at 4 per cent., and, alternatively, for the £4,000 as money had and received by the plaintiff to the use of Messrs. Morris, with interest at 4 per cent.

Farwell, J., held that the counterclaim failed on both points. Upon the construction of the power of attorney his lordship was of opinion that the general words when construed with the prior context did not confer on the attorney a general power of borrowing. His lordship also held that, inasmuch as the plaintiff did not know, and had no means of knowing, that the £4,000 had been paid to the credit of his banking account until after it had been drawn out, the £4,000 could not be claimed as money had and received by the plaintiff to the use of Messrs. Morris.

From this decision Messrs. Morris appealed.

Neville, K.C., Butcher, K.C., and A. L. Morris, for the appellants, Messrs. Morris.

Upjohn, K.C., and Johnston Edwards, for the plaintiff, Louis Jacobs.

The arguments and authorities cited were the same as in the court below (49 W. R. 365).

Cur. adv. vult.

March 3.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Farwell, J., ought to be affirmed. The first question is as to the construction of the power of attorney. Does it include a power to borrow money? It contains no express power to borrow. [His lordship read the power as above quoted, and, with reference to the latter clause of it, said:] This latter clause contains no express power to borrow, but it said that the power to borrow arises by necessary implication from the words "in connection with my said business," to make, draw, sign, accept, or indorse any bill of exchange, promissory note, &c. It is said that these words, unless they have no effect, must authorize something more than accepting or making bills of exchange in connection with any purchases, because express power to do this is given just above in the earlier words of this clause. This argument seems to me well founded; but it still remains to consider what is the authority to accept bills or give promissory notes which is given by these words beyond the power to do so in connection with purchases. It is a power to accept bills and make notes in connection with "my said business," that is, the business of a tobacco merchant and manufacturer carried on by the donor of the power under the style of "Jacobs, Hart, & Co.," at Melbourne. Now, in my judgment, this authority cannot extend beyond the powers, express or implied, given to Leslie Jacobs by his appointment contained in the power of attorney. The power of attorney does not contain any express power, except the power to purchase and to do certain particularized things in connection with such purchases. In other words, the power of attorney appoints Leslie Jacob the purchasing agent for the business carried on by Louis Jacobs, and gives him certain particularized powers in connection with purchases, and then goes on to give him this power of accepting bills and making notes in connection with the said business. In my judgment the later words are intended merely to cover such powers beyond the mere power to purchase, which is expressly given, as are necessarily implied by the appointment of Leslie Jacobs as purchasing agent. Let us test it in this way. Suppose the authority, whether given by word of mouth or in writing, had been limited or expressed in some such words as these: "I hereby appoint Leslie Jacobs as the purchasing agent in Europe and America for the business of tobacco merchant and manufacturer which I carry on at Melbourne, in Victoria." Would such an appointment create by necessary implication a power in Leslie Jacobs to borrow money? I think not. The implied powers of an agent appointed by a trader are very different from the implied powers of a partner in a similar business. Primâ facie, an agent cannot borrow unless he has express authority as is explained by the judgments in Hawtayne v. Bourne, 7 M. & W. 595. And the distinction between the case of an agent and the case of a partner is well illustrated by the judgments in Brown v. Kidger, 3 H. & N. 753, 7 W. R. O. L. Dig. 62. But it may be urged that if power to accept bills and give promissory notes in cases other than purchases does not apply to borrowing there is nothing else to which it could apply. I cannot agree. I can quite conceive many debts which might arise in the business of the firm by reason of acts clearly falling within the authority of the agent other than purchases. For instance, the agent might incur a debt for costs to a solicitor, or a debt to an accountant in respect of the examination and adjustment of a trading account; or, to take the case which I understand Farwell, J., to put, of an agreed sum payable to the vendor of goods on a contract which the agent has thought it advisable to pay money to be allowed to rescind. In all these cases it seems to me there is money payable which is not in connection with a purchase; and the words "in connection with my said business" seem to give a necessary authority to accept a bill or give a promissory note in such cases; and I therefore cannot agree that there is nothing but "borrowing" which these words can cover. I think that the power of attorney contains no authority to borrow. I must mention one other argument, which is, as I understand it, this—that the actual practice in the business of this firm shows that the power to borrow is essential to the performance of the duty in England of a purchasing agent acting for an Australian firm, because the business was in fact mainly conducted, if not entirely, by the method of the agent when he bought goods, taking the invoice and the shipping documents to the London branch of the Australian bank, together with the bill of exchange drawn by him in the name of the firm upon the firm itself; and upon these documents the London branch handed him a cheque for the net amount of the invoice, under a letter of credit given by the Australian bank to the firm and sent by the firm to Leslie Jacobs; and that Leslie Jacobs then paid the money into the firm's account in the London and Westminster Bank, and paid for the goods by a cheque in favour of the sellers. I cannot see that this practice shows that a general power to borrow was in any way essential to the conduct of the business. All it shows is that the firm had opened a credit with an Australian bank, who authorized their London branch to advance to Leslie Jacobs the invoice price of exported goods against the shipping documents. This was an advance made under the special direction of the principal in Australia, who opened the credit to be operated upon against shipping documents of goods exported to the firm. This practice seems to me to negative rather than to affirm a general power to borrow for the purposes of the business.

If Leslie Jacobs had no right to borrow money on behalf of Louis Jacobs, this disposes of the counterclaim so far as it relates to the bills of exchange given in consideration of the loan, but it still leaves the claim, as money had and received to the use of Messrs. Morris, for the £4,000 obtained by the cheques of Messrs. Morris which were paid into the account of Louis Jacobs at the London and Westminster Bank. Here, again, I agree with the conclusion at which Farwell, J., has arrived. I agree that Messrs. Morris cannot recover the £4,000 as "money had and received" by Louis Jacobs; but I do not base my conclusion, as Farwell, J., seems to do, on the ignorance or want of means of knowledge of Louis Jacobs, while the £4,000 remained to his account at the London and Westminster Bank, of the fact that it had been paid in to his credit. I prefer to base my decision on the estoppel arising against Messrs. Morris by reason that they had constructive notice, when they lent the money, that Leslie Jacobs had no authority to borrow on behalf of Louis Jacobs, and that it was their conduct in lending the money which enabled Leslie Jacobs to pass the £4,000 through Louis Jacobs's account without his knowledge. I am not sure that in Marsh v. Keating, 1 Bing. N. C. 198, 2 Cl. & F. 250, either the House of Lords or the judges whose opinion was taken meant to decide either that ignorance and want of means of knowledge will exonerate a person through whose account a sum of money has passed from responsibility, or that knowledge of the fact is essential to liability. Nothing more seems to me to have been decided there than that the defendants could not rely upon ignorance if they had the means of knowledge. Park, J., in delivering the opinion of the judges, says: "If they had not knowledge they have all means of knowledge, and there is no principle of law upon which they can succeed in protecting themselves from liability in a case where, if actual knowledge was necessary, they might have acquired it by using the ordinary diligence which their calling requires": see 2 Cl. & F. at pp. 289, 290. The opinion does not say that knowledge was necessary. The ignorance in such a case seems evidence of negligence, or of the wide limits of actual authority given to an agent appointed by the principal to deal with strangers. I have no doubt myself that the onus in such a case is on the person through whose account the money passed; but, whatever may have been the intention of the decision in Marsh v. Keating, I am not prepared to say that a man who places his account at a bank under the absolute control of an agent, giving him the power to indorse cheques payable to his order, including cheques crossed with the name of his bankers, and to sign cheques drawn on his account, had not the means of knowledge, at all events after a lapse of time, of what was being paid into and paid out of his account by his agent. I see nothing to prevent, in this case, such an audit in London, to say nothing of accounts rendered to Melbourne, as would have rendered these—I must say, "frauds" by Leslie Jacobs—impossible. This is sufficient to constitute liability whatever view is taken of the decision in Marsh v. Keating, and this liability arises in the present case, if at all, from the fact that Leslie Jacobs was in fact acting under the general authority actually given by Louis Jacobs when he indorsed Morris's cheque and thus authorized its presentation on behalf of Louis Jacobs by the London and Westminster Bank with whose name it was crossed, and the payment of it to the London and Westminster Bank by the bank on whom Morris had drawn the cheque. It seems to me that Louis Jacobs, by so doing, himself lent the proceeds of the cheque to the London and Westminster Bank. It seems to me that that which was done was done under an actual authority; and I doubt whether one need resort to ostensible authority or estoppel to found a charge against Mr. Louis Jacobs

But in my judgment Mr. Louis Jacobs is not liable for this £4,000 in an action "for money had and received" to the use of Messrs. Morris, because they cannot be heard to say that they did not know that Leslie Jacobs was receiving from them their cheque in favour of Louis Jacobs for a purpose foreign to that for which Louis Jacobs had given authority to Leslie Jacobs to indorse and to pay it into Louis Jacobs's account. If this is so, the loss of Messrs. Morris's money was not caused by an act of Louis Jacobs, but by their own act. It was their own act which enabled Leslie Jacobs to commit the fraud. The only doubt which I have had has arisen from the fact of the prior loans by Messrs. Morris to Leslie Jacobs, which loans (amounting in all, I think, to £3,000) had been discharged in due course by or on account of Louis Jacobs. Messrs. Morris might well say that their course of business, notwithstanding the limits of the power of attorney, held out Leslie Jacobs as an agent of Louis Jacobs with authority to borrow; but I think that the evidence shows that Messrs. Morris doubted the authority Leslie Jacobs to borrow, and were not in fact misled by any ostensible authority in him arising out of previous transactions. Of course, if Louis Jacobs had received the benefit of the money by its being used to pay his debts, he would pro tanto have adopted the loan and be liable. Farwell, J., however, has found that Louis Jacobs received no benefit from the £4,000, and there is a general statement by both Louis and Leslie Jacobs to this effect, and they were not cross-examined. I suppose, therefore, that this must be taken to be the fact, although an examination of the pass-book seems to me to lead to a contrary conclusion.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed.—If Messrs. Morris had read the power of attorney they would have known that there was no power to borrow; and also that Leslie Jacobs had power to indorse cheques or draw on the banking account, though only in connection with matters, of which the alleged purpose was not one. If, then, the question was, Was it ex aequo et bono that the loss occasioned by the fraudulent act of Leslie Jacobs should be borne by the plaintiff? it seemed to his lordship that it was not. The primary cause of that loss was not anything done or omitted to be done by the plaintiff, but the neglect of ordinary business precautions by the defendants, the Messrs. Morris. It was said however, that the case fell within the decision in Marsh v. Keating. Farwell, J., had held that the principle involved in the opinion given by the judges who advised the House of Lords in that case, required that two things should be established, first, that Messrs. Morris's money went into the plaintiff's account, and, secondly, that the plaintiff knew or had the means of knowledge, while it remained to the credit of that account, that it was the money of the plaintiff. His lordship agreed with Farwell, J., in taking this view of Marsh v. Keating, and also agreed with him in thinking that the defendants, Messrs. Morris, had failed in establishing the second point. He thought, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge ought to be affirmed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., also agreed that Farwell, J.'s, judgment ought to be affirmed, and adopted Vaughan Williams, L.J.,'s view as to the construction of the power of attorney—that it did not confer a general power of borrowing. With respect to the £4,000 which was paid into the plaintiff's account at a London bank by the attorney, Leslie Jacobs, it seemed that it was all drawn out by Leslie and applied for his own purposes before the plaintiff, who was resident in Australia, knew, or could in ordinary course of business have known, anything about the transaction. And under the circumstances his lordship thought the plaintiff could not be held liable for the sum as money had and received for the use of Messrs. Morris. The truth was that Messrs. Morris must be taken to have had full notice of the terms of the power of attorney and that it did not authorize the borrowing of this £4,000. They advanced the money on the attorney's statement that the power did authorize it. Their omission to read the power was the proximate cause of the loss. As between them and the plaintiff, his lordship thought they were more to blame, and it would not be just to hold the plaintiff liable for an act done by his attorney beyond the scope of his authority in favour of Messrs. Morris, who knew the limits of the authority.

Appeal dismissed.

STEIN v. POPE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Assignment for benefit of creditors—Lease—Action against assignee for rent—Adjudication of bankruptcy after commencement of action, but before trial—Relation back—Disclaimer—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 43, 44.

The plaintiffs granted a lease to B. B. made an assignment of all her property, including the lease, to the defendant for the benefit of her creditors. A petition in bankruptcy was presented against B, alleging the assignment as the act of bankruptcy. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant for rent which accrued due after the assignment. After the commencement of the action, and before the trial, B. was adjudicated bankrupt, and the trustee in bankruptcy disclaimed the lease.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the rent from the defendant.

Appeal from the judgment of Darling, J., on the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by Miss Emily Stein and Miss Olivia Stein to recover £32 10s., a quarter's rent, alleged to be due in respect of two houses in Lower Clapton-road, Hackney. The original lessee was Mrs. Sarah Ann Bates, who held the houses under two separate leases.

On the 31st of May, 1900, Mrs. Bates executed a deed assigning her property, including the leases, to the defendant in trust for the benefit of her creditors.

On the 3rd of August the plaintiffs, as lessors, obtained judgment against the defendant for the quarter's rent on the 24th of June.

On the 27th of August a petition in bankruptcy was presented against Mrs. Bates. The act of bankruptcy alleged was the assignment of the 31st of May. A receiving order was made on the 27th of September.

This action was commenced on the 1st of October for the quarter's rent due on the 29th of September.

On the 18th of October Mrs. Bates was adjudicated bankrupt.

On the 26th of October a trustee in bankruptcy was appointed, and he disclaimed the leases of the two houses.

At the trial it was contended on behalf of the defendant that, inasmuch as by section 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the bankruptcy related back to the act of bankruptcy, and by section 44 the property of the bankrupt divisible amongst her creditors comprised all property which belonged to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, the deed of assignment of the 31st of May was void and the leases in question became vested in the trustee in bankruptcy as from that date, and that the defendant was therefore not liable for the rent.

Section 43 provides that "the bankruptcy of a debtor . . . shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the act of bankruptcy being committed on which a receiving order is made against him, or if the bankrupt is proved to have committed more acts of bankruptcy than one, to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed by the bankrupt within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition."

Darling, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, holding that the defendant was liable for the quarter's rent.

The defendant appealed.

F. Cooper Willis and Roskill, for the defendant.

The following cases were cited in argument: Ex parte Rawlings, In re Forster, 36 W. R. 144; Carr v. Acraman, 11 Exch. 566, 40 W. R. C. L. Dig. 277; Titterton v. Cooper, 30 W. R. 866, 9 Q. B. D. 473; Doe d. Lloyd v. Powell, 5 B. & C. 308; Ex parte Vaughan, In re Riddeough, 33 W. R. 151, 14 Q. B. D. 25.

Feb. 19.—ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: The plaintiffs are in the position of lessors of certain houses. The lessee, Mrs. Bates, assigned her leases of these houses (with other property) to the defendant by a deed which was an act of bankruptcy on her part. After the assignment, and before the bankruptcy of the lessee, some rent accrued due under the lease in respect of the houses, and the plaintiff issued the writ in this action for that rent against the defendant. But subsequently, and before the action came on for trial, the lessee was made bankrupt, and the bankruptcy had relation back to the above-mentioned act of bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy then disclaimed the leases. Under these circumstances the question arises whether the defendant is liable for the rent. I do not think it necessary in dealing with this case to consider the question as to the effect of the disclaimer, for it appears to me that the defendant is liable for the rent, whatever the effect of the disclaimer may be. It is not, and could not be, disputed that, although the assignment to the defendant was an act of bankruptcy, that fact did not at the time the rent accrued due prevent the defendant from being liable for the rent at the time it accrued due. The assignment at that time stood unimpeached, and could not be impeached, as between the assignor and assignee, and the plaintiffs, as lessors, were entitled to enforce payment of the rent as against the defendant. If at the time the action was brought it had come on at once for trial, the defendant would have had no defence, and judgment must have been given for the plaintiffs. This is not disputed on behalf of the defendant, but it is said for him that owing to the circumstance that the action came on for trial subsequently to the bankruptcy, that lucky fact freed him from his existing liability, because the assignment had by the bankruptcy become void as against the trustee in bankruptcy. In my judgment, the bankruptcy had not the effect of releasing the existing liability for the rent as between the defendant and the plaintiffs, and the delay in the action coming on for trial had not the effect contended for on behalf of the defendant. The bankruptcy, following on the act of bankruptcy, had, no doubt, the effect of making the assignment invalid as against the trustee and the creditors and for all purposes connected with the administration of the lessee's estate in bankruptcy. And in any question as between the lessors and the trustee in bankruptcy the former could not have insisted on the validity of the assignment. See Doe d. Lloyd v. Powell, where in a somewhat similar case the lessors were seeking to establish as against the assignees in bankruptcy that the assignment had operated as a forfeiture of the lease. But in the present case it is not in any way necessary, in order to give the fullest effect to the rights of the trustee and creditors in the bankruptcy, to hold that by the bankruptcy the defendant has been released from his liability to the plaintiffs. The bankruptcy provisions, which make the assignment an act of bankruptcy and the assignment invalid in bankruptcy, are not provisions for the benefit of the defendant. As a general rule bankruptcy does not affect the rights and liabilities of persons not parties to the bankruptcy, except so far as may be necessary in the interests of the trustee and creditors and the administration of the bankrupt's estate in bankruptcy. Here it is in no wise necessary in such interests to hold that the bankruptcy has freed the defendant from his liability to the plaintiffs. It would indeed be a strange result if the defendant, who was party to the act of bankruptcy, could avail himself of that fact and of the subsequent bankruptcy in order to free himself from liability to the plaintiffs, who were no parties to the act of bankruptcy. In my opinion the court is not bound to arrive at any such result in this case. If, indeed, the effect of the bankruptcy had been to vest the lease in the trustee in such a way as (apart from the right to disclaim) to make him directly liable as assignee for the rent in question to the plaintiffs, there might be a difficulty in the plaintiffs' way. For it might then be said on behalf of the defendant that there could not at one and the same time be two persons claiming through the lessee directly liable by privity of estate for the rent. But the bankruptcy had no such effect. Even if there had been no disclaimer, the trustee would not have become liable for any rent which accrued due before his appointment: see Titterton v. Cooper. It appears to me, therefore, that the defendant has not been released or discharged from his liability by the subsequent bankruptcy. At the time the rent accrued due the defendant was assignee of the lease and bound to pay the rent, and he has not escaped from his liability by his delay in payment. If he had paid the rent when it accrued due, as he ought to have done, without any action brought by the plaintiffs, he could not upon the bankruptcy have demanded repayment on the ground that no rent was due, and that he had paid owing to a mistake of fact—namely, the existence of an assignment to him of the lease. To hold the defendant not liable in this case would lead to strange results. By reason of the action of the defendant in taking the assignment of the lease, the plaintiffs would naturally be led to look to him for payment of the rent accruing during the assignment, and might thereby, and by the defendant's delay in payment, have delayed proceedings against the lessee which might have resulted in recovery of the rent from the lessee. And yet the defendant, if he escaped liability, must say that his being party to an act of bankruptcy and his delay in payment have enabled him to throw the loss thereby occasioned on the plaintiffs, who are perfectly innocent parties. And, further, this case could not be distinguished from the case where the bankrupt was not an original lessee, but was herself only an assignee, and in that case after the assignment the lessors could not have sued her, but could only have sued the assignee; or the lessee, who might not have been worth suing. In my judgment the appeal fails, and should be dismissed with costs.

COLLINS, M.R.—I agree in the result; but I desire to reserve my opinion as to what the rights would have been between the parties had bankruptcy supervened before any action had been taken by the lessors against the assignee. In other words, whether, apart from the special circumstances in this case, including a judgment recovered upon the footing of an assignment, the lessor could after bankruptcy have asserted that privity of estate had been established between him and the assignee by an assignment which was in itself an act of bankruptcy, and as such void ab initio.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree with the judgment which has been read by Romer, L.J.

MCCHEANE v. GYLES. (a.)

Practice—Third-party notice—Service—Third party out of jurisdiction—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24—R. S. C., ord. 11, r. 1 (g): ord. 16, r. 48.

To enable a third-party notice to be served out of the jurisdiction it must be such that if it were a writ it would be capable of being served out of the jurisdiction, and in determining whether the notice could be so served if it were a writ, the court will not have regard to the claim made by the plaintiff in the action, but will only consider the claim actually made by the defendant in the third-party notice.

In an action against the surviving trustee of a settlement leave was refused to the defendant to serve a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction on the executrix and residuary legatee of a former trustee, on the ground that, treating the third-party notice as an original writ, there was no action brought by the defendant against some other person properly served within the jurisdiction, so as to bring the case within ord. 11, r. 1 (g).

This was an appeal from the refusal of Buckley, J. to discharge an order for service of a third-party notice on Mrs. Cronyn, a resident in Ireland.

In 1875, the defendant Walter Gyles and John Cronyn, the trustees of the marriage settlement of Mrs. McCheane, the mother of the plaintiff in the present action, invested £1,000 of trust money subject to the trusts of the settlement on what was alleged to be a contributory mortgage of land in Ireland.

John Cronyn died in 1877. Under his will, Mrs. Cronyn, the present appellant, was sole executrix and entitled to receive the income of his estate for life.

The property in Ireland, the subject of the mortgage in question, was sold for a sum insufficient to meet the £1,000 secured thereon.

The plaintiff, who was absolutely entitled to the £1,000 under an appointment by Mrs. McCheane, brought the present action against the defendant Gyles, the sole surviving trustee of the settlement, for a declaration that the advance of the £1,000 on a contributory mortgage was a breach of trust and for repayment of the £1,000.

The defendant took out a summons in the action to add Mrs. Cronyn as a defendant, or in the alternative for leave to serve a third-party notice upon her.

Byrne, J., gave leave to issue a third-party notice and serve the same on Mrs. Cronyn in Ireland, without prejudice to any right the defendant might have to add Mrs. Cronyn as a defendant.

Mrs. Cronyn moved before Buckley, J., to discharge the order for service of the third-party notice upon her.

Buckley, J., dismissed the motion.

Mrs. Cronyn appealed.

Butcher, K.C., and Darley, for the appellant.—The provisions for service of a writ out of the jurisdiction apply to service of a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction. Consequently, if a writ cannot be served, neither can a third-party notice. None of the clauses in ord. 11, r. 1, apply to the notice in the present case. The only one that can be said to apply is (g), and it has been held that that does not apply to a third-party notice. In any case the matter is in the discretion of the court, and we submit that the court ought not to exercise its discretion in favour of the defendant.

They referred to In re Salmon, Priest v. Uppleby, 38 W. R. 150, 42 Ch. D. 351; Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co., 32 W. R. 670, 13 Q. B. D. 96; Dubout & Co. v. Macpherson, 38 W. Astbury, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, contra.—Under ord. 16, r. 11, any person whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court to settle the question may be added as a party. The object of the rules is to enable the court to determine the question at issue once and for all. Under ord. 16, r. 48, where a defendant claims contribution against any person he may issue a third-party notice. Then the service of the third-party notice is governed by the rules as to the service of writs. Under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), the appellant could certainly be served out of the jurisdiction with a writ in the present action by the plaintiff, and we submit that she can also be served with a third-party notice by the defendant.

Butcher, K.C., was not called upon to reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question is whether or not this case is one in which an order for service of a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction ought to have been made. I have no doubt myself that having regard to the orders and the rules which have been framed under the Judicature Act that order should not have been made. I am sorry to say so, because, speaking for myself, I cannot help thinking that having regard to the terms of the Judicature Act there really was no reason why the orders and rules should not have been framed differently. The terms of the Act are such that the rules might have been framed to cover such a case as this; and I think that, looking at the spirit of the Judicature Act, whenever there was a cause or matter instituted in the High Court, if there were matters connected with and arising out of that cause or matter which could, and conveniently might, be determined in the original proceeding, then the Act meant that the courts should have the power and that it should be their duty to include those matters in the original action. I cannot help thinking myself that the whole third-party procedure is the creature of the Judicature Act, 1873, and in particular of section 24, which begins thus: "In every civil cause or matter commenced in the High Court, law and equity shall be administered by the High Court and the Court of Appeal respectively according to the rules following." Then it proceeds to deal with the right of a plaintiff or defendant, sub-section 1 dealing with rights to be given to a plaintiff, then sub-sections 2 and 3 with rights to be given to a defendant. Speaking for myself, I am inclined to think that the intention of the Judicature Act was to make all these matters which are provided for in the sub-sections of section 24 incidental parts of the original action; and under these circumstances I should have thought that the spirit of the Act might very well have been carried out by making the original action—that is, the subject-matter of it, the test as to whether notice of the writ should be served out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1, or as to whether notice should issue against a third party as provided for by rule 48 of order 16. But, however much I may think that might have been within the spirit of the Judicature Act, I am quite clear that as the rules stand the service of a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction can only be properly sanctioned when the subject-matter of the claim of the defendant covered by the third-party notice is such that if the claim had been the subject of an independent action, commenced by writ in the ordinary way, an order for service out of the jurisdiction could properly have been made in accordance with the provisions of ord. 11, r. 1.

It is unnecessary for me to go through the lettered clauses of rule 1 of order 11. It is enough for me to say that it has not been seriously contended that the third-party notice covers any claim against the third party coming within any of these lettered clauses except clause (g); and all that clause (g) deals with really is service of a writ in a case in which "any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction."

Now in the present case it may very well be that Mrs. Cronyn is a necessary "or proper party" to an action brought by the plaintiff, but that is not the question. If you had here a third-party notice properly served upon a person within the jurisdiction, then in all probability you might have a third-party notice served on someone who is outside the jurisdiction, but in my judgment there is not the slightest pretence for saying that clause (g) has any application at all to the third-party notice in this case. It is a third-party notice in the nature of an action which the defendant proposes to bring against the third party.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the order of the court below discharged.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree that this appeal must be allowed. To my mind the case is a simple one depending upon a few of the rules of court. In the first place we are not concerned here with any application by the plaintiff under ord. 16, r. 11, for adding Mrs. Cronyn as a defendant to the action and serving her with the writ out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1 (g). We could not decide any such application on the present occasion for the simple reason that the plaintiff is not here, and we could not make any order adding a defendant without hearing the plaintiff. It seems that the summons did in the first instance ask in the alternative that Mrs. Cronyn should be added as a defendant, and so far as that goes I think that it should still be open to the defendant to see if he can make anything out of such an application; but that is a question which must go back to the judge for him to consider. We are then reduced to the simple question whether we can make an order for service of the third-party notice out of the jurisdiction. That depends on rule 48 of order 16, which provides that "where a defendant claims to be entitled to contribution or indemnity over against any person not a party to the action he may, by leave of the court or a judge, issue a notice (hereinafter called the third-party notice) to that effect, stamped with the seal with which writs of summons are sealed. A copy of such notice shall be filed with the proper office and served on such person according to the rules relating to the service of writs of summons." That includes the rules applicable to writs out of the jurisdiction. Having once arrived at that point, what we have to consider in this case is "is this third-party notice were it to form a writ of summons capable of being served out of the jurisdiction upon a third party"? In considering that question one must have regard to the parties—that is, not to the claim of the plaintiff in the action, but to the claim of the defendant against the third party. You must treat the claim of the defendant against the third party as if it were a claim on a writ of summons and see if that claim comes within the rules as to the service of writs out of the jurisdiction that is within ord. 11, r. 1. If it does, then leave can be given for the service; if not, leave cannot be given In my opinion it is plain here that there is no case for giving leave because the case cannot be brought within any one of the provisions of ord. 11, r. 1. For the purpose of considering whether service of a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction should be allowed you have nothing to do with the subject-matter of claim in the action itself; you can only look at the nature of the claim made by the notice and the position of the person who is sought to be served. The rules are really plain, and the matter is, in my opinion, free from doubt.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I will only add this, that in my opinion the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-section 3, supports the view taken by Vaughan Williams, L.J., that the third-party procedure was created by the Judicature Act. Subsection 3 of section 24 provides that the court may grant to a defendant "all such relief relating to or connected with the original subject of the cause or matter, and in like manner claimed against any other person, whether already a party to the same cause or matter or not, who shall have been duly served with notice in writing of such claim, pursuant to any rule of court or any order of the court as might properly have been granted against such person if he had been made a defendant to a cause duly instituted by the same defendant for the like purpose." The Act therefore treats the third-party procedure as analogous to a cause instituted by the defendant as plaintiff against the third party.

Then, in the rules, which have the force of statutory authority, we find provisions on the subject of service out of the jurisdiction. Those are in order 11, and on reading those provisions we find that what we have to consider is, what is the proper procedure supposing a defendant has instituted a cause against a third party "for the like purpose," that is, for the same object as that of the third-party notice. If that is so, then it is clear that in the present case the order for service out of the jurisdiction ought to be discharged, for an action for contribution is not mentioned in ord. 11, r. 1, at all.

I say nothing with regard to adding Mrs. Cronyn as a defendant under ord. 16, r. 11, as that question is not now before us. No doubt the judge may in certain cases have a discretion to add a defendant even in the absence of the plaintiff, but such a discretion can only be exercised under very special circumstances. At present we have not to deal with any question of that kind.

Will — Charitable legacy — Charity which has never existed — General charitable intention — Cy-près— Class of residuary legatees.

In the case of a legacy to a charity which has never existed, the court will lean towards finding in the will indications of a general charitable intention. Such indications are furnished by (1) the interpolation of the legacy in question amongst other charitable legacies; (2) a power to the executors to determine questions as to what charities are intended to be benefited; and (3) a bequest of residue to the charitable institutions mentioned. The legacy, consequently, does not lapse, but is administered cy-près. The institution or authority which administers the legacy cy-près is included in the words "charitable institutions which are beneficiaries under this instrument," and, consequently, takes a share of a residuary bequest to such institutions.

Adjourned summons.

By her will, dated the 30th of March, 1894, Sarah Davis, among other charitable legacies, bequeathed a sum of £500 to "The Home for the Homeless, 27, Red Lion-square, London." The will contained declarations that the receipt of the respective treasurers of the institution named should be a sufficient discharge to her executors for the legacies, and that in the event of any question arising as to the designation of any of the charitable institutions therein-before mentioned, or of any doubt arising as to which one of two or more institutions it was intended to benefit, the decision should rest absolutely with her executor. There was also a gift of residue to be divided rateably "among the various charitable institutions which are beneficiaries under this instrument."

The testatrix died on the 13th of March, 1899.

There was not, and never had been, any institution in London known as "The Home for the Homeless."

The present summons was taken out by the executor, asking how the legacy and share of residue were to be applied. Several societies claimed them, but their claims were disallowed. The question as to the application of the legacy was first argued.

H. M. Humphrey, for the executor.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Cann, for the next-of-kin.—The question is whether the testatrix has shown a general or a particular charitable intention; in the latter case the legacy lapses, and is not applied cy-près: In re Ovey, 33 W. R. 821, 29 Ch. D. 560. Although the legacy is interspersed with other charitable legacies, it cannot be said that, in respect of it, any general charitable intention has been shown. Loscombe v. Wintringham, 13 Beav. 87; In re Clergy Society, 4 W. R. 664, 2 K. & J. 615; and In re Maguire, 18 W. R. 623, L. R. 9 Eq. 632, are distinguishable; in the two former cases the testator clearly had no particular institution in his mind; the last was a case of misdescription of the particular charity intended. Hoare v. Hoare, 56 L. T. Rep. 147, 35 W. R. Dig. 179, where the gift was to a charity which had never existed, is in our favour.

They also referred to Clark v. Taylor, 1 W. R. 476, 1 Drew. 642, and In re Rymer, 43 W. R. 87, [1895] 1 Ch. 19.

Stone, for the residuary legatees, argued that the legacy had lapsed and had fallen into residue.

He referred to In re White's Trusts, 34 W. R. 771, 33 Ch. D. 449.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.—It is only in cases where charities have existed at the date of the will and have ceased to exist before the date of the death that the courts have held that there is no general charitable intention. It is impossible to say that there is an intention to benefit a particular charity where that charity has never existed. Hoare v. Hoare is the only case against me, and it depended on its own facts. I rely on In re Clergy Society and In re Maguire, and ask that a scheme may be directed for the administration of the legacy cy-près.

H. Terrell, K.C., in reply.—The direction in the will as to ascertaining which one of two or more charities is intended to be benefited, and the particularity with which she described the object of the legacy, negative the construction that the testatrix meant to benefit any but particular charities; that being the case, there is no distinction between the cases of a charity which has ceased to exist and of one which has never existed at all.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, said: The question to be determined is whether, upon the whole of this will, there is a lapse by reason of that state of facts, or whether there is an indication of a general charitable intention, so that effect can be given to the bequest although the legatee is non-existent. There is one class of cases which deals with the state of facts where a legacy is given to a charitable institution which has existed, but which has ceased to exist before the death of the testator. In those cases there was held to be a lapse. The authorities for that are the decisions of Kindersley, V.C., in Clark v. Taylor, of Stuart, V.C., in Russell v. Kellett, 3 Sm. & Giff. 264, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 131, and of Page Wood, V.C., in Fisk v. Attorney-General, 15 W. R. 1200, L. R. 4 Eq. 521. In the last case the Vice-Chancellor said: "There is the other point which was argued by Mr. Wickens, as to the gift to the charity which no longer exists. I am far from saying that that argument may not, some day or other, require further consideration"; that is to say, the Vice-Chancellor doubted whether, in such a state of facts, you might not be able to find a general charitable intention. Since that decision there have been the cases of In re Ovey and, in the Court of Appeal, of In re Rymer, and it must now be taken that the indication of Page Wood, V.C., has gone, and that the rule in Clark v. Taylor is the right rule. Lord Herschell, in In re Rymer, [1895] 1 Ch., at p. 34, says, as regards Clark v. Taylor, "decided forty years ago, but which has been followed often since, that there is really no authority in any way conflicting with that series of decisions. Certainly on principle they seem to be sound." So that if there be a gift to a charitable institution which existed but has ceased to exist, there is a lapse. That is not this case, which is that of a gift to a charitable institution which never existed at all. There are four decisions on that class of case. The principle which underlies them is that where you find a gift to a charitable institution which never existed, the court, which always leans in favour of a charity, is more ready to infer a general charitable intention. Of course it is possible to contemplate that the testator intended to benefit a particular charity which he thought existed, but which did not exist. But the courts have not regarded that as most probable. They have said that he described a purpose and not a person. Now of those four cases I take the first and the last to have less bearing on the present case than the others.

The first case is Loscombe v. Wintringham. The gift there was to the trustees of "a society instituted for the increase and encouragement of good servants." The first comment is that no society is named by name; a particular sort of society was pointed to, and that was all. It was easy to arrive at the conclusion that the object of the testator was to give to a purpose and not to a person. It was held that there was a good charitable gift. The last case is Hoare v. Hoare. The facts there were that a settlor granted a certain rent-charge to provide for the payment of the salary of a priest in his private chapel, to apply a certain sum for lighting, and to apply annual sums for teaching, the payment of a schoolmaster and schoolmistress, keeping schools and almshouses in order, and poor labourers' dwelling-houses. The chapel was private and had never been consecrated or dedicated. The court held that this was not a disposition for a general charitable purpose. His purpose was only to devote a sum of money for his own private chapel and estate. The purposes had failed having regard to the definition of them. That case turned on its own facts and does not assist in principle. From the other two cases a principle is to be deduced. In In re Clergy Society legacies were given to the Church Building Society, the Clergy Society, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, the Church Missionary Society, and the Clergy Orphan Society—they were all to be charities established in London. There was no Clergy Society established in London. There was one in Gloucester. Several societies came forward. The court came to the conclusion that a good general charitable purpose was disclosed. The principle on which the court proceeded (p. 622) was that, having regard to the position of the gift in question as regards other gifts, there was sufficient to show a general charitable intention. The Vice-Chancellor said: "It was suggested that the bequest must be considered void for uncertainty, because no object can be found to answer the description. In the case before Knight Bruce, L.J., there was a gift to a charity in Middlesex, and there being none which answered the description, it was held that the court had authority to direct a scheme; and, in this case, this legacy being preceded by a legacy to the Church Building Society, and followed by legacies to the Church Missionary Society, I think there was sufficient on the face of the will to show that the testatrix meant to confer a charitable benefit on the clergy of the Church of England." That was the ratio decidendi in that case. The other case was In re Maguire, decided by James, V.C. In my opinion it was a very strong case. The gift was to the Church Pastoral Aid Society in Ireland. There was no such institution. The preceding gift was to the Church Pastoral Aid Society in England. There was such an institution. I should have thought that there was strong ground for saying that the intention was to benefit a person not a purpose. The Vice-Chancellor thought not. There was a preceding gift to the Additional Curates Aid Society in Ireland. These are all the material facts. The Vice-Chancellor's judgment is this: "The intention of the testatrix to devote this sum to charity, are also the particular object of the charity, and sufficiently indicated by the name of the society itself, and by the place in which the legacy is found among other legacies to charity. There can be no doubt of the intention of the testatrix to provide for the objects embraced by the Spiritual Aid Society," that is to say, the Additional Curates Aid Society—it had changed its name, "and it follows from Loscombe v. Wintringham and In re Clergy Society that this is a perfectly good charitable bequest," and further down, referring to Fisk v. Attorney-General, he says, "I certainly do not intend myself to go further than Wood, V.C., did, but in this case there is a clear intention by the testatrix to effect a particular object of charity—pastoral aid in Ireland—which is carried out by the society now claiming it. I apprehend the Attorney-General will not object, and there will be an order for payment of the legacy to the Spiritual Aid Society for Ireland to be applied for the purposes of church pastoral aid in Ireland." That Spiritual Aid Society was one to which there had been a gift made. The principle of these two cases is that the court will lean towards finding in a case where a charity never existed at all evidence of a general charitable intention, and will take small indications on the face of the will in order to say that a purpose is meant and not a person. The present gift is interpolated between other charitable gifts. [His lordship then summarized the charitable legacies, and continued:] So that you find this gift to a non-existent society interpolated between gifts to the blind, orphans, deaf and dumb. I find one ground relied on in both In re Clergy Society and In re Maguire. Then follows the provision of the will that, "in case of any question arising as to the designation of any of the charitable institutions hereinbefore mentioned, or of any doubt existing as to which one of two or more of such institutions it is intended to benefit, the decision shall rest absolutely with my executors" There I find an indication that the testatrix intended that her charitable intention should not fail because she had mistaken the person to whom she directed the legacy to be paid. Then as to the residue she says: "It shall be divided rateably among the various charitable institutions which are beneficiaries under this instrument." I think there is more room here than in the two cases I have mentioned for the court to infer a general charitable intention. I wish to add that Loscombe v. Wintringham, In re Clergy Society, and In re Maguire were considered in In re Rymer. Lord Herschell says that those cases form a class which establish a principle which guided the court in Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 36, and Mills v. Farmer, 1 Mer. 55, and from the latter case he read the language of Lord Eldon: "But to give effect to a bequest in favour of a charity the court will . . . supply the place of an executor and carry into effect that which in the case of individuals must have failed altogether. This distinction has proceeded partly, perhaps, on principles of the Roman law which we do not at this time perfectly comprehend; and partly, no doubt, on the religious notions which formerly obtained in this country, according to which it fell to the ordinary's province to distribute in case of intestacy. A third principle, which it is now too late to call in question, is that in all cases in which the testator has expressed an intention to give to charitable purposes, if that intention is declared absolutely, and nothing is left uncertain but the mode in which it is to be carried into effect, the intention will be carried into execution by this court, which will then supply the mode which alone was left deficient." That is the principle on which In re Clergy Society and In re Maguire were decided. I therefore hold that this legacy is effectual.

On the question of the distribution of the share of residue left to "The Home for the Homeless."

Stone, for the residuary legatees.—The residue should be divided between the other charitable institutions named in the will; the legacy to "The Home for the Homeless" will be applied either by the Crown under the sign-manual or by the court cy-près. In either case the individuals or authorities who administer the legacy will not be "beneficiaries under this instrument," and they will not necessarily be "charitable institutions."

He referred to Moggridge v. Thackwell.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.

BUCKLEY, J.—A further question is raised as to whether the residue is to be divided rateably among the various charitable institutions which are beneficiaries under the will. It is argued that the authority which may have to effectuate the general charitable purpose as regards this legacy may not be within the words "charitable institutions." The question is whether, having regard to Moggridge v. Thackwell, the purpose here described is a general indefinite purpose, in which case the king by sign-manual might deal with the fund, or whether there is an object pointed out, in which case the court might deal with it. The purpose seems to me not to be indefinite, but in either case I think it would be a narrow construction of the residuary gift to hold that the authority which is to give effect to the gift is not within the words "charitable institutions which are beneficiaries under this instrument." They are large enough to cover the authority which administers the legacy. I think the residue goes rateably to the institutions named, including the institution or authority which has to administer the legacy.

LEIGH v. LEIGH. (a.)

Advowson—Sale of glebe—Private Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. xvi.)—Patron—Infant—Consent to sale—Trustees of settlement—Guardian.

By a private Act glebe land was vested in trustees, with power to sell with the consent of the patron, "who shall be seised of the advowson thereof in possession, whether for an estate of inheritance or any less estate, and by the guardians of any such patron or patrons, being an infant or infants."

The patron was an infant whose estates had been settled by an indenture which provided (inter alia) that, during the minority of the patron, the trustees should have power to present to any vacant benefice.

Held, that the trustees were not entitled to the advowson "for any estate of inheritance or any less estate" within the meaning of the Act; and that the guardian of the infant was the proper person to give the consent to the sale.

This was a summons taken out to determine who had the right to consent to the sale of glebe land of the rectory of Walton-on-the-Hill.

The patron was an infant.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 10th of July, 1901, there was conveyed to trustees the advowson and perpetual right of patronage and presentation of and to the rectory or parish church of Walton-on-the-Hill to hold the same unto the said trustees and their heirs to the use of the plaintiff John Cecil Gerard Leigh (now an infant) in tail male with remainders over." It was also provided "that during the minority of any person who under the limitations hereinbefore contained is or would if of full age be entitled for the time being to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the freehold hereditaments hereby settled as tenant in tail male or in tail by purchase, the trustees or trustee may present a fit person to any vacant ecclesiastical benefice either absolutely or subject to such lawful terms as to resignation as the trustees or trustee deem proper."

In 1843 a private Act (6 & 7 Vict. c xvi.) was passed by which the glebe land of Walton-on-the-Hill was vested in trustees with power to sell with the consent of the patron or patrons.

The question now to be determined was whether the trustees of the settlement or the infant's mother, who was his testamentary guardian, was to give the patron's consent to the sale.

Methold, for the trustees, argued that during the minority of the tenant in tail male the trustees were the proper persons to give the required consent.

Arkle, for other trustees.

R. J. Parker, for the infant.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In my opinion the proper person to give the consent in this case is the guardian under the provisions of the private Act. Section 41 of this Act provides "that all acts, matters, and things by this Act authorized to be done, and every consent required to be signified by the patron of any of the aforesaid rectories or of the said present rectory and of the said vicarage of Walton-on-the-Hill, may be done and signified by the patrons or patron for the time being of the said respective benefices, whether one or more, who shall be seised of the advowson thereof in possession, whether for an estate of inheritance or any less estate, and by any such patron or patrons being a married woman or married women, notwithstanding her or their coverture, and by the guardians or committees of any such patron or patrons being an infant or infants, lunatic or lunatics, idiot or idiots respectively; and that every act, matter, or thing which shall be done, and every consent which shall be so signified, shall be as valid and effectual as if the party or parties by whom or on whose account such act, matter, or thing shall be done and such consent signified was or were seised of the said advowson in fee simple in possession and free from any incapacity."

BOWATER & SONS v. MIRROR OF LIFE CO. (LIMITED). TOPICAL TIMES CO. (LIMITED) (Third Parties). (a.)

Contract—Sale of business—Benefit of pending contracts—Assignment—Indemnity.

An agreement for the purchase and sale of a newspaper business contained a term or condition that the vendors should sell and the purchasers should purchase "the full benefit of all pending contracts and engagements and of all other property to which the vendors are or may be entitled in connection with the said journal."

Held, that the purchasers took the burden of pending contracts, and did not merely acquire an option to take the benefit of such contracts.

Action tried in the Commercial Court without a jury.

By an agreement in writing dated the 21st of July, 1899, between the plaintiffs, who were paper merchants, and the defendants, who carried on the business of publishing a journal called the Mirror of Life, the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendants agreed to purchase a quantity of paper for the purposes of the said journal.

By an agreement in writing dated the 3rd of July, 1901, between the defendants and the Topical Times Co. (Limited) the defendants agreed to sell and the Topical Times Co. (Limited) agreed to purchase the business of publishing the said journal. One of the terms or conditions of this agreement was that the vendors should sell and the purchasers purchase "the full benefit of all pending contracts and engagements and of all other property to which the vendors are or may be entitled in connection with the said journal."

The plaintiffs sued the defendants for breach of contract in not accepting the aforesaid quantity of paper. The defendants brought in the Topical Times Co. (Limited) as third parties, claiming an indemnity against them under the agreement of the 3rd of July, 1901.

It was admitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and the only question was as to the defendants' right to an indemnity.

It was contended for the defendants that the agreement of the 3rd of July, 1901, operated as an assignment, and that the defendants were entitled to an indemnity.

On behalf of the third parties it was contended that they had acquired merely the option to take the benefit of this contract, and until such an option had been exercised—that is, until there was an election—no liability passed.

KENNEDY, J.—On the construction of the agreement I am of opinion that the third parties take the advantages of contracts, not merely an option. An agreement like this is for the purchase and sale of the advantage of contracts entered into by the defendants, and it passes the burden as well. Without an express indemnity there is, in an assignment of business contracts of this kind, an implied indemnity.

GENERAL ACCIDENT ASSURANCE CORPORATION v. NOEL. (a.)

Principal and agent—Contract—Agreement by agent not to interfere with business after ceasing to be employed — Breaches — Liquidated damages — Injunction — Election.

The plaintiffs, an assurance company, appointed the defendant their agent under an agreement, in which it was provided that in the event of the defendant ceasing to act as such agent he should in no way give information about the company's connections or interfere either directly or indirectly with the company's business, or represent any other company doing a similar business within a radius of fifty miles from the headquarters of his agency within one year from the date of his ceasing to act for the plaintiff company, and that in case of the breach of the agreement in that behalf he should forfeit and pay to the plaintiffs a sum of £100 by way of ascertained and liquidated damages.

The defendant having committed breaches of the agreement, the plaintiffs brought an action against him and claimed the £100 liquidated damages and an injunction to restrain him from interfering with their business.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction as well as to the liquidated damages, but must elect between the two remedies.

Action tried before Wright, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs' claim was for an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering either directly or indirectly with the business of the plaintiffs or from representing any other office in a similar business to plaintiffs' in breach of an agreement made between the plaintiffs and the defendant dated the 15th of January, 1900.

They further claimed £100 as liquidated damages for breach of agreement.

By the aforesaid agreement the plaintiffs appointed

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

the defendant to act as their inspector of agents at London or otherwise as the plaintiffs should determine, and the defendant after the date of the agreement acted in that capacity at Oxford.

The agreement contained the following clause: "It is hereby agreed . . . that this appointment is given with the distinct understanding that, should the within-named representative cease to act at any time under this or any other agreement for this corporation, he binds himself and agrees in no way to give information about the corporation's connections, or to interfere either directly or indirectly with the business of this corporation, or to represent any other corporation doing a similar business to this corporation either directly or indirectly within a radius of fifty miles from his headquarters within one year at least from the date of his ceasing to receive remuneration of any kind from this corporation, and in case of the breach of this agreement in that behalf the said representative shall forfeit and pay to the corporation a sum of £100 by way of ascertained and liquidated damages and not by way of penalty."

On the 7th of March, 1901, the plaintiffs determined the agreement, and the defendant then ceased to act for the plaintiffs or to receive remuneration from them.

It was alleged by the plaintiffs in their statement of claim, and admitted by the defendant in his statement of defence, that the defendant since the 7th of March, 1901, had given information about the plaintiff company's connections and had interfered both directly and indirectly with the plaintiffs' business with another company doing a business similar to the plaintiffs within a radius of fifty miles of Oxford.

The defendant pleaded that he was entitled to so act as the plaintiffs had, as he alleged, wrongfully dismissed him.

The defendant further pleaded that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover liquidated damages and at the same time to have him restrained by injunction as claimed.

Danckwerts, K.C. (H. Kisch with him), for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to the £100 liquidated damages as well as to an injunction, for the defendant admits breaches. No doubt formerly if a covenantee recovered damages at law he could not obtain an injunction in equity, but was put to his election. In the Irish case of French v. Macale, 2 Dr. & War. 269, the lessee of certain ancient meadow land who had covenanted not to burn the demised premises under a penalty threatened to burn part of the premises, insisting upon his right so to do under the covenants upon payment of the sum specified as liquidated damages, and it was there held that he was not entitled to do so, and that the court would interpose by injunction to restrain him from so doing. In the same way it cannot be said here if the plaintiffs exact the liquidated damage that that will entitle the defendant to do that which he has covenanted not to do. In Robb v. Green, 44 W. R. 25, [1895] 2 Q. B. 315, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages in respect of the defendant's breach of contract and also to an injunction. The proper interpretation of the agreement in the present case is that the defendant is not to do certain things in breach for it, and if he do so, then he is to forfeit the sum of £100 as liquidated damages; and that the plaintiffs are also entitled to an injunction to restrain him from doing these things in the future. If the plaintiffs are bound to elect they prefer to have an injunction.

S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the defendant.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to both an injunction and liquidated damages. This is clear upon the authorities: Sainter v. Ferguson, 7 C. B. 716, and Carnes v. Nesbitt, 7 H. & N. 778, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 20. In the present case the £100 liquidated damages is meant to cover all possible breaches of the whole agreement, and if such liquidated damages are paid there cannot be an injunction as well. In Young v. Chalkley, 15 W. R. 743, 16 L. T. Rep. 286, the plaintiff recovered liquidated damages and under the circumstances the court refused to grant an injunction. [He also referred to Howard v. Woodward, 13 W. R. 132, 34 L. J. Ch. 47.] If the court hold that the plaintiffs must be put to their election the defendant would prefer to submit to an injunction.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—It appears to be agreed on both sides that this is a case in which an injunction can be granted, and the question is whether, under the clause in the agreement, the plaintiffs are entitled to a double remedy—that is to say, an injunction as regards the future as well as £100 as liquidated damages for breaches in the past. The cases are not in an altogether satisfactory condition on this point, for in Cole v. Sims, 2 W. R. 151, 23 L. J. Ch. 258, the view that a plaintiff under such circumstances is not entitled to the double remedy appears to receive some qualification.

The conclusion, however, that I have come to is that the current of authority, from Sainter v. Ferguson down to Howard v. Woodward and Young v. Chalkley, is to the effect that when liquidated damages are intended to cover the whole ground the plaintiff must be put to an election between them and an injunction, and if he takes liquidated damages he cannot get an injunction. The cases I have mentioned go to show that a plaintiff is not entitled to both, but must exercise an option.

If the present plaintiffs had elected to take the £100 liquidated damages they could not have had an injunction, for the £100 damages is all they would be entitled to. They have, however, elected to take an injunction, and may have judgment for that, but not for the £100 as well.

Judgment accordingly.

JEUNE, P., granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, and on the application of counsel for an order for custody of the child of the marriage said that while such an order seemed entirely illogical because it assumed that the respondent would not obey the order of the court, nevertheless section 6 of 47 & 48 Vict. c. 68 gave power to make such an order at the pronouncing of the decree, and no doubt the granting of it at that time would, as urged by counsel, save expense. The court, therefore, would give the petitioner the custody of the child until the decree was obeyed.

Ship—Admiralty—Action in rem—Negligence—Expense incurred in avoiding probable consequence of such negligence.

Where the defendants' vessel was negligently allowed to drag across and foul the chain of the plaintiffs' vessel, causing risk of collision, and the plaintiffs' vessel slipped and put to sea until daylight,

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover in an action in rem for the loss of the chain and anchor, together with the coals and stores consumed.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Norman, and claimed in an action in rem to recover the value of a chain and anchor, coals and stores, lost and consumed by reason of the steamship Norman having put to sea in order to avoid a collision with the steamship Port Victoria, which was owned by the defendants, in the circumstances hereinafter appearing.

On the 5th of October, 1900, about 3.20 p.m., the steamship Norman, a vessel of 7,537 tons register, was riding at anchor in the outer anchorage of Port Natal with about seventy-five fathoms of chain out. At the time in question there was a rough and rising sea, a heavy swell was running with the wind from the east increasing to a moderate gale. In these circumstances those in charge of the steamship Norman observing that a vessel, which proved to be the steamship Port Victoria, of 3,378 tons register, which had been lying about three-quarters of a mile ahead of them, was dragging across the bows of the steamship Norman, the engines of the steamship Norman were put slow astern and sixty extra fathoms of chain paid out, but about 5.30 the same was fouled by the steamship Port Victoria. Those in charge of the steamship Norman then signalled to the steamship Port Victoria to slip her chain and keep clear, but she continued to drag, and those in charge of the steamship Norman fearing that a collision was imminent slipped their chain and put to sea to cruise about in safety till daylight. The expenses thus incurred and the value of the anchor and cable lost were agreed at £308 1s. 6d., and was the sum claimed by the plaintiffs in the action. The defendants' case was that the steamship Norman anchored too close under the lee of the steamship Port Victoria, and that the steamship Norman did not slip her cable until after the steamship Port Victoria was all clear of her.

Scrutton, K.C., and Mackinnon, for the plaintiffs, contended (a) that by article 7 of the Regulations relating to the Port and Harbour of Port Natal, 1900, the steamship Port Victoria, being a vessel with a single anchor down, ought to have had not less than seventy fathoms of chain out, whereas in fact she had about forty-five fathoms only; (b) that it was by negligent navigation and management of those in charge of the steamship Port Victoria that she had dragged her anchor and that those in charge of her failed to see that she was dragging her anchor until she was within one-third of a mile of the steamship Norman, and that in order to avoid a collision it was a proper and seamanlike course for the master of The Norman to adopt to slip his cable and put to sea until daylight.

Aspinall, K.C., and Lewis Noad, for the defendants, contended (a) that an admiralty action in rem would not lie to recover the loss here claimed; (b) that the master of the steamship Norman became nervous and put to sea unnecessarily.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said that the principle was clear that if a vessel by negligence dragged down towards another, and if it was a natural consequence that the other vessel was obliged to take some step which involved her in expenditure, that was damage for which the former vessel was liable. The court found as a fact that the steamship Norman had not been in fault in taking up the position she had, but with regard to the steamship Port Victoria the case of negligence spoke for itself, for she had dragged owing to having insufficient cable out, and that, too, in violation of the rule of the local authorities (whatever legal force the rule might have), that vessels riding in that anchorage should have not less than seventy fathoms down. Moreover, the court had come to the conclusion that a bad look-out was certainly kept on the steamship Port Victoria, for nobody was aware of her dragging until she was tolerably close to the steamship Norman. The court, therefore, having come to the conclusion that the steamship Port Victoria was negligent, the question remained whether the expenditure incurred by the steamship Norman was the consequence of such negligence. The court thought that it was. All that had been alleged against the master of the steamship Norman was that he was unduly apprehensive. The court, however, was unable to share that view, and held that, if anything, he was unduly patient. The court did not see what action he could have taken except that which he did—viz., slipping the cable and putting to sea. The court found, therefore, that the steamship Port Victoria was liable for the loss which had occurred and which was the natural consequence of her conduct.

Judgment for the plaintiffs for £308 1s. 6d.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Earl of Auckland, Lush., 164, 387, 9 W. R. Adm. Dig. 20 considered.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Peri, and it appeared that on the 26th of March, 1901, a collision occured in the river Avon between their vessel and the defendants' vessel, the steamship Bristol City.

At the time of the collision the steamship Peri was proceeding up the river, and the steamship Bristol City was bound down in ballast for Cardiff to load coals for St. Vincent.

The plaintiffs commenced the present action and the defendants pleaded, inter alia that if the collision was caused or contributed to by any negligence in the navigation of the steamship Bristol City, which was denied, the vessel was at that time within a district in which pilotage was compulsory by law, and she was, by compulsion of law, in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whose orders the defendants were bound to obey and did obey, and the negligence (if any) was his alone.

On the 20th of November, Jeune, P., sitting with Trinity Masters, tried the action, which resulted in both vessels being found to blame, but so far as the defendants' vessel was concerned it was the fault of the pilot alone.

The pilot on the defendants' vessel held a pilotage certificate dated the 8th of December, 1891, and which was renewable annually, the material parts of which were as follows: "Whereas Alfred Sendall, master of the ship Jersey City registered at the port of Bristol, whereof Messrs. Charles Hill & Sons are the owners, has applied to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol, being a pilotage authotity within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, to be examined as to his capacity to pilot the said ship, or any one or more ships belonging to the same owners, within the district over which the said pilotage authority has jurisdiction, and whereas the said Alfred Sendall has thereupon been examined and having been found competent, the said pilotage authority do, by virtue and pursuance of the provisions of the said Act and of all other powers thereunto them enabling, grant the said Alfred Sendall this pilotage certificate to enable him to pilot the said ship or any other ship or ships belonging to the same owners of which he shall be acting as master or mate at the time, within the district over which the said pilotage authority has jurisdiction, without incurring any penalties for the non-employment of a qualified pilot." The steamship Jersey City and the steamship Bristol City both belonged to the Bristol City Line, managed by Charles Hill & Sons, but at the date of the original issue of the certificate, Charles Gaythorne Hill, a member of Charles Hill & Sons, was on the register of The Jersey City as holder of certain shares and as managing owner, and certain other shares were also held by other members of the firm.

The Bristol City was built in 1899, and the master of The Jersey City was transferred to her. At the time of the collision Charles Gaythorne Hill was on the register of The Bristol City as managing owner and holder of the whole sixty-four shares. but he was, in fact, merely trustee for beneficial owners.

Aspinall, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the plaintiffs, contended that the plea of compulsory pilotage was bad, on the ground that at the time of the collision the certificate enabled the master to pilot the steamship Bristol City within the prescribed pilotage without incurring any penalties for the non-employment of a qualified pilot. His ship therefore was an exempt ship, and therefore her owners were liable.

Laing, K.C., and Batten, for the defendants.—The certificate was invalid by reason of mis-statement as to the ownership of the vessel. Further, at the time of the renewal of the certificate, Charles Hill & Sons did not own the steamship Jersey City, nor at the time of the collision did they own the steamship Bristol City, therefore her master would not be piloting a ship within the meaning of section 599 of 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60. She was not therefore an exempt ship, and her owners therefore were not liable, as the pilot who was in charge by compulsion of law had been found alone to blame.

They cited The Earl of Auckland, Lush. 164, 387, 9 W. R. Adm. Dig. 20.

JEUNE, P., in delivering judgment, said that if the certificate had been valid it would have exempted the steamship Bristol City to the extent that the pilot on board would not be a pilot taken by compulsion of law, and therefore her owners could not plead compulsory pilotage. But he did not consider that this certificate could be considered good for that purpose. It had been objected that the mis-statement on the certificate at the time of the original issue of the certificate rendered it invalid, and the case of The Earl of Auckland, Lush. 164, was cited. But he did not think that case was conclusive on the matter, because the mis-statement there was in the actual material body of the certificate, whereas here the mis-statement was in the recital.

It recited that "Alfred Sendall, master of the ship Jersey City, whereof Charles Hill & Sons are owners." But as a matter of fact Charles Hill & Sons were not the owners. The circumstances, therefore, were not exactly the same as here, but when the future effect of the certificate was considered, the court was inclined to think that a matter arose which might well render the certificate bad; for it was not a certificate in favour of Mr. Sendall whilst master of the steamship Jersey City only, but in his favour also so long as he commanded any ship belonging to the owners of the steamship Jersey City. It was not possible to read the certificate without understanding the words "same owners" to mean the owners mentioned above, namely, Charles Hill & Sons, and if they were not the owners of the steamship Jersey City it followed that if Mr. Sendall was transferred to another vessel not owned by them, it would not be according to the terms of the certificate, but if the vessel was owned by them, then the Act of Parliament would be violated, for she would not be owned by the same persons as owned the steamship Jersey City. The certificate, therefore, could not be sustained. There was, however, a further ground which to the court appeared conclusive, and that was that the steamship Bristol City was not owned at any material time by the same owners as the steamship Jersey City. The question then arose, what was the material time as to the ownership of the steamship Jersey City? It was either the time of the original issue of the certificate, or the time of the last renewal, or else the time of the collision. One of these three times must be taken, and, perhaps, on the whole, the court ought to look at the ownership of the steamship Jersey City at the time of the renewal, but if not then at the time of the original granting of the certificate; but put either way the certificate could not be considered good, because the owners of the steamship Bristol City were not either on the 8th of December, 1891, or at the time of the last renewal, owners of the steamship Jersey City. There were great difficulties connected with these certificates, because, vessels being owned in sixty-fourths, and as some of the owners were continually changing, it was very difficult to suppose it could have been intended that a single change in the ownership of one sixty-fourth should render the renewal of the certificate practically useless. With that, however, the court had nothing to do. When the Act was passed there could be little doubt that it was contemplated that ships would be owned by companies or partnerships of a comparatively small number of persons, and possibly it might have been supposed that a fleet of ships would go on being owned by the same persons, but the law left the court no option, for as the Act spoke of "owners" that word must be taken in its ordinary sense, so that there could not be "the same owners" unless all the sixty-fourths belonged to the same person, and the change of the ownership of one sixty-fourth was a change of ownership of the ship. The court found that the certificate was bad, and, therefore, that the steamship Bristol City was at the time of the collision, by compulsion of law, in charge of a qualified pilot. The court had already found that so far as that vessel was concerned the pilot was alone to blame; but the defence of compulsory pilotage being only an alternative plea the plaintiffs' suit would, following the usual course, be dismissed without costs.

KELLY'S DIRECTORIES (LIMITED) v. GAVIN AND LLOYD'S. (a.)

Copyright—Infringement—Portions of one book printed by different printers—"Cause to be printed"—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), s. 15.

A person who has contracted to print a work for another, but subsequently allows such other person to get a portion printed elsewhere, does not "cause" such portion to be printed within the meaning of section 15 of the Copyright Act, 1842, even though his name appears on the title-page of the work as the printer.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported 49 W. R. 313, [1901] 1 Ch. 374).

The facts are very fully reported in the report of the case in the court below, but for the purposes of this report they may be stated shortly as follows:

The plaintiffs are the proprietors and publishers of the Post Office London Directory and other trade and country directories, including a directory known as "Kelly's Directory of the Merchants, Manufacturers, and Shippers of the United Kingdom and Guide to the Export and Import Shipping and Manufacturing Industries of the World," which contains a list of the names of the leading merchants, manufacturers, and shippers in the various towns in Great Britain and Ireland and in the Colonies and abroad. The names for insertion in this directory were obtained by independent inquiries made through canvassers and agents specially employed by the plaintiffs for that purpose. A new edition of this directory is brought out every year, the edition for 1899 having been published in March.

The defendant Gavin had published a book entitled Lloyd's Diary for Merchants, Shippers, and Foreign Buyers for the Year 1900. This book bore on the title-page the words "Printed at Lloyd's, Royal Exchange, London," and contained a list of colonial and foreign importers, and also of export commission merchants. The plaintiffs alleged that this list had been compiled by copying and pirating the names and other particulars therein contained from the plaintiffs' Directory of Merchants, Manufacturers, and Shippers; and they brought the present action against Gavin and Lloyd's, claiming an injunction to restrain any further printing, publishing, or sale of the defendants' book; an account of all profits made by the defendants and delivery up of all unsold copies of the book.

It appeared from the evidence that in spite of the statement on the title-page and in spite of the fact that the defendant Gavin had entered into an arrangement with Lloyd's that they should print this diary for him for a consideration in money, the whole book was not, in fact, printed by Lloyd's, but that the portion of it which contained the alleged pirated lists of shippers had been printed by Messrs. Straker on Gavin's order, and Messrs. Straker had been paid for this work by Gavin.

It was admitted at the trial that Lloyd's were not aware of the fact that these lists of merchants were pirated, and that they had never sold any copies of the infringing diary and had no intention of doing so after it was known to be a piracy, and the only question as against them was whether, having regard to their arrangement with Gavin, they "caused" the diary "to be printed" within the meaning of section 15 of the Copyright Act, 1842, so as to be liable to the plaintiffs for the costs of the action.

At the trial of the action the defendant Gavin did not appear, and the evidence satisfied the court that as against him the plaintiffs had established their case.

As regards Lloyd's, Byrne, J., held on the evidence that they had not "caused" the diary to be printed, and refused to give the plaintiffs costs as against them. But because Lloyd's had permitted the statement "printed at Lloyd's" to appear on the title-page he declined to allow them any costs as against the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Levett, K.C., and E. Ford, for the plaintiffs.—Lloyd's were really partners with Gavin in printing this book. Their case is analogous to that of a newspaper proprietor, who is responsible for a libel which appears in his newspaper, even though he is entirely ignorant of the whole matter.

They referred to Rex v. Gutch, Fisher, & Alexander, 1 Moo. & Mal. 433; Russell v. Briant, 8 C. B. 836; Lyon v. Knowles, 11 W. R. 266, 3 B & S. 556.

Scrutton, K.C., and Mackinnon, for the defendants, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question we have to decide is whether upon the evidence in this case the learned judge in the court below was right in coming to the conclusion that Lloyd's neither "printed" nor "caused to be printed" the portions of this book which are pirated. I think the conclusion the learned judge arrived at was perfectly right. It seems to me impossible to say that the defendants Lloyd's either "printed" or "caused to be printed" this book. It is hardly contended that Strakers, the actual printers, could be described as agents of Lloyd's, and the moment we arrive at the conclusion that Strakers were not the agents of Lloyd's, we are forced to fall back on the words

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"caused to be printed," because Lloyd's could only be said to have printed this book if Strakers were their agents. But it is admitted that the order to Strakers was given by Gavin, and that it was on his credit that Strakers did the work. Gavin is the person they have to sue if they wish to be paid. Of course, if it could be shown that Lloyd's were partners or joint adventurers with Gavin, the fact that Strakers were agents of Gavin would make them also agents of Lloyd's; but it seems to me plain that Strakers were the agents of Gavin, and no such connection has been proved between Lloyd's and Gavin in respect of this printing which was done by Strakers as would make Lloyd's and Gavin partners. The consequence is that the appellants have to rely on the words "caused to be printed"; but when it is asked in what sense Lloyd's "caused" this pirated matter to be printed, the appellant can only say that at one time Lloyd's were under a contract to print the pages in which the pirated matter occur themselves. By a lucky accident they were so busy that they were willing to forego printing these pages themselves, and Gavin was willing that they should forego the printing, one inducement being that he could get the work done more cheaply elsewhere. But that only comes to this, that Lloyd's permitted Gavin to get the work done himself, and if a man who has a right to print chooses to stand aside and lets someone else get the printing done, I do not think that man can be said to cause the work to be printed. In my judgment it is plain that there is no evidence that Lloyd's either printed or caused to be printed this book.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree. I have nothing to add.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I also agree. I will only add that the attempt to show that Lloyd's either permitted or caused to be printed this book was partly based on the statement on the title-page that the book was "Printed at Lloyd's, Royal Exchange, London." If that statement had been relied on as creating an estoppel against Lloyd's, I could have understood it, but that argument was abandoned as hopeless, and that being so, I agree with Vaughan Williams, L.J., in thinking that there is no evidence that Lloyd's either printed or caused to be printed the portions of this book which are complained of.

HADDOCK'S CASE.
HOYLE'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Private examination—Solicitor—Terms upon which a solicitor may appear for a witness—Privilege—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 115.

In the liquidation of a company a witness at his private examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, was represented by a solicitor who was also acting for the defendant in a pending action in which the company was the plaintiff.

The clerk of such solicitor was held not to be entitled to be present at such examination unless he gave an undertaking to use the information he obtained there for the purpose of that examination only.

The solicitor had had in his possession documents belonging to the company which were wrongfully handed to him by a servant or servants of the company. His privilege as solicitor excused his answering from whom he received such documents.

The London and Northern Bank (Limited) was in voluntary liquidation, and an action by the bank against Sir G. Newnes (Limited) for libel was pending.

After the commencement of this action the liquidator learnt that various documents belonging to the bank had been wrongfully handed by a servant or servants of the bank to the solicitor for Sir G. Newnes (Limited): see Archer's case, ante, p. 167, 46 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 176.*

The liquidator in the voluntary winding up obtained an order for the private examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, of inter alios Mr. Haddock, for some time secretary of the bank, and Mr. Hoyle, solicitor to Sir G. Newnes (Limited). Mr. Hoyle also appeared for Mr. Haddock at the private examination.

HADDOCK'S CASE.

At Haddock's examination counsel on behalf of the liquidator applied that Mr. Hoyle, being himself a witness, should withdraw. Mr. Hoyle withdrew, and counsel then asked that his managing clerk, an admitted solicitor, should also withdraw; to this counsel for the witness objected, and the registrar ruled that Mr. Hoyle's clerk could only remain on giving an undertaking to treat the whole matter as private, to use the information obtained from the witness's answers for purposes of re-examination only, and to communicate such information to no other person or persons whatsoever except his counsel. Haddock's counsel objected to any such limitation being imposed, and advised Haddock to refuse to answer any question in the absence of his solicitor. The matter was adjourned to the judge for his consideration.

HOYLE'S CASE.

In the course of Hoyle's examination he was asked, "From whom did you receive these documents?" He refused to answer, claiming his privilege as a solicitor, and on that ground the registrar ruled that he need not answer. The liquidator moved to discharge this ruling.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 6.—BYRNE, J.—An examination under section 115 must be considered a private proceeding wherein information is sought for the use of the court in the winding up. Under the Winding-up Rules of November, 1895, the notes of the depositions of a person examined under section 115 or any order of the court are not placed upon the bill of proceedings, or open to the inspection of any creditor contributory or other person except the official receiver or liquidator, without the direction of the court. It is not disputed that the witness has a right to be represented by solicitor and counsel; it is argued on behalf of Mr. Haddock in effect that he has a right to be represented by a particular solicitor who is to be able to use the information obtained at this examination for the purposes of entirely different legal proceedings. This is putting the rights of the solicitor too high. There is an old case in bankruptcy—In re Towsey, 9 L. T. Rep. 613, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 23—which seems in point. In that case Mr. Commissioner Goulburn said in his judgment: "If the court appoint a private sitting, and it sees good reason to apprehend that the object of that meeting may be defeated by the presence of a gentleman who is both solicitor for the bankrupt and for the witness, it may order such person to withdraw." The registrar was quite justified in ordering the managing clerk to withdraw unless he gave the required undertaking.

In Hoyle's case there was nothing to deprive that gentleman of his solicitor's privilege. The registrar's ruling was perfectly correct, and the motion to discharge it fails.

McCHEANE v. GYLES. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Adding defendant—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11.

In an action where the defendant is sued in respect of a matter for which he is jointly and severally liable with another person, ord. 16, r. 11, does not enable the court, upon the application of the defendant, to add that other person as a party to the action in order that the defendant may claim contribution from him.

Summons.

This was a summons in the above action asking for an order that Caroline Eliza Cronyn might be added as a co-defendant to the action, and that the trial of the action might be stayed until twenty-eight days after her appearance.

The plaintiff was sole beneficiary under a settlement of which the defendant and John Cronyn were the trustees. He alleged that they had invested the trust fund upon an insufficient and improper security, and that it had been lost, and he brought this action against Gyles claiming payment by Gyles to him of the sum lost.

Cronyn had died, and his widow, C. E. Cronyn, was his administratrix. She resided in Ireland. Gyles had applied for leave to serve a third-party notice upon Mrs. Cronyn claiming contribution against her as administratrix of her deceased husband in respect of sums recovered against him by the plaintiff. This leave, at first granted by Byrne, J., was refused by the Court of Appeal (see ante, p. 376, [1902] 1 Ch. 287) upon the ground that leave to the defendant to serve an original writ could not be granted under the circumstances, and a third-party notice must be treated upon the same principle.

The defendant thereupon made this application for Mrs. Cronyn to be made a defendant.

The plaintiff opposed the application.

Austen-Cartmell, for the applicant.—Mrs. Cronyn, as legal personal representative of her deceased husband, is liable to contribute towards what may be recovered from the defendant if the action succeeds, and the defendant wishes to have her made a defendant in the action so as to be able to serve her with a third-party notice. The court has power to make the the order asked for under R. S. C. ord. 16, r. 11, as was done in the cases of Wilson v. Church, 26 W. R. 735, 9 Ch. D. 552; Dix v. The Great Western Railway Co., 34 W. R. 712, and Montgomery v. Foy, Morgan, & Co., 43 W. R. 691, [1895] 2 Q. B. 321. The older cases to the contrary are no longer law.

He also referred to Dickson v. Law and Davidson, 43 W. R. 596, [1895] 2 Ch. 62.

Douglas, for the plaintiff.—In Norris v. Beazley, 25 W. R. 320, 2 C. P. D. 80, a similar application, was refused, Coleridge, C.J., saying that the rule was not intended to apply where the person to be added as defendant is a person against whom the plaintiff had no claim, and does not desire to prosecute any, for the convenience of another defendant. The application was also refused in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 35 W. R. 173, 34 Ch. D. 261, and in Moser v. Marsden, 40 W. R. 520, [1892] 1 Ch. 487. If Mrs. Cronyn were made a defendant and the plaintiff had no evidence against her, and the action was dismissed as against her, the plaintiff would have to bear her costs. [BUCKLEY, J.—If I made the order it would only be upon the condition of the defendant giving the plaintiff a proper indemnity as to her costs.]

BUCKLEY, J.—If I could have seen my way I should have been glad to have made the order asked for. If the order could be made it would provide a means whereby the claim of the defendant Gyles upon the legal personal representative of the deceased trustee could be decided in this action. If she is not made a party, as the judgment in this action will not bind her, the same matter may have to be gone into again in another action.

The plaintiff as cestui que trust is suing the defendant in respect of a transaction for which the defendant and the deceased trustee were jointly and severally liable. The plaintiff says that Gyles is liable, and that he sues him, and that he is not bound to sue both the trustees, even if he alleges that the other one is guilty of the breach of trust. Now can I as against the plaintiff make an order that Mrs. Cronyn should be joined as defendant? I think I cannot do so. There is, no doubt, a class of cases where such an order has been made. Wilson v. Church is one of these. There the plaintiff was suing in a representative capacity, and the court ordered a person to be added as defendant whom the plaintiff did not represent. Dix v. Great Western Railway Co. was decided upon similar grounds. In both of these cases the court could not adjudicate effectually and completely without the presence as parties of the persons sought to be made defendants, and the cases fall under ord. 16, r. 11.

Montgomery v. Foy, Morgan, & Co. was a peculiar case. In his judgment Kay, L.J., said, "I wish to guard myself against being supposed to decide that in all cases it would be a sufficient reason for joining a person as a defendant that if joined he would have a counter-claim against the plaintiff. This is a peculiar case." It is certainly not an authority for the proposition that if a plaintiff elects to sue one of two persons jointly and severally liable, the one sued may bring in the other as a defendant, so as to claim contribution from him.

Directly you look at the language of the rule you see that if the person sought to be added as defendant is not necessary for the decision of the action he cannot be added under that rule. The question in this case is, was Gyles guilty of a breach of trust in advancing the trust money upon the mortgage in question? Upon that question I can adjudicate effectually and completely without the presence of Mrs. Cronyn, and therefore I have no power to accede to this application. There is another ground for refusing the order asked for. The writ was issued the 25th of March, 1901, the statement of claim was delivered the 3rd of May, 1901, and the defence in August, 1901, and the plaintiff may set the action down for trial next week. Under these circumstances I do not think I ought to delay the action because it would be convenient for the defendant to set up a claim against Mrs. Cronyn. I dismiss the summons.

At the time of his death Charles John Partington was possessed of certain leasehold houses which were held by him for the unexpired residues of long terms.

By his will he bequeathed them to his trustees upon trust that they should "by and out of the rents and profits thereof pay the rents and annual sums reserved by the leases thereof respectively, and perform and observe the lessees' covenants, and conditions in the said leases respectively contained, and subject thereto," that they should hold the same premises upon trust for a tenant for life with divers remainders over.

The sanitary authorities served notice to repair the drains; in consequence of such notice works were executed, constituting, as it appeared, an installation of a new drainage system, and costing £415 10s. 1d.

It was admitted by the tenant for life that the repairs were covered by the covenants in the respective leases.

One of the questions to be determined on the present summons, which was taken out by the trustees of the will, was whether this sum of £415 10s. 1d. was to be charged to capital or income.

H. Greenwood, for the trustees.

H. S. Preston, for the tenant for life.—These repairs are "improvements" within section 25 (xviii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, because they are not such as an occupying tenant would execute: In re Tucker's Settled Estates, 43 W. R. 581, [1895] 2 Ch. 468, at p. 473. Capital money can, therefore, be applied in payment for them under section 21 (iii.), and the application of capital money is to be made according to the direction of the tenant for life: section 22 (2). The fact that the trustees have a power to effect repairs and improvements out of income will not interfere with the right of the tenant for life to have the improvements paid for out of capital: Clarke v. Thornton, 35 W. R. 603, 35 Ch. D. 307. If the will should be held to impose a trust on the trustees to pay for improvements out of capital, it is in conflict with the Settled Land Act, and the Settled Land Act prevails: In re Thomas, 48 W. R. 409, [1900] 1 Ch. 319; In re Richardson, [1900] 2 Ch. 778, 49 W. R. Dig. 159. The tenant for life is restrained from anticipation; the trustees have paid the money, but they have no right to be recouped out of her future income.

He also referred to In re Lever, 45 W. R. 172, [1897] 1 Ch. 32.

Underhill, for some of the defendants who claimed to be interested in remainder.—Inasmuch as no scheme was submitted prior to the execution of the works it is necessary to apply to the court under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. Under that section, where the settlor has created a special fund for repairs and improvements, the court may decline to exercise its discretion in favour of the tenant for life: Cardigan v. Curzon-Howe, 9 Times L. R. 244. This case falls within the principle of In re Betty, [1899] 1 Ch. 821, 47 W. R. Dig. 211.

B. Fuller, for other defendants who also claimed to be interested in remainder.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: The question I have to determine is whether this sum of £415 10s. 1d. ought to be paid out of the capital of the settled property, or whether the same or any part thereof, ought to be paid out of income. For the purposes of this decision it may be assumed that some part of the work is not mere repair, but would be an "improvement" under the Settled Land Acts. Under the disposition in the testator's will the tenant for life is not entitled to the rents of these premises. The trusts are, out of the rents and profits to pay the rents reserved by, and perform the covenants contained in, the leases, and it is only "subject thereto" that the defendant is entitled as tenant for life. In other words, she is tenant for life, not of the rents of these leaseholds, but of the balance of such rents after first paying, among other things, this sum of £415 10s. 1d. It has, however, been argued before me, on her behalf, that the provisions of the Settled Land Acts override the trusts of the will, and that I ought to deal with the matter as if she were not tenant for life of this balance, but were tenant for life entitled to have the provisions of the Settled Land Acts so applied as to throw the expense of so much as falls within "improvements" upon capital, and thus increase the balance to come to her under the trusts as income. For this proposition the authority relied upon is the decision of Chitty, J., in Clarke v. Thornton. I do not think that authority supports the contention. The facts there were that the trustees were to enter into possession or receipt of the rents, and to manage the estate, with powers of management sufficient to include the making of improvements, and a trust out of the rents to pay the expenses incurred in management or in exercise of any of their powers. An outlay of £4,396 was required for repairs and improvements. The trustees had not done, or determined to do, the works under their power. There were two applications before the court, the one by the tenant for life in remainder to have these works done at the expense of income, and the other by the tenant for life in possession to have them, or such of them as were not ordinary repairs, done at the expense of certain accumulated rents which were capital. The applications were made in an action which had been instituted for the administration of the trusts of the will. Under these circumstances there were two powers available—that is to say, first, the court might direct the trustees to proceed under their powers in the will, in which case there would have been a trust to pay the expenses out of income; or secondly, the court might not direct the trustees to proceed under that power, but might, under the Settled Land Acts, provide for such as were improvements at the expense of capital. The court took the latter course. There was not in Clarke v. Thornton, as there is here, a trust coming before the trust for the tenant for life and providing for improvements out of income. There would have been such a trust if the trustees had proceeded, or the court had directed them to proceed, in exercise of their power, an event which did not happen. That decision was followed by Stirling, J., in Lord Stamford's Settled Estates, 38 W. R. 317, 43 Ch. D. 84, and, again, in that case, there was no trust for payment of improvements out of income before arriving at the amount payable to the tenant for life. The learned judge, 43 Ch. D. at p. 96, says that in Clarke v. Thornton "the will had thrown the improvements on the income." By this he meant, I think, that if they were provided for, not under the Settled Land Acts, but by the exercise of the power in the will, they were thrown upon income—not that they were thrown by the will upon income in any event. I think, therefore, that income and not capital, ought to bear the £415 10s. 1d. There is another ground upon which I think this case ought again to be decided in the same way. These repairs and improvements cannot be provided for out of capital under the Settled Land Act, 1882, because they have been executed without first carrying in a scheme for their execution. The application must be made under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. Under that section there is a discretion in the court: Cardigan v. Curzon-Howe. How ought I to exercise this discretion when the testator has expressly provided that these expenses shall be borne by income? It seems to me that I ought to throw them where the testator throws them, and direct the trustees to pay these expenses out of income, inasmuch as the works fall within the obligation to perform and observe the lessees' covenants in the leases It is said that the tenant for life is restrained from anticipation. I do not see that any difficulty arises from this fact. There will be no further income coming to her under the trust in the will until there shall have been discharged this amount, the payment of which under the trust has priority over the payment to her. I therefore hold that the £415 10s. 1d. is to be borne by income.

Donatio mortis causâ—Donor's cheque—Cheque presented but not paid in donor's lifetime.

The delivery of a donor's own cheque to a donee does not operate as an equitable assignment to the donee of any part of the donor's balance at the bank. Consequently, if the cheque be not paid, actually or constructively, before the donor's death, there can be no donatio mortis causâ of such cheque; where the donor's account is in debit, even though the banker is willing to honour an overdraft, the mere presentation of the cheque does not amount to a constructive payment.

Adjourned summons.

One of the questions raised by this summons was whether a valid donatio mortis causâ had been constituted under the circumstances next hereinafter stated.

On the 19th of February, 1901, Mr. Beaumont was very ill and in expectation of death. His niece was called into his room, and he told her that he must draw a cheque in favour of Mrs. Ewbank at once, for fear he should get worse. The niece filled up a cheque for £300, which Mr. Beaumont signed. The niece, by his direction, gave the cheque to Mrs. Ewbank.

His lordship held that the cheque had been effectually delivered to Mrs. Ewbank, and found that it was given in anticipation of death and to take effect if he died.

The cheque was presented on the 23rd of February. Mr. Beaumont's account was overdrawn; the manager of the bank did not pay the cheque.

There was a conflict of testimony as to whether the reason was that the manager doubted the signature, or whether it was that the account was overdrawn.

Although, in his lordship's opinion, it was not necessary to decide the question, he found that the manager was minded to lend the money and out of the money so lent to pay the cheque.

On the 25th of February the deceased died, and the cheque had not been paid.

Robertson, for the executrix.

Sargant, for Mrs. Ewbank.—The circumstances are such that it will be inferred that the deceased gave the cheque in contemplation of death and to take complete effect only in case of his death: Gardner v. Parker, 3 Madd. 184. There may be a good donatio mortis causâ of an instrument which does not pass by delivery, and the court will compel the executor to complete the donee's title: Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Bligh N. R. 497. There may be a donatio mortis causâ of a cheque drawn in favour of the donor: Clement v. Cheeseman, 33 W. R. 40, 27 Ch. D. 631. In Hewitt v. Kaye, 16 W. R. 835, L. R. 6 Eq. 198, and In re Beak's Estate, L. R. 13 Eq. 489, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 4, it was held that there could be no gift of the donor's own cheque; in neither case had the cheque been presented before the donor's death; it was accordingly held that there had been no such traditio as to constitute the executor a trustee for the donee of the money represented by the cheque. But presentation of the cheque to the banker, who is the agent of the drawer to pay the money to the drawee, puts the latter in a position to obtain a traditio of the money. The drawing of the cheque coupled with its presentation during the donor's lifetime constitutes a good equitable assignment: Bromley v. Brunton, 16 W. R. 1006, L. R. 6 Eq. 275. In the present case the donor had overdrawn his account; but that is immaterial, for the banker was willing to lend, and credit is as good as cash. The executrix is a trustee for the donee of the difference in the value of the estate due to the cheque not having been cashed. In In re Dillon, 38 W. R. 369, 44 Ch. D. 76, Lindley, L.J., thought that the doctrine that there could be no donatio mortis causâ of the donor's own cheque required consideration.

He also cited Veal v. Veal, 8 W. R. 2, 27 Beav. 303, and In re Mead, 28 W. R. 891, 15 Ch. D. 651.

Jessel, for the residuary legatee.—If anything, this transaction was an imperfect gift inter vivos, which will not be aided by the court. There can never be a donatio mortis causâ of the donor's own cheque, because notice of death revokes the authority of the banker to pay the cheque: Bills of Exchange Act, s. 75. Bromley v. Brunton, so far as it is good law, does not apply; the donor has omitted to put the bank in funds to meet the cheque, and there was no duty on the part of the bank to pay the cheque. So far as Bromley v. Brunton depends on the view that the delivery of the cheque effected an appropriation of the donor's money it is bad law: Hopkinson v. Forster, 23 W. R. 301, L. R. 19 Eq. 74; Bills of Exchange Act, s. 53. There is no real distinction between the cases where a cheque has been presented, but not paid, and where it has not been presented at all.

He also cited Edwards v. Jones, 1 My. & Cr. 226, and Cain v. Moon, [1896] 2 Q. B. 283, 45 W. R. Dig. 49.

Sargant replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question to be determined in this case is whether the deceased made a valid donatio mortis causâ to his sister, Mrs. Eva Ewbank, of a sum of £300. Subject to a more accurate statement of the facts hereafter, it is sufficient for the moment to say that the act which the deceased did was to hand, or cause to be handed, to his sister a cheque for £300, which, before his death, was not paid. A donatio mortis causâ is a singular form of gift; it is, if I may say so, of an amphibious nature—neither a gift inter vivos, nor a testamentary gift. It is something done by which the donee is to have an absolute title if the donor dies, but not otherwise. If he dies the donee's title becomes absolute not under, but against, the executor of the donor. To constitute a valid donatio mortis causâ the gift must be one intended to take complete effect only in the event of the donor's death. You must find as a fact that the donor did not intend the gift to be absolute unless he died. It is not necessary to find that from express words, but that that is the true inference from the facts of the case. To read from the judgment of Sir John Leach in Gardner v. Parker, "It was the intention of the donor that it should be held as a gift only in case of his death. If a gift is made in expectation of death there is an implied condition that it is to be held only in the event of death." That, therefore, is a question of fact to answer as best one can. Is it, under the circumstances of the case, to be inferred that it was not a present and absolute gift? In Duffield v. Elwes Sir John Leach held that a mortgage or bond given as a collateral security could not be made a subject of a donatio mortis causâ. That decision was reversed by Lord Eldon sitting in the House of Lords. Lord Eldon there pointed out that in a case of donatio mortis causâ the question is not similar to that which arises where a court of equity is asked to give complete effect to an incomplete voluntary conveyance, the reason being that it is of the very nature of a donatia mortis causâ, that it is not complete until the donor is dead. The question is not whether the donee has acquired a complete title, but whether he has acquired a right against the legal personal representative of the donor to have his title made complete — that is to say, whether the legal personal representative is a trustee for the donee. Lord Eldon, 1 Bligh N. R., at p. 543, points this out, and concludes: "The opinion which I have formed is that this is a good donatio mortis causâ, raising, by operation of law, a trust." Accordingly, on the principle of Duffield v. Elwes, the following have been held to be good donationes mortis causâ: first, a promissory note payable to the order of the deceased, but not endorsed (Veal v. Veal); secondly, bills of exchange payable to the order of the deceased, which, from the report, I gather, though it is not distinctly so stated, had been endorsed by the donor—but this is unimportant (Rankin v. Weguelin, 27 Beav. 309); thirdly, bills of exchange in favour of the deceased or order and unindorsed (In re Mead); fourthly, a cheque payable to the donor or order and unindorsed (Clement v. Cheeseman); and lastly, a banker's deposit note of the London and Westminster Bank (In re Dillon). In all these cases of mortgage debt, promissory note, bill of exchange, and deposit receipt, the donee had not acquired a complete title, but there had been handed over to him the indicia of property; that is to say, the property had been given to him on terms that it was to be his if the donor died, and against the legal personal representative he could say, "You are a trustee for me; you must lend me your name or indorse the bill of exchange or cheque." But how does the matter stand as regards the deceased's own cheque? It is plain law that a donor's own cheque in favour of another, and handed to that other, does not operate as an equitable assignment in favour of the donee of any part of the donor's balance at his bankers: Hopkinson v. Forster. The cheque is no more than revocable mandate which the donor can revoke, and which, in the event of his death, is ipso facto revoked and becomes inoperative. If, before his death, the cheque is presented and paid, the donee receives the money and there is no question of a donatio mortis causâ of a cheque. The only question is whether the money was received on the terms that the donee should only keep it if the donor died. But if the cheque be not presented or paid before the donor's death, it is no more than an ineffectual revocable order which is revoked by the donor's death. For that proposition I refer to Hewitt v. Kaye and In re Beak's Estate. In the last-mentioned case there was this additional feature—the delivery of a pass-book, which may be said to be the banker's acknowledgment of a debt; but the Vice-Chancellor held that it made no difference, and was no further disposition of the property than was effected by the delivery. In In re Dillon, the case of the deposit note, Lord Lindley said (44 Ch. D., at p. 83): "It is said that here there was no good donatio mortis causâ because a man cannot make such a gift of his own cheque. I will assume that to be correct, though I think it may some day require consideration; but assuming it to be correct, I think it does not dispose of the present case." Now if the doctrine of Hewitt v. Kaye and In re Beak's Estate is to be reconsidered, it must be by a higher court than this. Those authorities are binding on me, and I follow them. But as the parties may wish to carry the case further, I desire to express my own view of the law.

It appears to me that in all these cases of mortgage debt, promissory note, &c., that which was handed over by the deceased to the donee was property or indicia of property belonging to the donor. The donor's cheque is not property at all, but is a mere revocable mandate; it is not the handing of the money. If the donee goes to the banker, and the banker does a further act—either a payment of the cheque or a holding of the amount for the donee, there is a traditio thus constituted—a delivery of the property. If the cheque is acted on, you may reach an equitable assignment pro tanto of the amount standing to the credit of the donor at the bank. But unless you get as far as that, there is no delivery of property at all, but only of an order which, if acted upon, will lead to the passing of the property. The case of Bromley v. Brunton at first puzzled me. There the deceased gave a cheque to the donee, who presented it at the bank. The donor's account was in credit, but the manager doubted the signature and refused payment on that ground. The drawer died and the cheque had not been paid. The Vice-Chancellor held that there was a complete gift inter vivos of the amount of the cheque. That decision must have rested on one of two grounds—either that the cheque was constructively paid when the banker received it, and, in substance, said, "I will pay this, but must see that the signature is correct," so that you get payment referred back to a period before the death of the donor, or that the banker was to be taken to have said, "The account is in credit; I will hold for you the requisite amount to answer the cheque, subject to my being satisfied as to the signature." That may have been, by reason of the act of the banker, a good equitable assignment. The Vice-Chancellor says (L. R. 6 Eq., at p. 277): "The effect of the cheque was to appropriate so much of the donor's money, and my opinion is that the funds, the subject of the gift, are, in the hands of the executors, just as much liable to the payment of the cheque as they were in the hands of the banker." I cannot suppose that the Vice-Chancellor meant by that, that a cheque is an equitable assignment. If you insert certain words, and read the sentence in this way, "The effect of the cheque and of the banker's action in respect of it was to appropriate sufficient of the donor's money to meet the cheque; the bank had in effect honoured the cheque," Bromley v. Brunton is sound law, and does not seem to be in conflict with Hewitt v. Kaye and In re Beak's Estate; and I think all the authorities are rightly to this effect, that a donor's own cheque given, and not acted upon by payment actual or constructive, will not constitute a valid donatio mortis causâ.

With that statement of the law, I will proceed to state shortly what are the facts in this particular case. [His lordship then stated the circumstances and arrived at the several conclusions of fact hereinbefore set out:] The legal result is that, in the first place, there cannot have been, within Bromley v. Brunton, anything which, by coupling the deceased's act and that of the banker, constituted an equitable assignment of moneys in the banker's hands; even if the banker was minded to lend the money, it was a purely voluntary promise; and if, when the cheque came back with the signature confirmed, he had refused to lend it, he would have been within his rights. The donee acquired no rights, but a mere expectation. In the second place, even if the banker remained in the mind to lend, still an agreement to lend is not an enforceable agreement, and the donee acquired no right to the property. I hold that there was no valid donatio mortis causâ for two reasons—first, because the mere drawing by the deceased of a cheque and the handing over of the cheque to the drawee, coupled with the subsequent acts, did not amount to such a delivery or traditio as is required in order to give the donee a right to the cheque, to become absolute in the case of the death of the donor; secondly, because, even if the delivery might have been sufficient if the account had been in credit, it was not so in this case inasmuch as the account was in debit. I can imagine circumstances such as the following: a cheque is given by a person who is seriously ill; the donee goes to the bank—say, a small country branch—just before closing time, and presents the cheque; the cashier, who may be the only person in charge, says that he wants to catch a train, asks the drawee, as a favour to him, to call in the morning, and says that he will then cash the cheque; the drawee assents, and the drawer dies in the night. If that is so, the bank, by undertaking to pay next morning, appropriates a sufficient amount of the deceased's balance to meet the cheque. That might be a good donatio mortis causâ, but here the facts do not come up to anything of that kind. There was not any promise to pay in fact; when the cheque was presented, as the account was in debit, it would have been, not a promise to pay, but to lend. On these grounds I hold that there is no valid donatio mortis causâ.

DAVIES (Appellant) v. BURNETT (Respondent). (a.)

Licensing law—Club—Sale of liquor to agent of member—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3.

A member of a bonâ fide club purchased at the club, by means of an agent, a bottle containing intoxicating liquor to be consumed off the premises. The club had no licence to sell intoxicating liquors.

Held (following Graff v. Evans, 30 W. R. 380, 8 Q. B. D. 373), that there was no sale within the meaning of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Case stated by magistrates under the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94).

This was an appeal by a waiter at the Wolverhampton Working Men's Club, against a fine of ten pounds and costs for selling liquor without a licence.

The facts of the case are as follows:

The North Wolverhampton Working Men's Club, was a club duly registered under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, but had no licence to sell intoxicating liquors, and had its premises at 72, North-road, in that borough. At 8.35 p.m. on the 9th of August, 1901, one Elizabeth Hickman, the wife of George Hickman, asked the appellant for a bottle of stout, and handed him a ticket as follows:

Name of article and quantity must be stated.

"To the steward of the North Wolverhampton Working Men's Club.
August 9th, 1901.
Please supply bearer with 1 stout for Member's signature. } G. Hickman.
Member's No. 355.

The appellant thereupon handed a bottle of stout to Elizabeth Hickman, who paid the sum of twopence for it, and carried it home to her husband. George Hickman was a member of the club, but Elizabeth Hickman was not.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The contention for the appellant before the magistrates was that there was no sale to the member, but merely a transfer of property to one of the members.

For the respondent it was contended that there was a sale to the member and that it opened a door to the evasion of the licensing laws.

The magistrates convicted the appellant, and stated this case.

Hobson, for the appellant.—Here the magistrates have found that the club was a bonâ fide one. They have also found that the wife was acting as the agent of the member. It was laid down in the case of Graff v. Evans, 30 W. R. 380, 8 Q. B. D. 373, that a member of a bonâ fide club could obtain liquor off the premises, and that in that case there was no sale, but only a transfer of the special property; and there is no reason why a member should not be able to employ an agent for that purpose. The case of Woodley v. Simmonds, 60 J. P. 150, was decided on the ground that the club was not a bonâ fide one.

A. Powell, for respondent.—If this appeal succeeds the object of the licensing laws will be defeated. The principle of Graff v. Evans should not be carried further.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It is with the greatest reluctance that I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must succeed. It is, in my judgment, a very dangerous practice allowing clubs to supply liquor off the premises, and I do trust that the magistrates will do all in their power to stop what opens the door to an evasion of the Licensing Act. But here the magistrates have found that this club was a bonâ fide one, and they have also found that the liquor was delivered to the wife of the member as his agent.

It was decided in the case of Graff v. Evans that a sale off the premises of intoxicating liquor to a member was not a sale within the meaning of the Act, but was a transfer of the property. In view of that case, and in view of the findings of the magistrates I do not think that we can do otherwise than allow this appeal.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I also agree that it is a most inexpedient practice. In this case the messenger was the wife of the member, but there is no reason why he should not have sent a child, and he might thus evade the provisions of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree, and I only wish to add this, that if a club were to make a practice of delivering liquor off the premises, it would go far to convince me that it was not a bonâ fide club.

COX (Appellant) v. BLAINES (Respondent). (a.)

Bread—Sale of bread—Sale otherwise than by weight—London Bread Act (3 Geo. 4, c. cvi.), s. 4.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the sale of bread it is necessary that the weight of every parcel of bread should at least be purported to be ascertained in order to comply with section 4 of the London Bread Act (3 Geo. 4, c. cvi.).

Case stated by Frederick Mead, one of the London police magistrates.

The facts of the case are as follows:

The respondent was charged on the 12th of July, 1901, with having unlawfully sold, or caused to be sold, bread in other manner than by weight, contrary to section 4 of 3 Geo. 4, c. cvi.

The material words of that section are: "Be it further enacted that from and after the commencement of this Act all bread sold within the limits aforesaid (i.e., the City of London and ten miles of the Royal Exchange) shall be sold by the several bakers or sellers of bread respectively within the said limits by weight, and in any case any baker or seller of bread within the limits aforesaid shall sell or cause to be sold bread in any other manner than by weight then and in such case every such baker or seller of bread shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding forty shillings, which the magistrate or magistrates before whom such offender shall be convicted shall order and direct."

It was proved at the hearing on the 18th of July at the police-court that one Charles James Murrell, by the direction of the appellant (who is the inspector of weights and measures for the district), went into the shop of the respondent (who carries on business at 64, Hackney-road as a baker) and asked for a half-quartern loaf, for which he paid the sum of 2d. He was supplied with a loaf and two rolls by one Alice Cullam, who placed them in the scales, first the loaf and then the two rolls on the top of it. The said loaf and rolls did not carry the scale down, though they would have done so if they had weighed more than the two-pound weight which was already in the scale. The beam of the weighing machine did not move at all, and the weight of the rolls was not nor had been separately ascertained at the time of such sale to Murrell, except that it was clearly apparent that their aggregate weight, together with the loaf, was less than two pounds. The bread was then taken away from the shop and weighed by the appellant, who ascertained their aggregate weight to be five ounces short of two pounds.

The magistrate dismissed the summons on the ground that the bread was not sold otherwise than by weight; that it was not necessary for the beam to be disturbed in order that there should be a sale by weight; and that it was difficult in a transaction of this sort to ascertain whether bread is above or below a certain weight without determining the exact number of ounces or grains.

F. F. Daldy, for the appellant.—The cases clearly show that the magistrate took a wrong view of the section. The actual weight must be ascertained.

He cited Jones v. Huxtable, 15 W. R. 900, L. R. 2 Q. B. 460; Williams v. Deggan, 16 L. T. Rep. 492, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 37; Mitton v. Troke, 20 L. T. Rep. 563, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig.; London County Council v. Read, 48 W. R. 393, [1900] 1 Q. B. 288.

The respondent was not represented.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It seems to me that Mr. Daldy is right and there was evidence that there was no sale by weight within the construction that has been put upon the statute by the various cases. I think that the statute was open to the construction, and fairly brought up the distinction between selling or carrying on the trade of selling by weight, and carrying on the trade of selling by any other means. I think the distinctions do amount to this; that the particular quantity of bread sold for any particular price must be weighed—that is to say, either weighed beforehand by the baker, or if necessary weighed in the presence of the customer on demand. In this case all that appears to have been done was that the bread which could not weigh two pounds was put into the scale, and had no effect upon the scale, and did not move the beam, and therefore the weight was never ascertained at all. I think under those circumstances that there was no evidence upon which the magistrate could have come to the conclusion that there was a sale by weight of this bread, or that its weight was properly ascertained at all. It was a case in which a person asked for a two-pound loaf and something else was delivered, when what ought to have been delivered was bread which had been weighed, or the weight of which had been ascertained.

I was at first impressed with the idea that the view that the real offence was selling as or representing the weight of the loaf to be two pounds when it was not two pounds was an answer, and showed this ought to a sale by weight. But I think that I was wrong, and that this statute, interpreted by the subsequent decisions, means that the weight of the parcel is to be ascertained. That being so, in this case I am of opinion that there is no evidence that the weight of the parcel of bread was ascertained at all. The case must therefore go back to the magistrate.

Darling, J.—I am of the same opinion, and if I add a word to the judgment of my lord it is only because I think it necessary to guard against this: that I do not think our judgment means that in order that there should be a sale by weight it is absolutely necessary that should be an ascertainment of the true weight, because if we held that, then someone who might be prosecuted for not having sold by weight might escape the penalty for the offence by saying, "Oh, yes, I weighed it, but I weighed it with false scales or false weights." It seems to me it is necessary, in order to decide this point, to decide what to "weigh" means. I think that to "weigh" means to affect to ascertain by means of balancing—using what may properly be called a balance—although the instrument may be fraudulently used. Still, one might weigh a thing and sell it, and yet not sell it by its weight. There would be a weighing and a selling otherwise than by weight.

Channell, J.—I agree. It seems to me perfectly possible to put two different meanings on the words in the statute. It might be said that selling by weight meant merely selling by weight as distinguished from selling by measure, or selling by a particular measure for a particular loaf; that is to say, that it went to the mode in which the person was carrying on his business. If a baker were to say, "I am allowed to sell this or that loaf, and to say the price is 2d. or 3d., and you can look at them and take whatever you like according to the price;" it might be held it was merely intended to prevent that; and if the man professed to sell his bread according to weight it must be so sold and not according to some other mode of pricing it, and that it did not really involve the consideration whether the weight which was purported to be sold was a true or a false weight. Of course if he purported to sell as a 4lb. loaf a loaf which did not weigh four pounds, he might be proceeded against on a penalty under some other section of the Act.

I was under the impression it might have been possible to take that view; but the cases which have been quoted, show the contrary. The case of Jones v. Huxtable clearly involves the contrary. It shows that what is meant by this statute, as interpreted, is that each particular loaf must be sold according to the weight of that particular loaf. It was held that it was a contravention of that enactment to do what was done in this case, even if it was a fraud, or an accident, or carelessness, on the part of the person selling; because here he did not sell this loaf according to the true weight, but sold it as a two-pound loaf when in fact it weighed something less. I think that the magistrate took the first of the two views I have endeavoured to express, but having regard to the authorities which have been cited to us I have no doubt that his decision is wrong.

Adulteration—Food—Giving of false warranty—Limit of time for laying information—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 20—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), ss. 19, 20, sub-section 6—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11.

An information under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts in respect of a false warranty must be laid within six months of the date on which the warranty was given.

Case stated by magistrates.

This was an appeal from a decision of the magistrates of Haslingden dismissing an information on the ground that it was not brought within the time specified in the Summary Jurisdiction Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11.

The facts of the case as proved or admitted are as follows: The respondents, who are wholesale grocers, sold to one John Milne, a retail grocer, on the 20th of November, 1900, three pounds of white pepper, with a written warranty of its genuineness, and John Milne on the 16th of May, 1901, sold to a subordinate officer of the appellant six ounces of this pepper; and the latter divided it into three parts, and in all other respects complied with section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

On being analyzed the pepper was found to be adulterated to the extent of 10 per cent. with bleached husks.

An information was then laid against John Milne for selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article of food—to wit, pepper—not of the nature, substance, or quality demanded by the purchaser.

This summons was dismissed under the provisions of section 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, on Milne producing the warranty and proving that he had sold the article in the same state as when he received it.

A summons was then taken out on the 6th of July, 1901, against the respondents, who contended that the warranty was given on the 20th of November, 1900, and that the offence, if any, having been committed on the 20th of November, 1900, the information was not laid within six months as specified in section 11 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43.

The appellant contended that the offence was a continuing one; that the warranty ran on till the whole of the pepper had been disposed of; and that as the information had been laid on the 6th of July, 1901, it was within six months of the sale by John Milne to the appellant's subordinate officer, when the warranty came into force and protected Milne from a conviction.

The magistrates dismissed the information but stated a case.

F. H. Mellor (Openshaw with him), for the appellant.—The magistrates have here misconstrued the section. The offence is not committed till a sale is completed by the purchaser.

He cited Cook v. White, 44 W. R. 409, [1896] 1 Q. B. 284.

F. Mellor, for the respondents.—Every proceeding under this Act is subject to the time limit, and the time runs from the date of the giving of the warranty.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I cannot help feeling some regret that this appeal must fail, but it seems to me that this matter must, if necessary, be set right by the Legislature. By section 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, it was provided that "Every penalty imposed by this Act shall be recovered in England in the manner prescribed by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43." Then section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, provides that the prosecution should, in the case of a perishable article, be brought within twenty-eight days of the time of purchase for test purposes. That section was repealed by section 27 of the Act of 1899, but was re-enacted and extended by section 19 of that Act to non-perishable articles bought for test purposes. Therefore, in so far as the actual proceedings had to be taken in respect of the sale, there were limits of time less than the six months. Now, in order to enable the proceedings to be taken against the persons who have given the warranty, you must find something in the Act of 1899 which excludes the operation of section 20 of the Act of 1875 from this particular offence. When the Act of 1899, s. 19, is looked at, the words of that section seem to correspond with the class of offence to which it was intended that the limits laid down by the Act of 1875 should apply. If it was intended to exclude the general limits of time prescribed, special words would be required, or a direction that for the purpose of a summons under this section the date of the purchase by the customer shall be taken to be the date when the false warranty was given. If proceedings were to be taken more than six months after the written warranty is given, a special amending Act of Parliament would be necessary.

GEE v. OLDHAM JUSTICES. (a.)

Licensing law—Transfer—Off-licence — Condition of original grant that if licensee retired, licence should not be renewed—Application for transfer—Jurisdiction of magistrates to entertain application—Beerhouse Act, 1830 (11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 64).

An off-licence was granted to the occupier of a grocer's shop upon the condition that the licence should be given up upon the applicant leaving or ceasing to carry on the grocery business upon the premises. The licensee sold his business, and the purchaser applied to the licensing justices for a transfer of the licence to him.

The justices refused to grant the transfer, on the ground that they were debarred from so doing by the condition upon which the licence was granted.

Held, that the condition was not an absolute bar to the transfer of the licence, but only a matter to be taken into consideration when considering whether or no in their discretion they would grant the transfer.

Special case stated by the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions for the Hundred of Salford.

The material facts may be shortly stated thus:

On the 23rd of August, 1894, Samuel Turner applied at the General Annual Licensing Sessions for the Borough of Oldham for a certificate or licence to sell by retail, at a house situate at 52, Abbey-hills-road, in the borough of Oldham, beer, to be consumed off the premises in pursuance of the Act 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 64, and the statutes amending the same. The licence was granted to the applicant on the conditions—(1) That the premises should be closed during the whole of Sunday; and (2) that the licence should be given up upon the applicant leaving or ceasing to carry on the grocery business at the premises in question. This last condition was suggested by the justices and assented to by the applicant.

The applicant's lease expired on the 23rd of July, 1899, and upon its expiration he became a tenant from year to year and still continued to carry on the grocery business.

The licence granted to him was renewed from year to year upon the same conditions, and remained in force until the 24th of December, 1900. On that day Gee applied to the licensing justices of Oldham (the present appellants) for a transfer of the licence to him from Samuel Turner, who was about to give up possession of the premises and to cease to carry on the business of a grocer, which business Gee was willing to continue to carry on.

The appellants refused to grant the transfer, on the ground that it was contrary to the second of the conditions upon which the licence was granted.

Against this decision Gee appealed to the court of quarter sessions, which decided that the justices had no power lawfully to refuse the transfer on the ground that it was in contravention of the condition referred to.

From this decision the licensing justices of Oldham appealed.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the court of quarter sessions was right in so holding.

R. B. D. Acland, for the appellants.

F. H. Mellor, for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case it seems that an objection was taken before the licensing justices that they had no power to grant the transfer because of the pre-existing condition upon which this licence had been granted. The justices adopted that contention and held that they were debarred from dealing with the matter. In my opinion they were wrong. The condition, although a circumstance that could be taken into consideration by the justices, did not prevent them from entertaining the matter of the transfer. If I am right in this view, then the quarter sessions have set the matter right by holding as they did that the condition was not a bar to the licensing justices hearing the case, and in their discretion granting or refusing the licence, but was only a circumstance which, like any other circumstance, they ought to take into consideration.

Upon the respondents being summoned to show cause why they had not paid, and refused to pay, the rates, the respondents objected that at the time the rates were made the land was vacant land not built upon. The justices dismissed the summons.

Held, that the justices were right, the question of non-liability having been properly raised before them, the point raised involving a question of jurisdiction to rate, and not merely a matter of appeal.

Appeal from a decision of two justices sitting at the Guildhall, London, on a case stated from which it appeared that complaint was made on behalf of the appellants that the respondents being duly rated and assessed in poor rate amounting to £45 had refused to pay.

The justices dismissed the summons and declined to grant a distress warrant.

The following facts appeared from the case:

The respondents were incorporated under the Great Northern and City Railway Act, 1892.

Under that Act and the Acts incorporated therewith the company were authorized to acquire lands for the purposes of the works thereby authorized.

By section 69 of the Great Northern and City Railway Act, 1892, it was enacted as follows: "The company shall in respect of all lands and buildings acquired by them under the powers of this Act be liable to and pay all the consolidated sewer and other rates and contributions leviable in respect of such lands and buildings as if the company were assessed in respect of such land and buildings in the valuation list in force for the parish or place within which such lands and buildings are situate at the time the company acquire such lands and buildings, whether such lands and buildings be occupied or vacant, and shall continue liable to and pay all such consolidated sewer and other rates and contributions until the undertaking shall be completed, and assessed or liable to be assessed to the before-mentioned rates and contributions, or until such of the said lands and buildings as may not be required for the purposes of the undertaking shall have been otherwise duly assessed or liable to be assessed and become liable to the before-mentioned rates and contributions."

The respondents on the 1st of January, 1900, acquired certain land in the parish of St. Stephen, upon which premises consisting of a shop, offices, and warehouse, formerly known as 30, Finsbury-pavement, had previously existed, but did not take actual physical occupation until October, 1900. The shop, offices, and warehouse were pulled down about May, 1899, at which time the railway company had no interest therein.

At the time the respondents acquired the land in January, 1900, no business of any kind was carried on upon it. It was a piece of vacant land.

In the valuation list in force in January, 1900, being the quinquennial valuation list made in 1895, the premises were assessed at £292 rateable value.

In 1899 a supplemental valuation list was made for the parish pursuant to the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, by which this property was proposed to be taken out of rating, as it was then vacant land. The list was duly confirmed pursuant to the said Act on the 24th of November, 1899, but did not come into operation until the 6th of April, 1900.

Before that date—viz., on the 4th of April, 1900, a provisional list continuing the property in the valuation list was made for the parish, which was confirmed by the Assessment Committee of the City of London Union, in which the parish is situate, on the 31st of October, 1900. In this provisional list premises therein described as No. 30, Finsbury-pavement were inserted at the rateable value at which the premises formerly known as No. 30, Finsbury-pavement were assessed and rated before the shop, offices, and warehouse were demolished—viz., £292.

A poor rate was duly made and published on the 8th of May, 1900, and another on the 5th of November, 1900. The rate-books were produced, in which the respondents were rated in respect of premises described as "shop, offices, and warehouse," upon the rateable value at which the premises described as No. 30, Finsbury-pavement were assessed in the said provisional list—viz., £292.

Payment of the sums claimed under the said rates was duly demanded, but the amount was not paid.

At the dates of the said rates respectively, the undertaking of the respondents had not been completed and assessed or become liable to be assessed to consolidated sewer and other rates, nor had such of the lands and buildings acquired by the respondents as were not required for the purposes of the undertaking been otherwise assessed or become liable to be assessed or become liable to the said rates and contributions.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended before the justices:

(a) That their liability (if any) in respect of the said property was enforceable only by action to recover the amounts charged by the said rates, and was not enforceable before justices. The cases of The Fourth City Mutual Building Society v. The Churchwardens and Overseers of East Ham, [1892] 1 Q. B. 661, and Farmer v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 36 W. R. 590, 20 Q. B. D. 788, and section 69 of the Great Northern and City Railway Act, 1892, were referred to.

(b) That at the time the rates in question were made the land was vacant land, and the respondents were not liable to be assessed in respect of it.

(c) That the respondents were only liable to be rated (if at all) in respect of the land as if they were assessed in respect of it in the valuation list in force for the parish at the time they acquired the land.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended before the justices that under section 69 of the respondents' Act, the respondents were liable to pay the rates whether the lands and buildings were occupied or not, and that, as the respondents had not appealed, the justices were bound to enforce the payment.

The justices overruled the contention of the respondents that the amount could only be recovered by action, but they held that they had jurisdiction to go behind the rate-book and inquire into the validity of the rate, and they declined to issue a distress warrant on the ground that at the time when the rate was made there were no such premises in existence as were described in the rate-book, and had not been when the respondents acquired their interest, the property being then only vacant land.

Walter Ryde, for the appellants.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the respondents.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We have here to construe a most obscurely worded section, but it seems clear that it was enacted in respect of other rates than the poor rate, which is dealt with by the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, which is incorporated into the respondents' private Act. The intention of the Legislature was to make the railway company pay what the previous owners of the property taken by the railway company for the purposes of their undertaking would have paid, in order that there should be no deficiency in the rates. The appellants said that because in the valuation list of 1895 this property stood at £292, the company must be taken to be liable for that sum, as they had taken over the land. But the section does not say so, and their argument overlooks the fact that before the company acquired the land the buildings had ceased to exist. It is not contended that the former owners of the buildings would have been liable after the buildings had been pulled down and the land had become vacant, and to make the company liable some words to that effect must be put in the section which are not there.

It was argued that the question of the respondents' liability ought not to have been raised by way of answer to an application for a distress warrant, and that it was only ground for an appeal to quarter sessions. If an objection raised in answer to an application for a distress warrant means that the justices have no jurisdiction to make the objector liable in respect of the rate in question, that is an objection which the magistrate might entertain, but if it rested on another ground, such as might be the subject of an appeal, the magistrate could not entertain it. In my judgment the objection is one that goes to the jurisdiction to rate the company in respect of shops and offices which in fact did not exist when the rate was made.

As to the contention of the respondents that if they could be rated or assessed they could only be proceeded against for non-payment by action, without expressing any final opinion, it seems to me that the decision of the magistrate on this point was right in view of the words of the section. It seems clear that the section has not made the respondents liable on the hypothetical theory that they were still occupying houses and shops that had been pulled down prior to the date they went into occupation of the land.

DARLING, J.—I agree. It is clear that the people from whom the company bought might have escaped payment of this rate. If the company are liable, then there must be something in their Act which makes them liable when other owners of the property would not have been. It seems to me clear that the company are not liable under the section, because they never acquired the buildings at all.

Factory — Non-textile — Bottling and aerating beer — Mechanical power used in aid of the manufacturing process—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), s. 93.

On premises used for the purpose of aerating and bottling beer the aerating process was produced by mechanical power, but the bottling process was not worked by mechanical power;

Held, that such premises were a non-textile factory within section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878.

Law v. Graham, 49 W. R. 622, [1901] 2 K. B. 327, distinguished.

Case stated by Mr. Haden Corser, a metropolitan police magistrate.

The respondents were charged that they on the 7th of June, 1901, then being the occupiers of certain premises, the same being a non-textile factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895, at Wilkes-street, Spitalfields, did unlawfully employ a young person of the age of fifteen, one Samuel Williams, from 7 a.m. to 9.30 p.m.

The following facts were proved or admitted: The appellant is one of his Majesty's Inspectors of Factories and Workshops. The respondents were on the 7th of June, 1901, the occupiers of certain premises situate in Wilkes-street, including a building used as bottling stores.

On the 7th of June, 1901, Samuel Williams, a young person within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895, was employed in the bottling stores from 7 a.m. to 9.30 p.m. —i.e., beyond the period of employment permitted by section 13 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, or section 36 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. If the bottling stores were a textile factory within section 93 of the Act of 1878, then the respondents on the 7th of June, 1901, infringed the provisions of section 13 of that Act. The respondents contended that the bottling stores were not a non-textile factory, on the ground that mechanical power was not used in aid of any manufacturing process carried on there. The bottling stores were used by the respondents for the purpose of aerating and bottling beer, and the gas engines situate in the bottling stores were used by them in the manner hereinafter mentioned. The beer was so aerated and bottled for the purpose of adapting it for sale as bottled beer. It was brought in barrels into the bottling stores. It was then forced out of the barrels into a cooling tank by means of an air-pump driven by mechanical power—viz., a gas engine. Thence it was forced by an air-pump driven by mechanical power into a mixing cylinder situate in a room adjoining and communicating with that in which Williams was employed. The mixing cylinder contained a mechanical mixer driven by mechanical power—viz., a gas engine. Attached to and communicating with the mixing cylinder were high-pressure cylinders containing carbonic acid gas which were brought already charged with such gas into the bottling stores. By the action of the mixer the beer and carbonic acid gas were mixed and the beer was aerated. It was William's duty, which he was performing during his employment on the 7th of June, 1901, to place an empty bottle in the bottling machine and to pull down by hand into the neck of the bottle by means of a lever the nozzle of a tap communicating by a pipe with the mixing cylinder. The beer flowed through the pipe from the tap, owing to the pressure of the gas with which it had been aerated, and filled the bottle. The bottling machine was not worked by mechanical power. The bottles before being filled were drained and soaked by hand and afterwards rinsed out by a brush driven by a gas engine on another floor of the premises.

The magistrate dismissed the information, on the ground that the premises were not a non-textile factory within section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, as the work done by Williams was manual work only, and it was immaterial how the beer was conveyed to the bottling machine.

The inspector appealed.

The question was whether the magistrate ought to have convicted the respondents.

H. Sutton and G. S. Robertson, for the appellant.—The magistrate dismissed the information, thinking erroneously that the case of Law v. Graham, 49 W. R. 622, [1901] 2 K. B. 327, was an authority for his holding that the respondents' premises were a textile factory. But Law v. Graham is distinguishable. The lad here was engaged in filling the bottles after the beer had been changed by the process of aeration into a different article from that which it was commercially when it was brought upon the premises. This beer was therefore manufactured on the premises, and there being manual labour and at the same time mechanical power used for that purpose, the terms of the section are fulfilled.

Travers Humphreys, for the respondents.—Here there is no manufacturing process carried on. The beer was manufactured before it came on the premises at all. It was merely bottled off. In Law v. Graham it was held that the mere fact that the bottles were cleaned by machinery upon the premises did not make those premises a non-textile factory within the meaning of that term in section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. Even if the bottled beer could be said to have been manufactured on the premises, mechanical power was not used in the process, for the machine used to clean the bottles had nothing to do with the bottling process. The magistrate found that fact in favour of the respondents, for he found that the bottling machine was worked by manual labour.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It seems to me that when the words of the section are looked at, it is clear that the magistrate in this case arrived at a wrong decision, and therefore this appeal must be allowed and the case remitted with an intimation that he ought to have convicted. [His lordship read section 93 of the Act of 1878, and proceeded:] Now, that section shows that a non-textile factory means any premises wherein any manual labour is exercised by way of trade or for the purpose of gain or for or incidental to the adapting for sale of any article, and wherein or within the precincts of which steam, water, or other mechanical power was used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on. Now, what are the facts here? It is found in the case that upon their premises and in the curtilage, within the words of the section I have just read, carbonic acid gas and beer were mixed together by mechanical means and were then together put into bottles—in short, that these bottling stores were used by the respondents for the purpose of aerating beer and bottling beer, and a gas engine was used for that purpose. The magistrate held, on the authority of Law v. Graham, that this was not a manufacturing process, and that if it was, the mechanical power was not used in aid of it; he seemed to think that inasmuch as the work done by the lad employed in bottling was manual, it was immaterial to consider how the beer was conveyed to the bottling machine, and that the other processes used at the stores did not bring the place within the Act. In Law v. Graham the court held that the magistrate was right in hold that washing the bottles was not adapting the beer for sale, but that is clearly no authority in the present case. In my judgment, there being manual labour, and at the same time mechanical labour used for the purpose, the requirements of the section are fulfilled. This appeal therefore succeeds.

DARLING and CHANNEL, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action tried before Darling, J., and a special jury.

The action, which was brought by the plaintiff Davis against the defendant, Ada Jane Stoddart, the proprietor of a newspaper called Sporting Luck, in the Mayor's Court and removed to the High Court, was to recover the sum of £127 10s. 8d., sent by the plaintiff to the defendant at various dates in respect of certain coupon contests on horse-races and other events, as money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff.

By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that when the sums sent by him were received by the defendant she was the occupier of an office at 10, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street, in the City of London, which premises she used for the purpose of money being received by or on her behalf as consideration for her promise to pay thereafter money on a contingency relating to a horse-race or the game of football.

Each number of the newspaper contained a notice of a coupon contest the nature of which was that the defendant undertook to pay a certain specified sum of money to any person who should correctly guess the result of certain horse-races or football matches then shortly about to be run or played, and should write the guesses upon coupons and should return them so filled up to the defendant's office with a certain sum of money. Each number of the newspaper contained a sheet of coupons in which any person taking part in the contests filled in his guesses of the results of the races and matches which were the subject of the competition. No. 1 coupon in each sheet was allowed to be used free of charge, but the sum of one penny was charged for each of the extra coupons.

The plaintiff alleged in his claim that he took part in the coupon contests on various dates, and altogether sent to the defendant by cheques which were received and endorsed by the defendant or her agent, and paid into her banking account, the sum of £127 10s. 8d.

The plaintiff contended in his statement of claim that the money so received by the defendant must be deemed to have been received by her to or for his use, and that such money was accordingly recoverable under section 5 of the Gaming Act, 1892.

The defendant by her statement of defence denied the various allegations in the statement of claim, and alternatively pleaded that the plaintiff's claim was in respect of a contract by way of gaming and wagering, and was void under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 and the Gaming Act, 1892.

At the trial of the action the learned judge put the following questions to the jury:

1. Was the defendant, between October, 1899, and November, 1900, an occupier of the premises?

2. Did the defendant, between October, 1899, and November, 1900, use the premises for the purpose of money being received by or on her behalf upon the coupon conditions set out in Sporting Luck?

3. Did the defendant receive money upon the terms set out in the statement of claim?

The jury answered each of the above questions in the affirmative.

Upon those findings judgment was reserved in order that it might be argued for which party judgment was to be entered.

Avory, K.C. (R. Nevill with him), for the plaintiff, now asked for judgment.

M. Shearman and G. H. Stutfield for the defendant.—Section 5 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, is impliedly repealed by the Gaming Act of 1892. Section 5 of the Act of 1853 provides that "Any money or valuable thing received by any such person as aforesaid," which either means any such person referred to in section 4, or else those referred to in the earlier sections—"as a deposit on any bet or as or for the consideration for any such assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement as aforesaid, shall be deemed to have been received to or for the use of the person from whom the same was received, and such money or valuable thing or the value thereof may be recovered accordingly with full costs of suit in any court of competent jurisdiction." That section refers back to section 4, which says: "Any person being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or place opened or kept or used for the purposes aforesaid," that is, for the purpose of betting, "or either of them, or any person acting for, or on behalf of, any such owner or occupier, or any person having the care or management, or in any manner assisting in conducting the business thereof, who shall receive directly or indirectly any money or valuable thing as a deposit on any bet, on condition of paying any sum of money or other valuable thing on the happening of any event or contingency of or relating to a horse-race or any other race," shall be liable to a penalty. The decision in Reg. v. Stoddart, 49 W. R. 173, [1901] 1 Q. B. 177, is to the effect that unless this transaction is protected or covered by an exemption it is a contract by way of gaming or wagering. Then, by the Gaming Act of 1892, which is an Act to amend 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, it is enacted by section 1 that "any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connection therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money." This contract is rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. It is betting pure and simple, and therefore comes within 8 & 9 Vict. Between 1845 and 1853 this money could not have been recovered, because the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 could have been successfully pleaded in answer to an action of this nature. The Act of 1853 created an exception, and said that in a certain class of gaming and wagering contracts an action shall be permitted to be brought to recover the money deposited. Then comes the Act of 1892, which sweeps in all contracts rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. The Act of 1892 provided no exemption or exception reserving the rights under the Act of 1853, and consequently the provisions of section 5 of that Act are repealed. The Act of 1892 is an extremely stringent Act, and was passed in order to get rid of the decision in Read v. Anderson, 32 W. R. 950, 13 Q. B. D. 779. The Act of 1892 goes a good deal further than merely doing away with the decision in Read v. Anderson. [He then referred to Tatam v. Reeve, 41 W. R. 174, [1893] 1 Q. B. 44, and Carney v. Plimmer, 45 W. R. 385, [1897] 1 Q. B. 634.] As a further point, these coupons are betting transactions and nothing else. Every sum of money which is sent by the competitors in respect of these competitions is a deposit on individual wagers. Each bet or guess is separate, and each single penny is a separate deposit. A transaction of this sort is ready-money betting, and it comes within the first part of the section and not within the second part. Therefore, when there is no evidence of resorting, no evidence of these transactions having taken place with resorters, where, on the contrary, the whole of the business is done by correspondence, as in this case, the case does not come within the Act. Reg. v. Brown, 43 W. R. 222, [1895] 1 Q. B. 119, supports this contention.

In sections 4 and 5 the distinction is drawn between a deposit on a bet and money received as consideration for this promise, undertaking and assurance to pay; therefore when the second part of section 1 speaks of money received as consideration for a promise to pay, mere ready-money betting is not referred to. The two things are entirely different, and the two sections draw a clear distinction between ready-money betting and receipt of money as consideration to pay thereafter. The Legislature would not have referred to the two things if they both meant the same. Therefore this transaction does not come within the Act and section 5 cannot apply.

H. Avory, K.C.—The answer to the objection taken on behalf of the defendant is to be found in the words of section 5 of the Act of 1853, which says that money paid as in this case shall be deemed to have been received to or for the use of the person from whom it was received, and the Act of 1892 has no application to this case. Neither would section 18 of the Act of 1845 have had any application, for that provides that no suit shall be brought to recover money won on a wager. The Act of 1892 only carries the Act of 1845 a little further by providing that the ordinary case of the commission agent shall be on the same footing as the case of a principal was under the Act of 1845, and this is made clear by the decision in O'Sullivan v. Thomas, 43 W. R. 269, [1895] 1 Q. B. 698: see judgment of Wright, J. That case is precisely this case. Section 5 of the Act of 1853 put this money exactly in the position of a revocable deposit. The contention on behalf of the defendant if upheld, would defeat the very object of the Act of 1853, which was to place money paid under the circumstances such as exist in this case in the position of money paid on a revocable deposit. There is no implied repeal of that Act by the Act of 1892. Judgment should therefore be entered for the plaintiff.

DARLING, J.—In this case the finding of the jury amounted to a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed unless Mr. Shearman and Mr. Stutfield are right in one or other of the points of law which they have raised. The matter arises in this way. The contract to pay the money which had been paid would not have arisen, and there would have been no contract to pay the money which is sued for in this case unless section 5 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, had been passed. The money having been paid could not have been recovered. But that section enacted that the money might be recovered back upon a contract—I will not say on an implied contract, but on a statutory contract—because it enacts that the money so paid "as aforesaid shall be deemed to have been received to or for the use of the person from whom the same was received, and such money or valuable thing, or the value thereof, may be recovered accordingly with full costs of suit in any court of competent jurisdiction." Therefore that is not a contract which is made in the ordinary sense between the parties to the bet at all. The contract made between the parties to the bet of their own volition is a void contract and could not be sued upon, but in order to make it more unlikely that people would make that kind of contract and even, by what they assume to be the bonds of honour, abide by it, the Legislature passed this section which, in my opinion, created what I have called a statutory contract—not an actual contract made by the parties, not a contract implied by law, but a contract arising out of the very words of the statute—that the money shall be deemed to have been received to the use of the party who paid it, and may be recovered by him. Now, that being so, the matter would have been perfectly clear, and the plaintiff would have obviously been entitled to judgment if it had not been for the Act of 1892. That Act says this: "Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null or void by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto, or in connection therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money." I do not myself think that this transaction is a promise, express or implied, which is rendered void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109; and if it is not so, then that section which says that no action shall be maintained upon it does not apply at all. For the reasons which Mr. Avory has given I do not think that this contract comes within the words of the section.

But further than that, I think I am bound to look at the course of legislation. There is no doubt about it that the Act of 1892 was passed primarily to repeal the effect of the decision in Read v. Anderson. It was not passed to make betting easier, or to make it more certain that people who made bets and carried on a betting business might do so with profit. It was passed with quite other reasons. But further than that, there are these words in the case of O'Sullivan v. Thomas which Mr. Avory has cited. Wills, J., says: "I am not sorry to be able to come to the conclusion at which we have arrived; an opposite construction would make the Act of Parliament"—that is the Act of 1892—"which certainly was not passed out of sympathy with the betting fraternity, their charter." And so here. If I were to hold that the effect of the Act of 1892 had been to repeal section 5 of the Act of 1853, it would, as far as it went, be to say that the Act of 1892 legalized, for the benefit of people carrying on a betting business, the retention in their hands of money which they had received on gambling contracts, and thereby would put a profit in their pockets, when it is notorious that the whole feeling and intention of the Legislature at that time was to do the precise contrary. I think therefore that the case of O'Sullivan v. Thomas, particularly the judgment of my brother Wright is in point, and that I should be bound to hold as I do in this matter, having regard to the decision in that case.

In my opinion, therefore, section 1 of the Act of 1892 has not repealed section 5 of the Act of 1853, and, therefore, as far as that goes, my judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

Now there is the other point which is raised by Mr. Stutfield. That point is that all this, is really a system of ready-money betting, that there must be some resorting, and that there was no resorting here, because all this took place by means of correspondence. If that were a good point, then Mrs. Stoddart was wrongly convicted in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart, and the decisions in several of these cases which have been decided by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved and by the Divisional Court are wrong. It may be that they are. This point might have been taken in those cases, but it never has been taken. In my judgment, even if it had been taken, it would not have been a good point. It seems to me that upon the words of section 1 of the Act of 1853 there is ample reason for saying that the decisions in Hawke v. Stoddart, ante, p. 93, and Reg. v. Stoddart are right. I am inclined to think that, even if counsel had been allowed to take this point when Hawke v. Stoddart was argued, it would not have availed them, and the decision would have been precisely the same. However that may be, I am bound, of course, by those decided cases, and on that ground I give judgment against the defendant in this case.

HILL v. HILL. (a.)

Justices—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39)—Liability of husband to maintain step-children.

The court of summary jurisdiction has power when making an order for maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1895, to take into consideration the fact that the applicant has children dependent upon her by a former marriage, since the husband is liable under the Poor Law Acts to maintain them.

This was an appeal from an order of the justices of Southampton, made on the 19th of April, 1901, and confirmed on the 31st of January, 1902, directing Frederick Penton Hill, the appellant, to pay his wife, Matilda Alice Hill, the sum of 30s. a week, 17s. being for the maintenance of the wife, and 13s. for the maintenance of her children by a former husband. The order was made under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895. The grounds of the appeal were (1) that the husband ought not to have been ordered to maintain his step-children, and (2) that the order for 30s. a week was excessive, inasmuch as 30s. a week was over one-third of his weekly earnings.

Pritchard, for the appellant.—The order for maintenance is an order made to secure the support of the wife and not for the children. A husband is not liable for the support of his children, therefore a fortiori he is not liable for his step-children. His liability at common law is to be differentiated from his liability under the Poor Law Acts, for under the Poor Law he becomes liable to maintain them when, but not till, they become chargeable to the parish. If, therefore, an order to maintain makes provision for the children plus the wife, and, notwithstanding payment by the husband to the wife, the children should then become liable to the parish, the husband would be in danger of being ordered to pay twice over for his children. [BARNES, J.—His defence would then be that he had paid for their support, and that the order requiring him to pay so much to the wife should be reduced.] It is unreasonable to place him in that position at all: Mortimore v. Wright, 6 M. & W. 482; Tubb v. Harrison, 4 T. R. 118; Cooper v. Martyn, 4 East. 76; 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 56, and 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 6, were cited. The amount awarded was excessive. The cases of Cobb v. Cobb, [1900] P. 294, W. R. Dig. 106; and Nott v. Nott, [1901] P. 241, 49 W. R. Dig. 52, show that the principles which govern this court, and which ought to govern the justices in making an order, had not been conformed to.

Barnard, for the respondent.—The justices were right in including the step-children in the husband's liability to maintain them. So long as their mother lives the husband of that mother is liable to maintain them. She has an implied authority to pledge her husband's credit to supply necessaries for such children. There is authority to show that the husband is impliedly liable at common law as well as under the Poor Law Acts: Bazeley v. Forder, L. R. 3 Q. B. 559, 16 W. R. C. L. Dig. 54. [He cited also 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 56; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 37; 58 & 59 Vict. c. 59, s. 5, sub-section (c).] As to the contention that the amount allotted is excessive and that the allotment has not been made in accordance with the principles governing this court, there is no case to show that this court must never allot more than one-third of the joint income. The court had in certain cases granted more.

JEUNE, P., in delivering judgment, said that he did not think it now necessary to decide what was the exact liability of a husband at common law for the children of his wife by a former marriage, as it was clear that liability for them did attach to him by virtue of the Poor Law Acts. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1886, clearly rendered a husband liable not only for his wife but for his wife's family and the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, extending the section in the former Act, which it repealed, did so without making any exceptions, and in section 4 of the later Act the words used are "any married woman whose husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty to her, or wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her or her infant children whom he is legally liable to maintain," shall . . ." The words "whom he is legally liable to maintain," in his opinion, brought in the step-children, and therefore he was inclined to say that the husband was bound to provide for them. But it was not necessary to go as far as that, for section 5, sub-section (c), gave power to the court of summary jurisdiction to make an order containing a provision that the husband "should pay to the applicant personally," and therefore it was surely to be inferred that the justices were justified in taking into account that the payment was for herself and her children. The only question, therefore, left was whether the amount that had been ordered was a proper one. With regard to that, he thought that the principles on which this court acted were a very proper guide for the justices to follow, but this court was not bound to give any particular amount, but it took into consideration all the circumstances of each particular case. In the present case this court did not think that the amount awarded was excessive.

Appeal from an order of Bucknill, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff was, in February, 1901, appointed by the defendant London correspondent at a weekly salary of the European edition of the New York Herald, of which the defendant was the proprietor.

The defendant was a foreigner having a place of residence in France, but none in England.

On the 26th of October, 1901, the defendant wrote and posted a letter at Naples addressed to and received by the plaintiff in England, giving him notice that he terminated his employment at the expiration of two weeks from that date.

The plaintiff thereupon commenced an action against the defendant for breach of contract and wrongful dismissal, and as he was unable to serve the writ in England he obtained leave to issue a concurrent writ and to serve notice thereof on the defendant out of the jurisdiction. Notice of the writ was accordingly served on the defendant at Nice.

The defendant entered a conditional appearance, and applied at chambers for an order to set aside the notice of the writ of summons and the service thereof on him. The master made an order setting aside the notice and the service on the ground that there was no breach within the jurisdiction of the contract sued on.

Bucknill, J., affirmed this order, and gave leave to appeal.

By ord. 11, r. 1: "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever . . . (e) the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland."

Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and P. Rose-Innes, for the plaintiff.—The contract was clearly one to be performed within the jurisdiction. The only question, therefore, is whether the alleged breach occurred within the jurisdiction. The breach did not occur when the letter was posted at Naples. It occurred when the letter was received by the plaintiff in England. Cherry v. Thompson, 20 W. R. 1029, L. R. 7 Q. B. 573, is relied upon by the other side, but that was a decision upon section 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, containing very different words from those in ord. 11, r. 1 (e). It was an action for breach of promise of marriage, the marriage to take place in Germany, and a letter was written and posted by the defendant in Germany and received by the plaintiff in England in which the defendant declined to carry out the engagement. It was held that the breach of the contract to marry occurred in Germany. That decision cannot apply to ord. 11, r. 1 (e), nor can it apply to an action for wrongful dismissal. It is said that the Postmaster-General is the agent of both parties, and that therefore the breach was complete when the letter was posted at Naples. No case, however, has said that a foreign postmaster-general is to be considered as the agent of both parties. It might be that a letter of dismissal posted at some distant place abroad would take weeks to arrive in this country, and in such a case the plaintiff might be performing his duties between the times of the posting and receipt of the letter, and yet according to the defendant's contention the plaintiff would have been dismissed when the letter was posted, and would be entitled to no salary for the intermediate time. Such a contention ought not to be adopted. The breach, therefore, was not complete until the notice of dismissal was communicated to the plaintiff in England, and therefore the breach occurred within the jurisdiction.

Norman Craig (J. E. Bankes, K.C., with him), for the defendant.—It may be conceded, for the purposes of the argument, that the contract was one to be performed within the jurisdiction. But the alleged breach did not take place within the jurisdiction. The breach was complete when the letter was posted at Naples. The act constituting the breach occurred there, the letter itself being only evidence of the breach. The courts in Ireland had followed the decision in Cherry v. Thompson, and had applied it to an action for wrongful dismissal: Mathews v. Alexander, Ir. R. 7 C. L. 575; Hamilton v. Barr, 18 L. R. Ir. 297, 35 W. R. Dig. 163. The latter of those decisions was upon a rule containing similar words to those in ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

P. Rose-Innes replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Without in any way saying that the decision in Cherry v. Thompson, or the decisions of the Irish courts in Mathews v. Alexander and Hamilton v. Barr, are wrong, it is impossible for us now to arrive at any conclusion different from that arrived at in those cases. It is a matter of great importance, with regard to the practice in cases of this kind that the decisions should be uniform, and nothing has been suggested in argument to convince us that we ought to hold that those decisions are wrong. There was, therefore, upon the above cases, a complete breach of the contract when the letter was posted at Naples, and the order of the learned judge was right.

In re GREAT NORTHERN AND CITY RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Practice—Appeal from chambers—Court of Appeal—Matters of practice and procedure—Order for question of compensation to be tried in the High Court—Regulation of Railways Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), s. 41—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 4.

Where a judge at chambers has made an order, under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, for the trial of a question of compensation in the High Court, the appeal from such order lies to the Divisional Court, and not direct to the Court of Appeal.

Appeal from an order of Bucknill, J., at chambers.

A question having arisen between the Great Northern and City Railway Co. and Richard Long as to the amount of compensation, if any, payable by the railway company in respect of lands of Richard Long, which he as claimant alleged to have been injuriously affected by the exercise of the company's statutory powers, the company made an application under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, for an order that the question should be tried in the High Court before a judge of the King's Bench Division and a special jury.

Bucknill, J., granted the application, but gave the claimant leave to appeal.

The claimant appealed accordingly to the Court of Appeal.

Danckwerts, K.C. (George Cave with him), for the railway company, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay to this court.—The subject-matter of this appeal is not a question of practice or procedure within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894. It is settled that the meaning of that sub-section is that an appeal lies from the judge at chambers direct to this court only on a question of practice or procedure in connection with a cause or matter in the High Court. The question between the claimant and the railway company would in the ordinary course be heard and determined by the Under-Sheriff of Middlesex and a jury under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The order of Bucknill, J., directing the question to be tried in the High Court was not in itself a matter in the High Court. In Watson v. Petts, 47 W. R. 68, [1899] 1 Q. B. 54, the order sought to be appealed from was the refusal of a judge at chambers to grant a prohibition to restrain a county court from exceeding its jurisdiction. It was held that the appeal did not lie to this court, because the question whether the judge should or should not grant the prohibition was not a question of practice or procedure in connection with a cause or matter in the High Court. The same principle was followed in the case of Stevenson v. London Joint Stock Bank, referred to in 109 Law Times, p. 76. There it was held that a refusal to grant a certiorari to remove a cause from the Mayor's Court into the High Court was not a matter of practice or procedure within the meaning of the section. The appeal in this case, therefore, lies not to this court, but to the Divisional Court.

C. C. Scott, for the claimant.—The appellant has adopted the course followed in the case of Donisthorpe v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 45 W. R. 386, [1897] 1 Q. B. 671, though in that case the objection of want of jurisdiction was not taken. Bucknill, J., having ordered that the question of compensation should be tried in the High Court, the question is now transferred from the Under-Sheriff's Court into the High Court, and it is, therefore, now a matter in the High Court. In each of the two cases cited on the other side the application was refused, and so the matter never got into the High Court at all.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this objection is fatal. In Watson v. Petts the question was whether an appeal lay to this court from the refusal of the judge at chambers to grant a prohibition to a county court. This court held that appeal did not lie, on the ground that the application to the judge at chambers was not a matter of practice or procedure in the High Court. Here, when the application was made to the judge at chambers, there was no proceeding in the High Court. It is said that the proceeding has come into the High Court, because the result of the application was that the question of compensation was transferred to the High Court. But that is applying a wrong standard; the answer to the question whether a proceeding is a proceeding in the High Court cannot depend on the result of the proceeding, and if we heard this appeal we should have to say whether the order for transfer was rightly made. In my opinion this class of case is excluded from our jurisdiction by the decision in Watson v. Petts. The appeal therefore lies to the Divisional Court, and not to this court.

WRIGHT v. GLYN. (a.)

Principal and agent—Authority of agent—Ostensible authority—Holding out—Authority to pledge credit—Master and coachman—Authority of coachman to order forage.

The defendant employed a coachman under an arrangement whereby the coachman was to be paid a weekly sum, including the cost of foraging the defendant's horses. The coachman ordered forage for the defendant's horses from the plaintiff without mentioning the arrangement, and the plaintiff supplied forage accordingly for several months, giving credit to the defendant. The defendant duly paid the agreed weekly sums to his coachman, and did not know from whom he ordered forage.

Held, that the mere relation of master and coachman did not of itself involve as a matter of law ostensible authority on the part of the coachman to pledge the master's credit for forage supplied for the master's horses, and that there was no evidence of a holding out by the defendant of his coachman as having such authority.

Appeal from the judgment of Grantham, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by the personal representative of J. F. Trigg, deceased, who carried on business as a corn merchant, to recover £95 2s. 6d.,

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

the price of forage supplied by Trigg to the defendant between April and October, 1898.

The evidence was to the following effect:

The defendant had entered into an arrangement with his coachman or groom, a man named Dimont, by which the latter was paid a weekly sum to include both his own wages and the cost of foraging the defendant's horses.

In April, 1898, Dimont called at Trigg's place of business and saw Bates, the manager, and ordered the forage in question on behalf of his master without mentioning the arrangement.

Bates after making inquiries with regard to the defendant supplied the forage from time to time, giving credit to the defendant. Bates admitted in cross-examination that he knew that some owners of horses in London paid their coachmen to forage their horses.

The defendant regularly made the agreed payments to Dimont, and at the end of November, 1898, left England for South Africa, and about the same time Dimont left his service.

On the defendant's return in 1901 he became aware for the first time of the claim against him for the price of the forage.

It was contended for the plaintiff that the defendant was liable, inasmuch as he had had the benefit of the forage supplied, and he had not given Trigg any notice of the arrangement between himself and Dimont, whereby Dimont's ostensible authority was limited.

For the defendant it was argued that there had been no holding out of Dimont as having authority to pledge his master's credit, and reliance was laid on the admission by Bates that he knew that some owners of horses in London paid their coachmen to forage their horses, and it was contended that knowledge of this fact put him on inquiry as to whether there was such an arrangement in the present case.

Grantham, J., on the authority of the cases of Rimell v. Sampayo, 1 C. & P. 254, and Precious v. Abel, 1 Esp. 350, gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Loehnis, for the defendant.

Theobald Mathew, for the plaintiff.

The following cases were cited: Rusby v. Scarlett, 5 Esp. 76; Stubbing v. Heintz, Peake's Nisi Prius Rep. 66; Payne v. Lord Leconfield, 30 W. R. 814; Pole v. Leask, 33 L. J. Cur. adv. vult.

March 10.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an action brought by the plaintiff as representative of one Trigg, deceased, a corn merchant, for £95 2s. 6d., being the price of forage supplied by the deceased on the order of the defendant's coachman and consumed by the defendant's horses. The defence is that the coachman had no authority to pledge his master's credit for the forage. Grantham, J., has given judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant now appeals. The facts lie in a very short compass, and the evidence consists of certain affidavits made under order 14, supplemented by the evidence at the trial, of Bates the manager of the deceased, and that of Mr. Glyn, the defendant. The coachman was not called. It appears that one Dimont, the coachman or groom—he is called sometimes one and sometimes the other in the evidence, and it does not seem to be material which was his true capacity—was employed by the defendant under an arrangement that the defendant should pay him a certain sum per week per horse, and that he should for such payment supply forage and shoeing. It appeared from Bates's evidence that Dimont had called and said he wanted to open an account for forage for Mr. Glyn; that he thereupon took the order and made the usual inquiries about Mr. Glyn, and then delivered the goods, and continued to supply them till the defendant's horses left town in the following November; and he swore that he gave credit to the defendant, to whom in November he forwarded a statement of account at his address in London. The defendant had then left England for South Africa and had never had any dealings whatever with the plaintiff, nor was he aware till his return from South Africa from whom Dimont had ordered forage, or that it had not been paid for. The agreed payments to Dimont had been regularly made. Bates admitted that he was aware that some of his customers—perhaps 10 per cent.—had arrangements with their coachmen similiar to that made by the defendant, but, he added, "the coachmen then say so." The question, therefore, is, on these facts, Has the plaintiff proved his claim against the defendant? I am of opinion that he has not. There can be no question as to the law in the matter. In order to fix the principal for an order given by a person purporting to be his agent, it is quite clear that either actual or ostensible authority to contract for the principal, or ratification, must be proved. Here express authority is distinctly negatived, and the case for the plaintiff must rest on ostensible authority alone. It certainly cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a coachman or groom has ostensible authority to pledge his master's credit for forage for his horses. The mere relation of master and coachman does not of itself involve as a matter of law such authority. If that be so, it becomes a pure question of fact—Was there evidence of a holding out by the defendant of Dimont as having his authority to pledge his credit? It seems to me there was none. The defendant is never introduced into the discussion at all by any act done by him except that of taking Dimont into his service. Bates acted on the representations made to him by Dimont, and on nothing else. He took the risk of those statements being true or false; and though he learnt that Dimont was the defendant's coachman, and was aware that arrangements, such as that here proved, sometimes existed between coachmen and their masters, he took no trouble to ascertain from the defendant whether any such arrangement existed between him and Dimont. Unless, therefore, the fact that Dimont stated with truth that he was the defendant's coachman amounts to a holding out by the defendant of Dimont as having authority to pledge the defendant's credit for forage, there is literally no evidence to fix the defendant in this case. We are not at liberty to try this case upon any facts except those which appear in evidence; and we certainly cannot assume, as we were invited to do by plaintiff's counsel, that it must be taken as common knowledge that coachmen have primâ facie authority to pledge their masters' credit for forage, and that the onus is thrown on the defendant of making the fact of any limitation of any such authority known to persons who supply forage. Could it be said that where the master himself makes a contract with a corn merchant for the foraging of his horses the coachman has, nevertheless, ostensible authority to bind the master by other contracts made with other persons to supply it, or that, where the master supplies his own forage, the coachman, by virtue of his position as such, has ostensible authority to order it elsewhere? Suppose the contract with the coachman were that he should supply horses, carriage, and forage for a lump sum, could he, nevertheless, make the master liable to the corn merchant on the footing of ostensible in the case of a deed, a notice requiring payment of the mortgage money served on the mortgagor, and assuming that there would have been default in payment for three months after such service—all of which assumptions I doubt—I yet think that the presence of these provisions in the Conveyancing Act would not justify us in departing from the law as it appeared to be established before the passing of that Act. Let me now consider the reason of requiring a notice as a condition of the implied power of sale. It may be said that the object of the notice is to put the mortgagor in default, and that it is this which is, in essence, the condition of the power of sale. Perhaps so. But in what respect is the mortgagor to be in default before the pledge can be sold against him? The debt is due, and an action could, ex hypothesi, be brought against him. Moreover, why is it that the notice must be "reasonable," as by all the authorities it must be? To my mind the answer is plain—to give the mortgagor a reasonable opportunity to redeem. In my judgment none of the letters did give the mortgagor in this case this opportunity. Of course he had the right to redeem whether or not a notice was given. This is not the opportunity intended to be given by a notice; there is nothing in the letters to put a certain end to the indefinite credit. There is nothing in the letters to lead the mortgagor to suppose that he must redeem by a definite day or suffer a sale of the pledge. On the contrary, the letters plainly tell him that the subject-matter of pledge has ceased to exist. It is unnecessary to look at any of the letters prior to the purchase of the last 300 shares—that is to say, prior to November, 1897. [His lordship then read certain correspondence between the plaintiff and the defendants in May, 1898, and continued:] The defendants are here waiting for instructions to sell, and certainly make no demand for immediate payment or for payment by a fixed date. Then comes the notice from the secretary of the company of the proposed amalgamation meeting, accompanied by a letter from the defendants. This is followed by an amalgamation notice from the liquidators of the 16th of August, together with a registered letter of the defendants of the 22nd of August. It seems to me that up to this date there is nothing in the letters of the defendants making such a demand as to raise an mplied power of sale in case the mortgagor, the plaintiff, should not comply with it. On the contrary, the letters ask for instructions to sell, or for money to take up the substituted shares in the new company; and when one looks at the letter of the 22nd of August, it seems to me impossible that anything in this letter containing the misstatement as to the mortgagor's position can operate to raise an implied power of sale. The mortgagor might have been willing and able to redeem if he had known that he could, as a dissentient shareholder, have insisted on being paid out at the then value of the shares. This, in my judgment, brings the case within the principle of the decision in Pigott v. Cubley, 12 W. R. 467, 15 C. B. N. S. 701, in which a misstatement by the pledgee in his claim of the amount due prevented the implied power of sale arising, and made the sale wrongful. This misrepresentation as to the security being forfeited if the shares in the new company were not taken up, and the view of the defendants that they were entitled to treat themselves as unsecured creditors, although they in fact exchanged the shares for shares in the new company, continued until the sale of the new shares in March, 1899. Moreover, in the account sent with the demand for payment, at a time when 1,050 shares were still unsold, but when the 700 shares had been surrendered, there is a misrepresentation in effect by omission, bringing the case within the principle of Pigott v. Cubley. The mortgagor was entitled, when he knew of the surrender of the old against the new shares to elect to take the new shares, but he was not bound so to do; and until he did so, the position was that the mortgagee had realized the old shares by surrender and was bound to give credit for the value. I am inclined to think that, even if there had been such notice of default as to raise an implied power of sale prior to the taking up of the new shares by the mortgagees in September, the power of sale would not have continued and extended to the new shares which the mortgagor had no opportunity of redeeming; but this is unimportant, as I am clearly of opinion that there never was such notice and default as to raise an implied power of sale either by the letter of the 31st of May, or by any letter subsequent to it; and that no notice is material prior to the date of the purchase of the last 300 of the 700 shares. It follows that, in my opinion, the sale of the 1,050 shares substituted as security for the 700 was wrongful, and that the plaintiff is entitled to damages; but I think that those damages are limited to the price realized by the shares less the amount due to the defendants for principal, interest, and proper charges; but as the £55 brought into court was not sufficient to answer the plaintiff's claim, I think that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, with costs. Farwell, J.'s order as to costs is based on the assumption that the defendants were entitled to sell. Perhaps I ought to add that the reason why I think, notwithstanding the decision of Wills, J., in Michael v. Hart, that the damages in this case must be limited to the value of the shares at the date of the wrongful sale, and do not extend to the highest value between the wrongful sale and the trial, is that the circumstances of this case do not bring it within Michael v. Hart, assuming that decision to be right. In the present case the evidence shows that the plaintiff never was in a position to redeem the shares until the sale; and it is the merest speculation to assume that the plaintiff would have kept the shares till May (the time of the highest price) and then sold out, especially as the mortgagee could by notice have compelled him to redeem or have the shares sold.

STIRLING, L.J.—This case was decided in the court of first instance and has been argued in this court on the basis that the relation between the plaintiff and the defendants was that of mortgagor and mortgagee; and I think that it must now be dealt with on that footing. I agree with Farwell, J., in thinking that the statement of the law at p. 275 of Robbins on Mortgages is correct. The passage is as follows: "If stock is itself made the security for money, and the day appointed for payment is passed, the mortgagee may at once proceed to sell the stock and repay himself principal and interest, without any authority from the mortgagor and without commencing an action of foreclosure." This, however, leaves open the question, What are the rights of the mortgagee where no day has been appointed for payment? And I have nowhere found any authoritative statement of the law on his head. Some light may be derived from what has been said by learned judges as to the rights of a pawnee or pledgee of chattels in like circumstances. Thus Bowen, L.J., says in Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 2, 17 Q. B. D. 690; "There is at common law an authority to the pledgee to sell the goods on the default of the pledgor to repay the money either at the time appointed or after notice by the pledgee." In In re Morritt, 35 W. R. 277, 18 Q. B. D. 222, Cotton, L.J., says:

"A contract of pledge carries with it the implication that the security may be made available to satisfy the obligation and enables the pledgee in possession (though he has not the general property in the thing pledged, but a special property only) to sell on default in payment and after notice to the pledgor, although the pledgor may redeem at any moment up to sale." He afterwards says, with reference to the position of a mortgagee of personal chattels, "Where there is no express power of sale given by the mortgage, he has, after default in payment, and after he has given to the mortgagor a reasonable time to pay the money due, a power to sell and give a good title to the purchaser, though, of course, the mortgagor has, at any time before sale, a right, on payment of the money due, including expenses, to prevent the sale and redeem the chattels." According to those authorities it would seem to me that where no time for payment has been originally fixed, then, before the power of sale can be exercised, notice is to be given to the mortgagor, and default must be be made by him in payment after such notice. What this notice is to contain is nowhere defined; but it must, of course, be a notice which is in all respects reasonable, regard being had to the circumstances of the case. A notice demanding payment of an excessive sum has been held to be bad: Pigott v. Cubley. The notice must give a reasonable opportunity to the mortgagor to pay what is due under the mortgage; and I think it is at least desirable that it should fix a day for that purpose and also convey to the mind of the mortgagor that if he fail to avail himself of the opportunity the mortgagee will be in a position to put in force his rights.

The transaction between the plaintiff and the defendants commenced with a purchase of 400 shares on the 29th of July, 1897. The plaintiff remitted to the defendants a part only of the purchase-money, and the shares were transferred to and registered in the names of two of the defendants. On the 31st of August, 1897, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff a letter containing the following passage: [His lordship then read the passage above set out, and continued:] By a letter dated the 12th of October, 1897, the plaintiff acknowledged the receipt of this letter of the 31st of August, and excused himself for not having sent money to the defendants; but he raised no objection to the exercise of the right claimed by them. I think that he hereby gave his consent to the defendants' continuing to hold the shares on the terms stated in that letter, and that, on non-payment by him on the 15th of September, 1897, of the amount then due to the defendants, the defendants became entitled to sell those 400 shares. Subsequently to the last mentioned date, further purchases of shares, amounting to 300 in all, were made by the defendants on behalf of the plaintiff, who again remitted to them part only of the purchase-money; and the shares were transferred and registered in the same way as the original 400. The last of these purchases was made on the 11th of November, 1897. All the unpaid purchase-money remained due on the 31st of May, 1898, on which day the defendants wrote to the plaintiff a letter in which they expressed their desire that he would not further delay in fulfilling his promise to liquidate his indebtedness to the defendants, which they stated amounted at the end of March to £577 10s. 6d., and carried an accruing 6 per cent. interest. They informed him that the shares were then only worth a doubtful 10s. per share. On the 7th of June the plaintiff replied to the effect that he had not received some money due to him in London, and this was the cause of the delay, but he expected to receive it in the course of the month, and then he would settle with them. Shortly after this time a scheme of reconstruction of the company under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, was resolved on. Under this each assenting shareholder was to receive in exchange for every two £1 shares held by him three shares in a new company of £1, but with only 17s. paid up; and the 9th of September was fixed as the last day for assents by shareholders. Correspondence took place between the defendants and the plaintiff with reference to this scheme in June and July; but I pass by this and come to an important letter by the defendants to the plaintiff, dated the 22nd of August, 1898. [His lordship then read the letter, and proceeded:] I think that, when fairly construed, this letter amounts to notice to the plaintiff that unless he should by the 9th of September remit to the defendants both the amount of his indebtedness to them in respect of the shares and also the amount which would become payable on the new shares, the defendants would deem themselves at liberty to enforce payment of the debt. On the 3rd of September the plaintiff wrote to the effect that he was unable to remit any money, asked the defendants to regard his interests respecting the shares, and expressed the hope that they would obtain at least the sum they had paid. On the 9th of September the defendants replied to this letter, and said that unless they received a remittance in response to a telegram sent to the plaintiff ("must have cash remittance") they must reluctantly take steps to recover their debt. This remittance was stated to be of the moneys due to the defendants, with a further sum to cover the amount payable on claiming and taking up the shares. On the same day notice was given that time for assenting to the reconstruction scheme was extended to the 23rd of September. On the 15th of September the defendants wrote to the plaintiff informing him of this extension, and said: "We must inform you that if you fail to remit you will lose all interest in the shares, and we must proceed against you to recover the sums we have paid on your account" On the 19th of September the plaintiff wrote to the effect that it was quite impossible for him to remit as desired by the defendants, and there, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, the correspondence ceased until July, 1889, though letters demanding payment were sent by the defendants on the 3rd of October and the 15th of November, 1898.

We were invited by the learned counsel for the defendants to hold that the letter of the 22nd of August, 1898 (if no other), was such a notice as entitled them to sell the shares, and I have come to the conclusion that it was. It fixes a day for payment—viz., the 9th of September, 1898. The period between the date of the letter and the day fixed for payment is two days longer than the period fixed by the letter of the 31st of August, 1897, which was assented to by the plaintiff, and was, I think, perfectly reasonable, both in itself and also when regard is had to the preceding correspondence. It also clearly intimates to the plaintiff that if he fails to comply with the terms of it the defendants will proceed to enforce their rights. It is said that this letter contains such misrepresentations as to invalidate it as a notice. These are, first, that the defendants speak of the shares as liable to forfeiture, in the event of the plaintiff not assenting to the scheme; and, secondly, that they describe themselves as unprotected by any security. Literally, no doubt, these statements are incorrect. If the plaintiff did not assent to the scheme, he would have been entitled to receive the value of his shares, which was ascertained to be a little over 1s. per share. The defendants had a security, and if they had sold the old shares in the market they would have obtained in the market about the same sum per share. Although in these respects the letter is not strictly accurate, I think that the statements contained in it are correct, and that it was not invalidated as a notice by any inaccuracies in it. There was no misleading; the letters of the plaintiff show that he was impecunious, and the sum of £30 would not have enabled him to redeem a debt of over £500. The subsequent correspondence extended the time for payment to the 24th of September, and it does not seem to me that the subsequent letters of the 3rd of October and the 15th of November, written by the defendants, deprived them of any right which they had thus acquired. I say this because, as I understand, the learned judge who heard the case and saw the witnesses has found as a fact that the defendants, although they made a serious and regrettable mistake as to their legal position, nevertheless acted in good faith, believing themselves to be owners of the shares substituted for those originally bought. In my judgment the defendants had, under the letter of the 22nd of August, 1898, power to sell all the 700 shares at any time after the 24th of September, 1898, and also, as regards the first 400 shares, the power derived from the letter of the 31st of August, 1897. Both these powers were available over the new shares substituted for them respectively. I do not think that the fact found by Farwell, J., that the defendants sold bonâ fide, believing themselves to be absolute owners, precludes them from defending themselves on the ground of a power of sale which they were entitled to exercise; and I think that Henderson v. Astwood is an authority in support of that view. In my opinion, the judgment of Farwell, J., was right, and the appeal ought to be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—The difference of opinion between my two colleagues has made me approach this case with anxiety; but, after mature consideration, I think Farwell, J.'s, judgment was correct and ought to be affirmed. The plaintiff alleges in his statement of claim that 700 shares, which were purchased for the plaintiff by the defendants acting as his brokers, were, in accordance with a verbal arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendants, transferred into the names of two members of the defendants' firm "by way of mortgage to secure the sum so due from the plaintiff." This allegation was not admitted by the statement of defence, but it was admitted before Farwell, J., and the argument before us has proceeded on that footing. Assuming the true relation between the parties to be that of mortgagor and mortgagees of shares, I think it is settled law (Wilson v. Tooker) that the mortgagees have a power of sale, provided that a reasonable time has elapsed after notice requiring payment. The notice need not state that the mortgagees will sell, it is sufficient that the notice requires payment of the mortgage money. On this point section 20 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, may be referred to. It clearly expresses that which is implied when judges speak of the necessity of reasonable notice, without saying what the notice should comprise. Now in the present case I think the letters written by the defendants from April to September, 1898 (which his lordship specifically referred to), were, both separately and collectively, good notices requiring payment of the mortgage debt. I do not rely upon the letter of the 31st of August, 1897, because at that date only 400 shares had been purchased; and the letter could only have relation to those 400 shares. No time being originally fixed for payment of the mortgage debt, it was payable on demand, and each and all of the letters I have referred to must be regarded as a demand for payment. It is true that in Tucker v. Wilson there was a definite time fixed originally for payment; but, in my opinion, that was not essential to the decision. The position of a mortgagee is at least as good as, and I think in some respects better than, the position of a pawnee. In In re Richardson, Shillito v. Hobson, 34 W. R. 286, 30 Ch. D. 396, Fry, L.J., at p. 403, states the law as follows: "The pawnee would have a right to sell the chattel pawned, either in default of payment at the time fixed, if there be a time fixed, or in default of payment after reasonable notice, if no time be fixed." And in Ex parte Hubbard, In re Hardwick, Bowen, L.J., uses similar language: "In all such cases there is at common law an authority to the pledgee to sell the goods on the default of the pledgor to repay the money, either at the time originally appointed or after notice by the pledgee." I may observe that the letters to which I have referred, with one exception, do not contain any statement, accurate or inaccurate, as to the amount due; but although a mistake as to the amount due may destroy the effect of the notice, as between pledgor and pledgee—Pigott v. Cubley—I think that is not the law as between mortgagor and mortgagee. In order to restrain a mortgagee from selling, in the absence of fraud, it is not sufficient to contest the amount due on the mortgage. The mortgagor must pay into court, or tender to the mortgagee, the amount claimed to be due. Having regard to the nature of the property, a fortnight, or at the outside a month, would in the present case be a reasonable time. If, therefore, the defendants had sold the 700 shares in February and March, 1899, I should have felt no difficulty in this case. But some difficulty is occasioned by the fact that the 700 shares have ceased to exist, and that under a so-called reconstruction scheme the defendants applied for and obtained an allotment of 1,050 shares in a new company in respect of these 700 shares, and that they were foolish enough to fancy that they could claim the benefit of those shares as their own property not subject to any rights of the plaintiff, and that they sold those new shares in February and March, 1899, not as mortgagees, but as absolute owners. Now it is clear that those 1,050 new shares were as much subject to the mortgage as the original 700 shares. It is precisely similar to the case of a renewed lease granted to the mortgagee. This is the plaintiff's allegation. It follows that the substituted property is subject to the same power of sale as the old property was subject to. Nor can I see that it makes any difference that the defendants sold under the belief that they were no longer mortgagees. Farwell, J., has found that they were not fraudulent; and this being so, if authority is wanted, I think the decision in the Privy Council in Henderson v. Astwood suffices to show that the sales in February and March, 1899, may be supported as sales under their power as mortgagees. I cannot help expressing my regret at the conclusion at which I have arrived, because I am convinced that in fact the relation between the parties was not that of mortgagor and mortgagee. The plaintiff was in Spain, and the defendants were in London. The verbal arrangement pleaded is a mere fiction. The relation between the parties was simply that of client and brokers; and if the plaintiff had sued the defendants on that footing, as at present advised, I think he might have recovered damages for wrongful conversion. The rights of a broker, in respect of a broker's lien, or under the rules of the Stock Exchange, are not the same as the rights of a mortgagee under an express contract of mortgage. In the view which I take it is unnecessary to consider what would have been the proper measure of damages if the conversion of the shares had been wrongful.

SALTER v. LEAS HOTEL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debenture—Goodwill—"Property"—Debenture-holder's action—Jurisdiction to appoint manager.

The goodwill of a hotel business is the property of the company to which the hotel belongs, so that if all the "property" of the company is charged by its debentures the goodwill of the hotel business is included therein, and a manager of the business can be appointed in a debenture-holder's action.

Motion for the appointment of a receiver and manager in a debenture-holder's action.

The debentures were thirty in number and were issued on the 5th of March, 1898. Six of them were held by the plaintiff.

By the terms of each debenture the company charged "all its lands, buildings, property, stock-in-trade, furniture, chattels, and effects whatsoever both present and future," with payment of £100 and interest at 6 per cent., but the goodwill and business were not expressly mentioned.

The writ in the action was in the usual form.

P. F. S. Stokes, for the plaintiff.—Though the goodwill and undertaking of the company are not expressly mentioned, yet the words of the debenture are sufficiently wide to include them, and therefore a manager of the hotel can be appointed: Peek v. Trinsmaran Iron Co., 24 W. R. 361, 2 Ch. D. 115; Makins v. Percy Ibotson & Sons, 39 W. R. 73, [1891] 1 Ch. 133; Whitley v. Challis, 40 W. R. 344, [1898] 1 Ch. 378; In re David and Matthews, 47 W. R. 313, [1899] 1 Ch. 378.

Hon. F. Russell, for the company, offered no opposition.

KEKEWICH, J.—On the whole I think I have jurisdiction to appoint a manager. The question whether I have such jurisdiction depends entirely on the question whether the goodwill or business of the company is charged by the debentures. [The learned judge here read the words from the debenture before cited, and continued as follows:] The company is carrying on the business of a hotel, and the question is whether these words include that business. The test in all these cases is whether in the event of the realization of the security the business or goodwill can be sold under the order of the court, or, in other words, whether the plaintiff under the order of the court can make a good title to a purchaser. That again depends on the question whether the goodwill or business is expressly or by implication included in the property charged, so as to make it part of the security. That was clearly pointed out by the Court of Appeal in Whitley v. Challis, and it has been pointed out again and again in many cases. But nevertheless it seems continually to be forgotten in practice that the duty of a manager is only to manage for the purpose of realization, and until he can conveniently realize. Notwithstanding that, I have frequently before me applications that the manager shall go on managing for the purpose of making a profit; but I always insist on realization at the earliest convenient moment and upon management only to that end. Whitley v. Challis was a peculiar case. The security there was extremely like an ordinary mortgage, and quite different from the usual form of a debenture. It was a mortgage of a building agreement and of all the premises comprised therein and the hotel or building to be thereafter erected. There were no additional words which could be construed as passing the business carried on in the hotel, and for that reason, and because the business could not be sold by a mortgagee by the intervention of the court, the Court of Appeal refused to appoint a manager, and explained their decision at length on that ground. On the other hand, I have before me the two cases of Jennings v. Jennings and In re David and Matthews. The former was a partnership case, and Stirling, J., in deciding it, had to consider whether the goodwill was comprised in the words "assets of the partnership," and he held that it was. He says: "What the certificate speaks of is 'the assets' of the partnership; the goodwill is not expressly mentioned. It was not disputed that the word 'assets' includes the goodwill so far as it constitutes property." He treated the goodwill as "property." If it is property of a partnership clearly it is property of a company. On that he not only says, as I understand, that goodwill is included under assets, but takes care to show that it is assets because it may be treated as property. In In re David and Matthews Romer, J., had different words to construe—namely, the words "effects and securities"—and the learned judge, following Jennings v. Jennings, thought that those words were sufficient to cover the goodwill. Here the words are "all property and effects whatsoever." If as regards a partnership the words "partnership assets" or "effects" cover goodwill, it would seem that the word "property" must also cover goodwill. Then is there any distinction between the case of a partnership and that of a company? I know of none. A company is simply a partnership on special terms authorized by the Legislature, and what is true of a private partnership must be true of a joint stock company. I therefore think that the goodwill passed under this debenture, and grant this application accordingly.

certain of the remaining plots a block of mansions not in accordance with the building scheme. S. constructed the mansions with a party-wall, one-half of which was upon the adjoining plot, his intention being to add a corresponding block upon the adjoining plots. This intention was never carried into effect. The plots on which the first block had been erected were conveyed by O. to S. in fee simple, the conveyance containing no express grant of light. S. the next day mortgaged the premises to X., who had full knowledge of the building agreement and of the manner in which the mansions had been erected. O. subsequently sold the plots adjoining the party-wall to S., who in turn conveyed the same to the defendants. X. subsequently sold the block of mansions, under his power of sale, to O., who made a settlement of the property, under which he was himself interested.

This was an action instituted in respect of the obstruction of the access of light to certain windows which were not ancient lights.

The facts of the case were as follows: One Oxley, being owner of a building estate at Hammersmith, on the 19th of January, 1884, entered into a building agreement with a builder named Sage. The property was plotted out in the usual manner for a building estate, upon a plan attached to the agreement. The plots were numbered from 1 to 44 inclusive.

By the agreement (clause 3) Sage covenanted "to build, cover in, and completely finish within twelve calendar months from the date thereof on each of the parcels of ground numbered 1 to 9 inclusive on the said plan, and within twenty-seven months from the date thereof on each of the parcels numbered 10 to 19 inclusive in the plan a good and substantial dwelling-house or shop with proper vaults, areas, and drains thereto and of the actual cost of £1,000 each. . . . And also within twenty-seven calendar months from the date thereof to erect on each of the said parcels of ground numbered 20 to 44 inclusive a coach-house and stable premises, dwelling-house or cottage . . . of the actual cost of £300 each."

By clause 10 of the agreement Oxley covenanted, so soon as the buildings had been completed, to grant to Sage a lease of each parcel of ground for a term of ninety-nine years from Christmas, 1883, at a fixed rent for each plot of ground, but it was provided also (by clause 14) that in the event of failure to obtain the necessary sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works to the formation of a certain road marked out upon the plan, a fresh scheme should be settled by arbitration. There was also reserved to Oxley power under certain conditions to re-enter the premises and to complete the buildings covenanted by Sage to be erected; and by clause 17 Sage was, upon certain terms, to be allowed to purchase the fee simple of the premises agreed to be demised.

The plots numbered 1 to 8 were built upon and purchased by Sage pursuant to the option contained in clause 17. Sage then proposed to Oxley to erect upon plots 10, 11, 12, and part of 30 (to which they were adjacent) a block of mansions, ultimately and now known as Addison-mansions. This was assented to, and these mansions were erected by Sage with the concurrence of Oxley. It was in respect of certain windows in the western side of these mansions that the present action was brought.

To the west of the site of the mansions were the rest of plot 30 and plots 29, 28, 27, and 26, hereinafter referred to collectively as "the adjoining ground." They now formed the site of the buildings (stables and a carriage or van house) complained of in the action as obstructing the access of light to the windows of the mansions.

According to the building agreement the several plots forming the adjoining ground were amongst those which were to have built upon them "a coach-house and stable premises, dwelling-house or cottage" as might be agreed, and in default of agreement as might be settled by arbitration, in which last event the buildings were to be a "mews or workmen's residences or private houses."

When the building of Addison-mansions was commenced Sage contemplated the erection of another and corresponding block of mansions upon the adjoining ground, and he at the same time laid the foundations therefor in such ground with the concurrence of or without objection from Oxley. Addison-mansions were built with about half of the western wall, from the northern end to the middle of the western side of the mansions constructed as a party wall, having chimney breasts and apertures for fireplaces on the outside. Then there was a return wall of about four feet in length at right angles to this party wall; then a wall parallel to the party wall and with the return wall forming the two sides, or one end and one side of an area or open space not intended to be built upon. The southern end of this area abutted upon the road and the western side was open to the adjoining ground.

These foundations on the adjoining ground were obviously and admittedly laid so as to leave or provide a similar and equal area on the adjoining ground in such a manner that the two areas together would make a space or court, in the shape of a parallelogram with no buildings thereon.

The mansions having been built, Sage exercised his option to take a conveyance in fee instead of a lease. That conveyance was made by an indenture dated the 5th of May, 1886. Attached to the conveyance was a plan upon which the two areas were plainly shown and also the party wall, which was there so described. The conveyance contained no specific grant of light, but by virtue of section 6 (2) of the Conveyancing Act of 1881, the deed operated to convey with the mansion all light appertaining or reputed to appertain thereto or at the time of the conveyance enjoyed therewith.

On the following day, the 6th of May, 1886, a mortgage was made by Sage to Sim and others, the same solicitor acting for Sage and the mortgagees. The description of the parcels and the plan were, in all material particulars, identical with those on the conveyance. The mortgagee had full notice of the mortgagor's title, of the building agreement, and of the actual condition of the buildings.

On the 28th of September, 1886, this mortgage was transferred to other mortgagees (there being a further advance); and the deed of transfer contained a plan identical with that on the conveyance.

In 1891 the mortgaged premises were sold under the power of sale in the mortgage, Oxley himself being the purchaser. The present owners, the plaintiffs in the action, were the trustees of a settlement of the property made by Oxley, and under which he was interested.

The defendants were the owners of the adjoining ground. They derived their title under a conveyance by Oxley to Sage in 1887, and a subsequent conveyance by Sage. Neither of these purported to reserve any right to light in favour of the mansions, which were then vested in the mortgagor.

The defendants erected upon the adjoining ground stables and a carriage or van house. These buildings were both further away from the mansions and of less height than the corresponding block of mansions originally contemplated would have been if erected.

Younger, K.C., and Rolt, for the plaintiffs.—We claim these lights under an express grant imported into the conveyance of the 5th of May, 1886, by virtue of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6 (2). In that deed there was no reservation of light by the vendor Oxley. At the time of that conveyance there was no building scheme in existence. This one block of mansions had been allowed to be built so as to cover several lots; and the time within which the buildings had, under the agreement, to be erected was passed. And where you have an express grant there cannot be an implied reservation: Wheeldon v. Burrows, 28 W. R. 196, 12 Ch. D. 31. The mere fact of land being building land is not in itself, in the absence of express reservation, sufficient for the purpose: Birmingham &c. Banking Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D. 295, as explained by Broomfield v. Williams, 45 W. R. 469, [1897] 1 Ch. 602. It was the view of Cotton, L.J., in the former of those cases that both parties knew there was an obligation on the grantee to erect buildings which would necessarily obstruct the light. Here the mansions were erected by the grantee, and it was he and not the grantor who built the party wall: Pollard v. Gare, [1901] 1 Ch. 834, 49 W. R. Dig. 55. If at the date of the conveyance of the 5th of May, 1886, Sage had any interest in the adjoining ground (which we deny) still he was precluded from obstructing our light by reason of the mortgage of the 6th of May, 1886.

They also cited Lawrence v. Horton, 38 W. R. 555.

Hughes, K.C., and Harman, for the defendants.—This is a much stronger case than Birmingham Banking Co. v. Ross. That Sage undoubtedly built under the building agreement is shown by the form of the conveyance to him. At that time it is clear that he intended to build on the adjoining land a block of buildings to correspond with Addison-mansions. He had an equitable interest in that land under the building agreement. As both the plots of land were subject to the same agreement the case is quite different from that of the sale of a building on the edge of a vendor's land. The right to light was limited by the circumstances existing at the time of the grant, and it was obvious that no building could be erected on the adjoining ground without in some way interfering with the light to the mansions. If the question had been raised at the time, Sage could only have had a limited grant of light: Birmingham, &c., Banking Co. v. Ross; Broomfield v. Williams; Burrows v. Lang, 49 W. R. 564, [1901] 2 Ch. 502. The building agreement was in fact never abandoned at all, though Sage postponed for a time the erection of the corresponding block of mansions. That it was the intention of the parties to erect such a block at some time or other is clearly shown by the manner in which the party-wall was marked upon the plan to the conveyance. Section 6 (2) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, has only a restricted meaning when dealing with a newly-erected house: Beddington v. Attlee, 35 W. R. 799, 35 Ch. D. 317; Birmingham, &c., Banking Co. v. Ross; Myers v. Catterson, 38 W. R. 488, 43 Ch. D. 470. The existing buildings do not form nearly so serious an obstruction to the plaintiff's lights as the contemplated block of mansions, if erected, would have done.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 15.—JOYCE, J. (after stating the facts as above): It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff (and it is to Oxley's interest at the present time to support this contention) that the grant of light by him under the general words imported by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, into the conveyance of the 5th of May, 1886, operated against himself as an absolute and unlimited grant of light for the windows in the western side of Addison-mansions. In other words, it is contended that by such conveyance Sage was, and the persons who derive title under him to the adjoining ground now are, precluded from erecting thereon, either the corresponding block of mansions of which the foundations were laid, or any building against their moiety of the party wall, or any such stables or buildings as contemplated by the building agreement. In short, they contend that they may not erect any building that would in any manner whatsoever interfere with the access of light over the adjoining ground to the windows of the mansions looking into the area or open space.

What, then, was the legal effect of the conveyance and mortgage of the 5th and 6th of May, 1886, in reference to any right of light, there being no express general words in either of those deeds?

Easements and privileges legally appendant or appurtenant to property pass by a conveyance of the property simply without any additional words, but before the Conveyancing Act of 1881 easements and privileges which were used and enjoyed with or reputed to appertain to the property without being legally appendant or appurtenant did not pass by a conveyance of the property without being expressly mentioned.

It was decided in Booth v. Alcock, 21 W. R. 743, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 663, that a lease or grant of a house, together with all lights thereto belonging or therewith used or enjoyed, is not a lease or grant of all light then actually falling upon the windows of the house, but only of such right to light as the lessor or grantor then had. That is to say, general words in a grant are to be restricted in equity as well as at law to what the grantor had then power to grant.

As far back as the case of Swansborough v. Coventry, 2 Moo. & Scott 362, the law is laid down by Tindal, C.J., that "it is well-established by the decided cases that when the same person possesses a house having the actual use and enjoyment of certain lights and also possesses the adjoining land and sells the house to another person, although the lights be new he cannot—nor can anyone who claims under him—build upon the adjoining land so as to obstruct or interrupt the enjoyment of these lights."

But in the very important case of the Birmingham, &c., Banking Co. v. Ross, it was determined that, although a grantor shall not derogate from his own grant, this rule does not entitle the grantee of a house with the lights under the words imported into the grant by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to any easement of light to an extent inconsistent with the intention to be implied from the circumstances existing at the time of the grant and known to the grantee. The expression "lights enjoyed" in the statute is confined to the light enjoyed under such circumstances as would reasonably and properly lead to an expectation that the enjoyment of that light would be continued.

In truth there is not in the conveyance of the 5th of May, 1886, any express grant of the right of light now claimed. It is only a question of how far under the circumstances the maxim that the grantor cannot derogate from his own grant applies and operates. And upon consideration, I think that the present case is governed by the decision in the Birmingham, &c., Banking Co. v. Ross. The adjoining ground as well as the site of the mansions was the subject of the pre-existing building agreement between the grantor and the grantee, the mansions had been built by the grantee and their respective rights were to be looked for in the building agreement: see judgment of Rigby, L.J., in Broomfield v. Williams.

Under the circumstances, having regard in particular to the provisions of the building agreement, comprising and affecting as it does the plots which form the adjoining ground, the existence of the foundations laid in such adjoining ground, the obvious existence and the condition of the party-wall and the areas shown in the plan on the conveyance of the 5th of May, 1886, I have come to the conclusion that the conveyance of the 5th of May, 1886, did not, as against Oxley, pass to Sage any right to have the access of light to the windows of the mansions looking into the area over the adjoining ground unobstructed by any future building on the adjoining ground and not within the area contemplated as to be left thereon. I am confident that no such result was intended, nor do I think that the possibility of such a result could have entered into the contemplation of either of the parties.

If I am right in my view of the effect of the conveyance of the 5th of May, 1886, it follows that the mortgage of the 6th of May, 1886, did not pass to the mortgagees as against Oxley and persons claiming through him any greater right or easement than was granted or created against him by the conveyance and I am of opinion that, under the circumstances, and especially having regard to the plan upon the mortgage, and the obvious condition of the premises, the mortgagees could not, if so minded, have prevented Oxley and Sage or their assigns from erecting upon the foundations in the adjoining ground the contemplated block of mansions corresponding to the block first erected. In other words, there did not, in my opinion, result from such mortgage any implied obligation on Sage not to interfere with the lights of the mansion to the extent required for building upon the adjoining ground pursuant to the building agreement, or even of building the corresponding block of mansions, and I cannot see why the transferees of the mortgage, or any purchaser from them, should be in a better position than the original mortgagees.

Whatever rights Oxley and Sage together had after the mortgage to build upon the adjoining ground is now vested in the defendant. It is plain that the present stables and buildings of the defendant on the adjoining ground do not form nearly so serious an obstruction to the access of light to the windows in question as the corresponding block would have done if erected on the same site. Consequently, in my opinion this action by the persons deriving title under the mortgagees against the assigns of Oxley and Sage through the deed of 1887 fails, and must be dismissed.

REX v. STEPNEY BOROUGH COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Metropolitan borough—Abolition of office—Compensation—Statutory duty of borough council—Mandamus—London Government Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 14), s. 30—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 81—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict c. 41), s. 120.

A metropolitan borough council is bound, having regard to section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888, to exercise its own discretion in considering and determining the amount of compensation payable to an official for abolition of his office, and a mandamus will lie to compel the borough council to exercise this statutory duty, even although the same section provides for an appeal to the Treasury from the decision of the borough council by the person aggrieved.

A rule nisi had been obtained by William Jutsum calling upon the Mayor and Aldermen of the Borough of Stepney to show cause why a mandamus should not issue against them to assess the compensation due to him for the loss of his office as Clerk of the Vestry Council of Mile End.

By the London Government Act, 1899, s. 30, sub-section 1, it was provided that any borough council is empowered to abolish any office it may deem not necessary, but any officer is to be entitled to compensation; by sub-section 2 of the same section it is provided that sub-section 7 of section 81 of the Local Government Act, 1894, shall apply to existing officers affected by the Act as if references in that sub-section to the district council were references to the borough council; sub-section 7 of section 81 of the Local Government Act, 1894, provides that section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888, shall apply to the case of existing officers affected by the Act of 1894 as if references to the county council were references to the district council.

Mr. Jutsum's office was abolished by the Stepney Borough Council on the 9th of January, 1901, the Vestry of Mile End being by Order in Council included in the new Borough of Stepney.

The Treasury, on being applied to, stated that it was the habit of the Treasury to calculate the amount of the compensation allowance of a Civil Service official as if his whole time had been required, and to deduct one-fourth of the amount in cases in which the whole time of the official was not required.

The Council assessed the compensation to Mr. Jutsum on this basis, he not having been required to devote his whole time to his duties of vestry clerk.

Mr. Jutsum obtained a rule nisi calling upon the borough council to assess the compensation due to him, contending that they had not carried out the provision of section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1899.

Courthope Munroe (Leese with him) showed cause. —The borough council followed the rule laid down by the Treasury, and they were right to do so. But even if they were wrong it is now well established that when there is an equally convenient remedy the court will not interfere by mandamus, and such a remedy is provided by sub-section 4 of section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888, providing for an appeal to the Treasury.

He cited Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban Council, 45 W. R. 454, and Reg. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, In re Natham, 32 W. R. 543, 12 Q. B. D. 461.

Boydell Houghton, for the respondent.—The remedy is not equally convenient. The applicant is entitled to have his case heard by the local authority, and this they have not done. The mandamus ought to go, as the local authority have not really assessed compensation.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I have come to the conclusion after some doubt that this mandamus must be made absolute. It is now well-established that if an inferior body do not discharge the duty laid upon them a mandamus will lie to make them discharge it, or if an inferior court do not entertain a case which it ought to entertain, a mandamus will lie to compel it to do so. It is also clear that when there is an alternative remedy the court has a discretion as to granting the remedy by mandamus, and as a rule the court will not grant the mandamus when there is an alternative remedy. The duty of the local authority is to have regard in fixing the compensation "to the conditions on which his appointment was made, to the nature of his office or employment, to the duration of his service, to any additional emoluments which he acquired by virtue of this Act, or of anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act to the emoluments which he might have acquired if he had not refused to accept any office offered by any council or other body." I read all these provisions in order to show that it is intended that the council shall exercise their own discretion in assessing compensation. Then there comes the additional condition that the amount shall not exceed the amount which under the Acts and rules relating to the Civil Service is paid to a person on abolition of office. If there were evidence before us of anything to show that there was a statute, or that there were statutory rules or binding rules of the public service applicable to this case, we could not say that the local authority had not acted in accordance with the statute. But on the materials before us it is quite plain that whether there be such rules or not, as to which we know nothing, the local authority have not acted in accordance with any rule, but have followed the Treasury practice. I think it quite impossible that an arbitrary deduction of 25 per cent. would be a sufficient regard to all the circumstances of the case, on the conditions on which the appointment was made, or the nature of his office or employment. In some cases it might be less than 25 per cent., in some cases it might be very much more. That being so, it was primâ facie the duty of the borough council to have regard to and consider this particular case. Then it is said that the applicant is a person aggrieved, that he can appeal to the Treasury, and it is compared to cases where a tribunal has gone wrong in law which the Court of Appeal would deal with. But it seems to me that the remedy is really a remedy against an improper exercise of discretion by the lower tribunal as well as an improper refusal, and that the Treasury have the right of considering the case and deciding whether the amount should be altered or not. It seems to me that under ordinary circumstances the local authority ought to exercise their discretion upon the circumstances of each particular case, and that it is not an adequate remedy to say that the Treasury can fulfil the same function and discharge the same duty even though they have not had the assistance of the local authority. Therefore, apart from any statutory rule, it would be the duty of the local authority to consider for themselves what the deduction should be. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not suggesting that the Treasury are not perfectly competent to deal with the matter on an appeal under sub-section 4; but I think that it was intended that the local authority should exercise its discretion upon the particular case of compensation, and that it was that discretion which was to be the subject of appeal, and that the appeal was to be made by a person who was aggrieved. If there were any evidence before me that the borough council themselves thought that 25 per cent. was the right deduction or had exercised a discretion in that matter, I should not be a party to granting this mandamus; but as they have acted on something which I do not think is binding upon them, I think they ought to be ordered to entertain the case, having regard to the particular circumstances, before any question of alternative remedy arises.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Very much the most forcible answer made to the application for this mandamus was that there was an equally adequate and equally convenient remedy provided by sub-section 4 of section 120—which is, that, is if the claimant is aggrieved by the refusal of the county council to grant any compensation, or by the amount of the compensation, there shall be an appeal to the Treasury, who shall consider the question and determine if any compensation, and if so what amount, ought to be granted. If the borough council had really gone into the case and used their own judgment upon it, or had granted the applicant an amount with which he was dissatisfied, and if in that case, instead of going to the Treasury he had come and asked for the mandamus, I think we ought to have refused him it, and to have said, "No, you shall not have a mandamus because you have got an equally convenient and adequate remedy—go to the Treasury." But I do not think that the council really did consider the question at all for themselves. They came to the conclusion that because the section as to compensation said that they might grant compensation "which should not exceed the amount which under the Acts and rules relating to her Majesty's Civil Service is paid to a person on abolition of office," all they had to do was to write to the Treasury and find out what they were in the habit of giving, and then simply to say "That is your compensation." As a matter of fact it has not been proved that they acted upon any rule of the Treasury at all, nor has it been proved that there was a rule. They acted upon what the Treasury told them was their practice. I do not think, therefore, that they acted upon any real judgment of their own. They asked somebody else for a measure, they borrowed a measure from somebody else and they tried to measure what they were to dole out with that, without applying their own judgment to what they were to give at all. Therefore I think that they have not taken the first step here which would entitle Mr. Jutsum to appeal to the Treasury, and our mandamus simply means that they must take that first step. If they do take that first step and arrive at precisely the same result for reasons which they do not give, it seems to me that we cannot interfere.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree, but I am not sure that I agree for the same reasons. I think, firstly, that the mandamus ought to go because the local authority have not in fact exercised their discretion upon the matter. They have thought that they were bound by a practice of the Treasury, as though it were a rule under the Act. If it had been, it would have been binding upon them. They thought that this rule of practice was a rule by which they were bound, consequently they exercised no discretion. In my opinion, if they said, "We know we are not bound by this absolutely, but we think it right to follow the Treasury practice," and had so followed it, they would have exercised a discretion, but they were mistaken in thinking they were bound. Consequently it is a case for a mandamus calling on them to exercise their discretion unless there is some rule of this court under which you could not issue a mandamus.

The one that has been suggested is that there is another adequate remedy. It is clearly settled that the court does not grant a prerogative writ of mandamus where there is a remedy equally convenient and adequate. For a long time I thought that there was another remedy equally convenient and applicable, and I now think there is another remedy. I do not entertain the slightest doubt that Mr. Jutsum has another remedy, but I do not think, after some consideration, that it is equally convenient. I think that the local tribunal is the best one to investigate in the first instance the particular facts about this gentleman's employment. They will know much better than the Treasury can know the number of hours or days, it may be, that he was employed in the office, and I think that though the applicant can at the present time go to the Treasury and get them to decide finally the amount of the allowance which he ought to have—and very likely he will have to go to them in the end, and the Treasury will ultimately have to decide the matter—yet I do not think that that is an equally convenient remedy where the local authority have not exercised their discretion, because if he goes to the Treasury now he will have to go without that preliminary investigation which might or might not be useful to him in going there.

BRENNAN (OTHERWISE ROBERTS) v. BRENNAN (a.)

Divorce—Nullity of marriage—Domicil—Matrimonial residence—Jurisdiction.

In suits for nullity of marriage the true test of jurisdiction is the matrimonial residence as distinguished from domicil, which is the test in suits for dissolution.

This was a petition for a decree of nullity of marriage.

Margaret Roberts, on the 19th of September, 1898, went through a ceremony of marriage with Christopher Brennan at St. Matthew's Church, Douglas, in the Isle of Man.

In April, 1901, the respondent Brennan told the petitioner that she was not his wife, and on inquiry being made it was ascertained that on the 20th of January, 1896, the respondent was married to Annie Eliza Horsefall, at St. Peter's Church, Liverpool, and she was alive on the 19th of September, 1898.

Pritchard, for the petitioner.—The domicil of the husband is Irish. If, therefore, this was a suit for dissolution of marriage, this court would have no jurisdiction to entertain it. Suits for nullity, however, are on a different footing to dissolution suits, and domicil is not the true test of jurisdiction, but only matrimonial residence. In 1776 Sir George Hay, in Harford v. Morris, 2 Hagg. Cons. 423, said: "The ecclesiastical court certainly has jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever with respect to the marriage of English subjects, wherever celebrated. If celebrated in any foreign country, and it can be shown that such marriage was contrary to the general law, or to the principles that obtain everywhere with respect to marriage, that it was incestuous or liable to any other impediment under which by the law of nations, it is not allowed to marry, then upon such objection it is proper to bring a suit of this nature before the ecclesiastical judge, and wherever such marriage was celebrated it may upon such objection be set aside. The ecclesiastical court has complete jurisdiction to decide the marriages of English subjects by the English law, and therefore, if there was anything to show the marriage void by the general law respecting marriages or by any particular law of the realm, or that a marriage celebrated in evasion of the law of the realm was to be set aside; if that proposition was anywhere tenable certainly this court has full jurisdiction to enter into the cause of nullity upon those accounts." It is therefore clear from that case that the old ecclesiastical courts had jurisdiction to entertain such a suit, and by section 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, this court in all suits and proceedings other than to dissolve any marriage "is to proceed and act and give relief on principles formerly acted upon by the ecclesiastical courts." In Armytage v. Armytage, [1898] P. 178, 46 W. R. Dig. 48, Gorell Barnes, J., referred to the following passage in Shelford's Law of Marriage and Divorce (1841), p. 486: "In matrimonial causes the power of the court is in personam, and depends upon the locality of the person cited. Though a defendant may usually reside out of the kingdom—yet if he is served with a citation within the jurisdiction of an ecclesiastical court in England, as that of the Consistory Court of London, in a suit for nullity of marriage that court has jurisdiction to try the validity of the marriage wherever it might have been contracted." By section 42 of the Act of 1857 service of the petition may be effected out of the jurisdiction, and in this case the respondent was in fact served in Ireland. Moreover, the decree of the court is merely a declaratory decree, and it would be a great hardship if the court were to refuse to make it, for the petitioner is not bound to come to the court at all: Morse v. Morse, 2 Hagg. Eccl. 608.

Counsel also referred to Niboyet v. Niboyet, 27 W. R. 203, 4 P. D. 1.

JEUNE, P., in delivering judgment, said that though the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Niboyet v. Niboyet had been reversed and was held to be wrong as applicable to suits for dissolution of marriage, the reasoning would, as he understood it, have been right if it had been applied to suits for nullity of marriage. He was of opinion that the contention that the doctrine of domicil in cases of nullity did not apply, but that of matrimonial residence did, was well founded, though undoubtedly jurisdiction in dissolution suits was determined by the domicil of the parties. It seemed clear also that such a case as this could have been brought in the ecclessiastical courts, because the view taken by them as to their ability to entertain such a suit would have depended upon the matrimonial residence of the parties, and that being so, this court also would have jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and there would therefore be a decree nisi.

Held, that, having regard to section 53 of 10 Vict. c. 27 (Harbour Clauses Act, 1847) and the bye-law of the dock company, The M. was bound to obey the orders of the lock foreman, and, therefore, that the dock company were alone liable for the damage sustained by The A.

Held, also, that the relationship of master and servant did not exist between the owners of The M. and the dock company.

This was an appeal by the defendants the owners of the ketch The Mystery, from a judgment in an action brought in the City of London Court by the owners of the steamship William Adamson for damage done by the defendants ketch The Mystery under the following circumstances. It appeared that on the 28th of October, 1901, about 2 p m., the weather being bright and clear with a fresh breeze from the south-west and the tide at the last of the flood, The William Adamson, a steamship of 1,986 tons gross, was awaiting to enter the Victoria Dock of the London and India Dock Co. The dock master, who was standing on the pier-head, was giving the directions necessary for the vessel to enter the dock, when at the same time a lock foreman, who was on the lower pier, ordered the ketch Mystery, which was lying head down the river just below the pier-head to pass her stern rope ashore so that it might be made fast, and he directed her to haul on it over her port quarter so as to swing round with the tide and get into position to enter the dock. The lock foreman also ordered four barges, outside of which The Mystery had been lying, to execute a similar manœuvre and swing in the same way. The Mystery, being caught by the wind on her port bow, swung rapidly round, and her forward rope being unable to check her, she struck with her bowsprit the wheel of The William Adamson, thereby doing her the damage for which the plaintiffs now sought to recover from the owners of The Mystery. The London and India Dock Co. were subsequently added as defendants. The second order of the lock foreman was held to be an improper order, and judgment was given against the dock company, and in the absence of any statutory provision exempting the owners of The Mystery from the liability for the tort committed by them, judgment was given against them also. Section 53 of 10 Vict. c. 27 enacts: "The master of every vessel within the harbour or dock or at or near the pier or within the prescribed limits, if any, shall regulate such vessel according to the directions of the harbour master made in conformity with this and the special Act; and any master of a vessel, who, after notice of any such direction by the harbour master served upon him, shall not forthwith regulate such vessel according to such direction shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £20."

JEUNE, P., in delivering judgment, said that inasmuch as the dock foreman was a deputy or assistant of the dock master within the meaning of rule 2 of the bye-laws of the defendant dock company, and those in charge of The Mystery were bound to obey his orders under 10 Vict. c. 27, s. 53, therefore the dock company were alone liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff's vessel. Moreover, the relationship of master and servant did not exist between the dock company and the owners of The Mystery, so as to render the owners of The Mystery responsible for the lock foreman's negligent order. Further, that the plaintiffs acted reasonably in making both the owners of The Mystery and the dock company co-defendants; and inasmuch as the dock company threw the blame on the owners of The Mystery, and they themselves were found alone to blame, the costs of the owners of The Mystery, in the court below and on appeal, must fall on the dock company.

(From the King's Bench for Lower Canada, Province of Quebec.)

Dec. 18.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO. v. ROY. (a.)

Railway Company—Negligence—Tort—Act authorized by statute—Canada (Quebec), Law of.

In the absence of negligence or misconduct, a corporation authorized by statute to carry on a particular business, is not responsible for any damage caused by its doing so in a normal and reasonable manner; for when the Legislature has legalized the acts contemplated and carried out, they cannot constitute an actionable wrong.

This was an appeal by special leave from the Court of King's Bench for Lower Canada, Province of Quebec.

The facts sufficiently appear in the judgment of their lordships.

Blake, K.C., for appellants.

Gonin, K.C., for respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., Lords MACNAGHTEN, SHAND, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir FORD NORTH) was delivered by the Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—This is an appeal by the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. against a judgment of the Court of King's Bench for Lower Canada affirming a judgment of the Superior Court of Quebec whereby that company were held to be liable to damages to the extent of 300 dols. for injuries to the plaintiff's property alleged to be caused and now admitted to have been caused by sparks escaping from one of their locomotive engines while employed in the ordinary use of its railway.

Some questions were raised in the courts below, and to some extent referred to here, whether the judgment could be supported upon the ground of the appellants having been guilty of negligence in their management of the engine or its appliances being defective. No such question is now before their lordships. By arrangement that question has been withdrawn and their lordships are not to be taken as giving any opinion whether there was any evidence of negligence or if there was how that issue ought to be determined.

The serious and important question sought to be raised in this appeal is whether the railway company authorized by statute to carry on their railway undertaking in the place and by the means that they do carry it on are responsible in damages for injury not caused by negligence but by the ordinary and normal use of their railway.

Both courts below have held that in the Province of Quebec the railway company is so responsible, and the question is whether that is the law. The argument appears to be founded on the suggestion that Quebec has a civil law of its own and that in that province all corporations like all other persons are responsible for causing damage to their neighbours by a fault—that is to say, any actionable wrong—whether arising from imprudence or want of skill; and that another article of the code provides that civil corporations constituting by the fact of their incorporation ideal or artificial persons, are as such governed by the laws affecting individuals saving the privileges they enjoy and the disabilities they are subjected to. If the immunity claimed for the appellants were simply claimed upon the ground that they were a corporation without reference to what they are authorized to do in that capacity, the argument would be well founded; but the fallacy of the suggestion in supposing that that immunity is claimed because they are a corporation. If it were so there would be no difference between the law of England and the law as so expounded in the Province of Quebec, but the ground upon which the immunity of a railway company for injury caused by the normal use of their line is based, is that the Legislature which is supreme has authorized the particular thing so done in the place and by the means contemplated by the Legislature, and that cannot constitute an actionable wrong in England any more that it can constitute a fault by the Quebec code. The principle has been lucidly expounded by Lord Hatherley in the case of Geddis v. Proprietors of Bann Reservoir, 3 App. Cas. 430, at p. 438, 26 W. R. Dig. 259, thus: "If a company in the position of the defendants there" (Cracknell v. The Corporation of Thetford, L. R. 4 C. P. 629) "has done nothing but that which the Act authorized—nay, may in a sense be said to have directed—and if the damage which arises therefrom is not owing to any negligence on the part of the company in the mode of executing or carrying into effect the powers given by the Act, then the person who is injuriously affected by that which has been done must either find in the Act of Parliament something which gives him compensation, or he must be content to be deprived of that compensation, because there has been nothing done which is inconsistent with the powers conferred by the Act, and with the proper execution of those powers. I say the proper mode of executing those powers, because it appears to me that it is very neatly and appositely put by FitzGerald, B., in giving his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in this form. FitzGerald, B., says: 'The substantial question raised on the pleadings in the first and second counts of the declaration appears to me to be whether these acts by the defendants were done in a due exercise of their authority, under the local and personal statute which has been mentioned, without negligence.'"

And Lord Cairns, in the case of The Hammersmith Railway Co. v. Brand, 18 W. R. 12, L. R. 4, H. L. 171, at p. 215, points out that it would be a repugnant and absurd piece of legislation to authorize by statute a thing to be done by a railway company, and at the same time leave it to be restrained by injunction from doing the very thing which the Legislature has expressly permitted to be done. Lord Cairns said: "It appears to me that the effect of the legislation on this subject is to take away any right of action on the part of the landowner against the railway company for damage that the landowner has sustained. It must be taken, I think, from the statements in this case that the railway could not be used for the purpose for which it was intended without vibration. It is clear to demonstration that the intention of Parliament was that the railway should be used. If, therefore, it could not be used without vibration, and if vibration necessarily caused damage to the adjacent landowner, and if it was intended to preserve to the adjacent landowner his right of action, the consequences would be that action after action would be maintainable against the railway company for the damage which the landowner sustained; and after some actions had been brought, and had succeeded, the court of Chancery would interfere by injunction, and would prevent the railway being worked—which, of course, is a reductio ad absurdum, and would defeat the intention of the Legislature. I have, therefore, no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that no action would be maintainable against the railway company."

This permission of course does not authorize the thing to be done negligently, or even unnecessarily to cause damage to others. Much was argued by the learned counsel for the respondent as to the peculiar jurisprudence of Quebec, but in truth there is no such difference between the law of England and the law of Quebec in this respect as he seemed to suppose. The law of England equally with the law of the province in question affirms the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas; but the previous state of the law, whether in Quebec or France or England, cannot render inoperative the positive enactment of a statute, and the whole case turns not upon what was the common law of either country, but what is the true construction of plain words authorizing the doing of the very thing complained of. The Legislature is supreme and if it has enacted that a thing is lawful such a thing cannot be a fault or an actionable wrong. The thing to be done is a privilege as well as a right and duty, and it seems to their lordships it comes within the express language of the code (article 356).

But it is said that the Dominion Railway Act itself expressly maintains the liability of railway companies under provincial law for damages caused by their operation, and section 92 is referred to. This may be disposed of in a sentence. That section refers to compensation under the Act and not to damages in an action at all, which is what the question is here.

Section 288 is more plausibly argued to have maintained the liability of the company notwithstanding the statutory permission to use the railway; but if one looks at the heading under which that section is placed and the great variety of provisions which give ample materials for the operation of that section, it would be straining the words unduly to give it a construction which would make it repugnant and authorize in one part of the statute what it made an actionable wrong in another. It would reduce the legislation to an absurdity, and their lordships are of opinion that it cannot be so construed.

Mr. Blake for the appellants having waived their right to recover the damages or costs awarded in Canada to the respondent, their lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the judgment of the King's Bench affirming the judgment of the Superior Court of Quebec ought to be reversed except as to costs. In the exercise of the discretion expressly reserved to their lordships by the Order in Council granting leave to appeal, their lordships direct the appellants to pay the respondent's costs of this appeal.

FOULGER v. ARDING. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant by lessee to pay taxes, rates, and impositions—Expenses of abating nuisance—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 4.

A lease of premises for a term of years contained a covenant by the lessee to "pay and discharge all taxes, rates, including sewers, main drainage assessments, and impositions whatsoever which now are or which at any time or times hereafter during the continuance of the said term hereby granted may be taxed, rated, assessed, charged, or imposed upon or in respect of the said premises, or any part thereof, on the landlord, tenant, or occupier of the same premises by authority of Parliament or otherwise howsoever (landlord's property tax and tithe only excepted)." There was no covenant to repair either by lessor or lessee. During the continuance of the term a notice was served on the lessor, under section 4 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, requiring him to abate a nuisance arising on the premises, and for that purpose to execute certain structural alterations, and he duly complied therewith.

Held, that the lessor was entitled, under the covenant, to recover from the lessee the expenses incurred in complying with the notice.

Decision of the Divisional Court (49 W. R. 442, [1901] 2 K. B. 151) reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance, J.), on the hearing of an appeal from a decision of the deputy-judge of the Wandsworth County Court: 49 W. R. 442, [1901] 2 K. B. 151.

The action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a covenant in a lease.

By an indenture of lease dated the 27th of June, 1892, Sir Henry Doulton demised to Robert Ellwood a house and premises known as Parklands, in the parish of Streatham, for a term of years. By the lease Ellwood covenanted to "pay and discharge all taxes, rates, including sewers, main drainage assessments, and impositions whatsoever, which now are or which at any time or times hereafter during the continuance of the said term hereby granted be taxed, rated, assessed, charged, or imposed upon or in respect of the said premises, or any part thereof, on the landlord, tenant, or occupier of the said premises by authority of Parliament or otherwise howsoever (landlord's property tax and tithe only excepted)." The lease contained no repairing covenant, either by the landlord or the tenant.

By an indenture dated the 1st of April, 1895, Sir Henry Doulton assigned his reversionary interest in Parklands to the plaintiff, and in June, 1896, Ellwood assigned his lease to the defendant.

On the 25th of August, 1900, during the continuance of the term, the sanitary inspector for the parish of Streatham, an officer of the Wandsworth District Board of Works, served on the plaintiff a notice under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 4, sub-section 1, requiring him, as the owner of Parklands, to abate a nuisance arising on the premises from a foul and offensive privy, defective soil-pipe or connections to water-closets, and other defective sanitary arrangements, by removing the old foul and offensive privy, building a proper water-closet, laying a new 4-inch drain, properly ventilated, making good the defects in the soil-pipe or branches, and by executing other works of a like character necessary to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance.

The necessary work was carried out at the cost of £35 by the plaintiff, who then claimed to be repaid that sum by the defendant. The defendant disputed his liability, and the plaintiff brought an action in the county court to recover the sum.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the defendant was liable under his covenant to bear the expense in question.

On appeal the Divisional Court reversed the decision of the county court judge, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal.

COLLINS, M.R.—The cases on this subject have run very fine, but I have come to the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed. I do not propose to go through the cases which have been cited in detail, but I prefer to confine myself to a broad view of the matter.

The question is whether the covenant contained in this lease has the effect of throwing upon the tenant an obligation which, if it had not been for the covenant, might have fallen upon the landlord. The obligation arose under the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 4, and was in respect of the structural condition of the premises demised, which were found to be in such a condition as to let in the powers of the sanitary authority. A notice under the section was sent to the landlord, calling on him to rectify the defect which was found to exist and to carry out certain sanitary arrangements. The landlord did the work himself, and the question is whether the tenant is bound under the covenant to recoup him. The words of the covenant are that the tenant will "pay and discharge all taxes, rates, including sewers, main drainage, assessments, and impositions whatsoever, which now are or which at any time or times hereafter during the continuance of the said term hereby granted be taxed, rated, assessed, charged, or imposed upon or in respect of the said premises, or any part thereof, on the landlord, tenant, or occupier of the same premises by authority of Parliament or otherwise howsoever." I will in the first place point out that certain possible difficulties which might have arisen have been removed. It is now clear on the authorities that a defect which was inherent in the premises at the time of the granting of the lease may be the subject-matter of the obligation thrown on the tenant by such a covenant. And it is also clear that such a covenant may apply to capital charges, such as the cost of structural alterations. If we were unincumbered by authorities, could any one doubt that an obligation imposed on a landlord in respect of a structural defect which he was called upon to remedy was an imposition imposed on the landlord in respect of the premises? It seems to me quite clear that such an obligation comes within the words of the covenant. But, it is said, if the covenant has such a wide meaning as that, how can a line be drawn anywhere? Must not the covenant also cover such a case as that of a house being beyond the building line and there being a consequent obligation to pull it down? In answer to that objection it is contended that a tenant could not by any possibility be supposed to have intended to have undertaken such an obligation as that, and that in a contract between landlord and tenant the parties ought to be supposed to be dealing with such matters as might reasonably be expected to come within the purview of their contract. That seems to me to be a sound argument. In more than one case the word "outgoings" has been used, and has been relied on as being the widest word that could be used. I think the use of that word is open to the same observation. But it is admitted that the cases show that "outgoings" would cover the present case. It was not said in any of the cases that, because the word "outgoings" might possibly cover a wider area than it was sought to bring within it, therefore it did not cover the narrower area which it was sought to bring within it. I cannot say that the word "impositions" is not wide enough, and I see no reason to prevent the court from putting upon the word the meaning which the appellant contends for. It was pointed out that there was no case in which it had been held that the word "impositions" covered such an obligation as the present, and it was contended that not one of the decisions was based on the use of that word. That may be so, but, on the other hand, there is no decision that the word "impositions" cannot cover such an obligation. In my opinion it is wide enough to cover this class of obligation. It seems to me to be reasonable to suppose that the parties had in their contemplation the possibility of such an incident happening as occurred in this case and of such an obligation arising in consequence.

The general current of the authorities is in favour of the view which I am taking. For a long time the cardinal distinction which was generally observed was that which was drawn between Tidswell v. Whitworth and Thompson v. Lapworth—viz., that between an obligation on the landlord personally and an obligation on the landlord in respect of the premises. In the later cases greater emphasis was laid on the presence or absence of particular words in the description of the obligations contained in the covenants. Brett v. Rogers was one of this class of cases, the last being Farlow v. Stevenson. I think it is sufficient for the plaintiff to show that the covenant contains a word apt to describe the quality of the obligation in question, and that a charge has been imposed on him in respect of the premises. I therefore cannot agree with the judgment of the Divisional Court, and I think the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The authorities are, in my judgment, in an unsatisfactory condition. I am sorry that the line taken in Tidswell v. Whitworth was not followed up. But, as the cases now stand, it seems to me that the defendant is liable. If the covenant had contained the words "duties imposed," it is admitted that it would have covered this obligation. I think that a duty imposed is the same thing as an imposition, and that "imposition" is even a larger word than "duty." It ought not to be held to cover anything beyond what could reasonably be supposed to be within the contemplation of the parties; but it seems to me impossible to say that the liability to make a new closet could not have been within the contemplation of the parties. On the contrary, it appears to me that such a liability was within the contemplation of the parties and within the scope of the covenant.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

SACHS v. HENDERSON. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Action founded on tort—Wrongful removal of fixtures after agreement for lease—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.

The plaintiff in his statement of claim alleged that by an agreement in writing he agreed to take and the defendant to grant a lease of a house from a future date, that at the date of the agreement certain fixtures were affixed to and were part of the house, and that after the date of the agreement and before the plaintiff took possession under the lease the defendant wrongfully removed some of the fixtures; and the plaintiff claimed damages. The defendant in his defence (inter alia) brought into court, with a denial of liability, the sum of £20 as sufficient to satisfy the claim. The plaintiff took this sum out in satisfaction, and carried in his bill of costs for taxation.

Held, that the action was founded on tort within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and the plaintiff was entitled to costs on the High Court scale.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of Jelf, J., at chambers, affirming the taxation of the plaintiff's costs on the county court scale.

The statement of claim alleged that by an agreement in writing in October, 1899, contained in certain letters, the plaintiff agreed to take, and the defendant agreed to grant, a lease of a house and premises from the 25th of March, 1900; that at the date of the contract certain fixtures were affixed to and were part and parcel of the said house and premises; that on the 21st of March, 1900, the lease was duly executed and the plaintiff went into possession on the 31st of March, 1900; and that after the date of the contract, but before the plaintiff went into possession, the defendant wrongfully removed certain fixtures; and the plaintiff claimed damages. The defendant in his statement of defence, denied the allegations in the statement of claim, and set up certain other defences; and, further, he brought into court, with a denial of liability, the sum of £20 as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff took the £20 out in satisfaction of his claim, and gave the defendant notice thereof, and carried in his bill of costs for taxation. The master held that the action was founded on contract within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and taxed the costs upon the county court scale.

Jelf, J., at chambers, affirmed the master's decision. The plaintiff appealed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

G. A. Scott, for the plaintiff.—This is an action founded on tort within section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. A vendor in possession after a contract for the sale of land is until completion in the position of a trustee for the purchaser: Clarke v. Ramuz, [1891] 2 Q. B. 456, 40 W. R. Dig. 274. The defendant being in that position tortiously dealt with the property of which he was trustee for the plaintiff by removing the fixtures. That was a tort, and the action was therefore founded on tort. The rule laid down in Turner v. Stallibrass, 46 W. R. 81, [1898] 1 Q. B. 56, is that if the plaintiff, in order to make out a cause of action, must rely on a contract, the action is founded upon contract. That means that if the cause of action arises directly out of a contract, the action is founded on contract. But where it is necessary to prove a contract merely in order to bring about the relation between the parties, the case is different: per Collins, L.J., in Turner v. Stallibrass. It was necessary here to prove the contract for the lease of the house, merely for the purpose of proving the relation between the parties and the position in which they stood towards each other. That relation imposed a duty and the breach of duty arose out of that relation. The action therefore was "founded on tort" within section 116. [He also referred to Pontifex v. Midland Railway Co, 26 W. R. 209, 3 Q. B. D. 23; Kelly v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 43 W. R. 497, [1895] 1 Q. B. 944. He also contended that section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, did not apply as the action was not one which could have been commenced in a county court, the value of the tenement exceeding £50 a year and the title thereto coming in question within section 60; but the arguments upon this point are omitted as the court gave no decision upon it.]

J. K. F. Cleave, for the defendant.—This was an action founded on contract within the rule laid down in Kelly v. Metropolitan Railway Co. and Turner v. Stallibrass. The defendant was the owner of this house and property and he could deal with them as he pleased, subject only to the contract with the plaintiff. Apart from the contract to grant the lease, and as incidental thereto to hand over these fixtures to the plaintiff upon the day of completion, there was no duty upon the defendant to hand them over. The plaintiff must therefore rely upon a breach of contract by the defendant, and the action is founded on contract within section 116.

COLLINS, M.R.—This appeal raises the question whether the action, in which the plaintiff has recovered £20, is an action "founded on tort" within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. If it is, the plaintiff is entitled to costs on the High Court scale. The master and the judge at chambers have both held that the action is founded on contract within the meaning of section 116, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to High Court costs. In my opinion, when the facts are looked at, the action is founded on tort. It has been repeatedly laid down that, in order to determine this question, the substance, and not merely the form of the matter, must be looked at. The question arises in this way: The defendant, in October, 1899, agreed to grant a lease of the house and premises to the plaintiff as from the 25th of March, 1900. After the lease had been executed and the plaintiff had taken possession he found that certain fixtures which were on the premises at the time when he agreed to take the lease had been removed by the defendant. In those circumstances it seems to me that the case is completely covered by the decision of this court in Turner v. Stallibrass. It was there pointed out that, when dealing with breaches of duty, it is not enough, in order to displace the contention that an action is founded on tort, to aver that the duty in the last resort arises out of some contract. In that case the duty arose out of a contract of bailment, but it was held that the action for breach of that duty was founded on tort. It is there pointed out that frequently where a duty arises and is not performed, there is a consensus of mind, antecedent to the breach of duty, which has established the relation between the parties out of which the duty arises. Nevertheless, when once the relationship is established, and the breach of duty arising out of that relationship follows, the action founded on that breach of duty may be an action founded on tort. I agree that the division between tort and contract is not a logical one, but still it is not often difficult to say when a thing is a wrong and when it is a contract. If the plaintiff had brought an action for a breach of a particular stipulation in the contract, clearly the action would have been founded on contract. But where the plaintiff is only bound to refer to the contract in order to show the relation between the parties, and then shows some act of misdoing in connection with what has to be done under the relation so established, that amounts to a tort. That is clear from the railway cases—e.g., Kelly v. Metropolitan Railway Co., where an action is brought by a passenger against a railway company to recover damages for personal injuries caused by their negligence. The relation between the passenger and the railway company is founded upon the contract of carriage, but when there is a breach of duty arising out of that relation, the action based upon that breach of duty is in substance an action founded on tort and not on contract. In the present case there was a duty on the defendant arising out of the relation between him and the plaintiff created by the agreement to grant a lease, not to take away from the subject-matter of agreement anything included therein. Any reasonable man would call a breach of that duty a wrong. The allegation is that the defendant took advantage of being in possession to subtract something from what he had agreed to let. That is clearly a tort. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. These somewhat puzzling questions must be dealt with from the point of view of substance and not of form. The form of the pleadings is not the decisive test. The question is whether the action is or is not in substance an action for breach of contract or an action of tort. Applying that test, it seems to me that the present action is substantially founded on tort. The allegation is that the defendant, having agreed to grant a lease of certain premises, including the fixtures therein, took away some of the fixtures without telling the plaintiff of it, and the plaintiff executed the lease under the impression that the fixtures were still there. In my opinion that is a tort. The defendant by the agreement undertook an obligation towards the plaintiff to use reasonable care in the protection of the property, the subject of the agreement. If the defendant had been guilty of want of reasonable care, he would have been guilty of negligence—that is to say, a tort, and would have been liable to the plaintiff; yet it is said that because the defendant went further and was guilty of a wilful wrong by removing the fixtures, the action to recover damages for that wrong in not an action founded on tort. I do not agree. I think that the appeal should be allowed.

HUSEY v. LONDON ELECTRIC SUPPLY CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Electric Lighting Acts—Arrears due to electric supply corporation—Receiver—Occupier—Electric Lighting Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 56), s. 19—Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 178), Schedule, clause 47.

A hotel company contracted with an electric lighting company for a supply of electricity to the hotel. A receiver and manager was appointed of the property of the hotel company by an order in a debenture-holders' action. The receiver entered into possession of the premises. At the time the receiver entered into possession the hotel company was indebted to the electric lighting company for electricity supplied, and the latter company threatened to discontinue the supply unless the arrears due to them were paid. The receiver brought an action for an injunction to restrain the company from cutting off the supply.

Held, that, assuming in the receiver's favour that he was a new occupier of the premises, still he had no right to a supply under the Electric Lighting Acts till he had entered into a new contract with the electric lighting company, and that the motive of the electric lighting company in demanding a contract could not affect their statutory rights. On the other hand, if he claimed under the contract with the hotel company he was bound to discharge the arrears.

The injunction was accordingly refused.

This was an appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., granting an injunction.

The facts were as follow:

A company called the St. Ermin's Hotel Co. entered into a contract with the defendants, the Electric Supply Corporation, for the supply of electricity to the hotel.

The company had issued debentures, and in a debenture-holders' action the debenture-holders obtained an order for the appointment of a receiver and a manager.

The receiver was Mr. Husey, the plaintiff. Mr. Husey, having gone into possession of the hotel, desired to have a continuance of the supply of electricity. At the moment when he went into possession there was due from the hotel company to the London Electric Supply Corporation a sum of £437 for electric energy supplied. Mr. Husey was not prepared to enter into any fresh contract himself; on the contrary, at this time he never said anything upon the hypothesis that the contract with the St. Ermin's Hotel Co. had come to an end. All he did was to intimate his desire for the electric light to be continued to be supplied after he had been appointed receiver.

The defendants were not willing to supply the electricity under the old contract unless some provision was made for the discharge of the debt which was due for the previous supply, and their secretary submitted to the receiver a draft which they invited the receiver to sign if he wished the supply of electric light to be continued. It ran thus: "I, the receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery in the above matter, hereby personally undertake and promise that your account for electric energy supplied to the above which is at present outstanding and amounts to £437 2s. shall be paid within twenty-eight days from the date hereof and that accounts for supply of electric energy subsequent to the 18th inst. shall be paid weekly during the tenure of my receivership." This draft was dated "this 9th day of January, 1902." The receiver was not willing to sign, and the company proposed under those circumstances to cut off the supply of electricity.

The receiver thereupon issued the writ in this action in which he claimed to have the Electric Supply Corporation restrained from cutting off the electricity.

Kekewich, J., granted an injunction subject to certain undertakings which were to be given by the plaintiff in the following terms: "And the plaintiff, Ernest Innis Husey, by his counsel undertaking to make such necessary application and enter into a new contract as required by section 47 of the provisional order scheduled to the Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 178). And the plaintiff by his counsel undertaking to abide by any order this court may hereafter think fit to make as to damages in case the court shall be of opinion that the defendants shall have sustained any by reason of this order which the plaintiff ought to pay, this court doth order that the defendants, the London Electric Supply Corporation (Limited), be restrained, until such undertaking to make such application aforesaid be complied with, from cutting off or discontinuing the supply of electric current from their mains to the premises known as St. Ermin's Hotel, Victoria-street, in the city of Westminster."

The defendants appealed.

By the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, s. 19: "When a supply of electricity is provided in any part of an area for private purposes, then, except in so far as is otherwise provided by the terms of the licence, order, or special Act authorizing such supply, every company or person within that part of the area shall, on application, be entitled to a supply on the same terms on which any other company or person in such part of the area is entitled under similar circumstances to a corresponding supply."

By section 21: "If any local authority, company, or person neglect to pay any charge for electricity or any other sum due from them to the undertakers in respect of the supply of electricity to such local authority, company, or person, the undertakers may cut off such supply, and for that purpose may cut or disconnect any electric line or other work through which electricity may be supplied, and may, until such charge or other sum, together with any expenses incurred by the undertakers in cutting off such supply of electricity as aforesaid, are fully paid, but no longer, discontinue the supply of electricity to such local authority, company, or person."

By the Electric Lighting Order Confirmation (No. 2) Act, 1889, a provisional order granted by the Board of Trade to the defendants in that year was confirmed. Clause 47 of that order provided that the undertakers (the defendants) should "upon being required to do so by the owner or occupier of any premises situate within fifty yards from any distributing main of the undertakers . . . give and continue to give a supply of energy for such premises in accordance with the provisions of this order . . . subject to the conditions following" (inter alia): "Every owner or occupier of premises requiring a supply of energy shall 'serve a notice upon the undertakers specifying the premises in respect of which such supply is required,' the maximum power required, and the day on which the supply is required to commence, and 'enter into a written contract with the undertakers (if required by them so to do) to continue and receive and pay for a supply of energy for a period of at least two years of such an amount that the payment to be made for the same, at the rate of charge for the time being charged by the undertakers for a supply of energy to ordinary consumers within the area of supply, shall not be less than 20 per cent. per annum on the outlay incurred by the undertakers in providing any electric lines required under this section to be provided by them for the purpose of such supply,' and give to the undertakers, if required by them, security for payment. If, after notice by the undertakers, security is not given by the owner or occupier within seven days, or if the security given becomes invalid or insufficient, the undertakers may, if they think fit, discontinue to supply energy for such premises so long as such failure continues."

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendants.—The plaintiff gets his right to a supply of electricity either under the old contract, in which case he must pay the arrears due to the defendants, or he must make a fresh application to the defendants as a new occupier of the premises, in which case the defendants can cut off the supply till he does so.

They referred to Paterson v. Gas Light and Coke Co., 45 W. R. 39, [1896] 2 Ch. 476; In re Marriage, Neave, & Co., 45 W. R. 42, [1896] 2 Ch. 663.

Warrington, K.C., and Mitchell, for the plaintiff.—Under section 19 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, the plaintiff is entitled to a supply of electricity on the same terms as any other person within the area. On the true construction of section 21 the defendants are not entitled to cut off the supply on default in payment except when the defaulter continues to be the person to whom the supply is given. This provision in the Electric Lighting Act differs from the similar provision in the Gas Acts, under which a gas company can cut off the supply from the premises. Under the Electric Lighting Acts a company has no right to refuse to supply an occupier of premises because a previous occupier has made default. Payment of arrears is nowhere made a condition of continuing the supply. The contract required by clause 47 of the Electric Lighting Confirmation Act is only required in cases where no supply is being given at all. In the present case the receiver is, having regard to the terms of the order appointing him, an occupier of these premises. The case of Paterson v. Gas Light and Coke Co. does not therefore apply. The defendants here have never offered to supply the plaintiff on his entering into a contract with them, but on the contrary have refused to do so unless the arrears due from the St. Ermin's Hotel Co. are paid. Their conduct relieves the plaintiff from the necessity of making any further application.

The following cases were referred to: In re Smith, 41 W. R. 159, [1893] 1 Q. B. 323; In re Flack, 48 W. R. 446, [1900] 2 Q. B. 32; Richards v. Overseers of Kidderminster, 44 W. R. 505, [1896] 2 Ch. 212.

Austen Carmell replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L J., stated the facts and continued: From the indorsement on the writ issued by the receiver it is obvious that the claim was made upon the basis that the contract between the Electric Supply Corporation and the St. Ermin's Mansions Proprietary (Limited) was still a subsisting contract. But when the case came before Kekewich, J., the receiver took up an alternative sort of position—namely, that the occupation by the limited company had come to an end and that there was a new occupation by him. Now I shall assume that this latter contention was right, and I think that this is the contention which puts the receiver in the best position. I assume that there was a new occupation by him; that the occupation by the Mansions Proprietary (Limited) had come to an end, and he was a new occupier. If that is so, in my judgment the receiver was not entitled to any supply of electric lighting unless and until he made a new contract with the Electric Supply Corporation. On the other hand, if one is to suppose that the old contract with the Mansions Proprietary (Limited) continued, and that the supply was to continue under that old contract, there can be no doubt that the Electric Supply Corporation were entitled to cut off the electricity because of the default that had been made and not discharged under the contract between the corporation and the Mansions Proprietary (Limited), for the past supply of electric energy.

Under these circumstances it seems to me whichever way you put it, it was not right to grant this injunction restraining the Electric Supply Corporation from cutting off the supply. I think that, whether one looks at it on the assumption that the old contract continued, or whether one looks at it on the assumption that there was a change of occupation, in neither case ought the Electric Supply Corporation to have been restrained. We have had a long argument to-day as to whether or not the 47th section of the Confirmation Act applies to anything else than the first contract for the supply of electric energy. It is said that certain clauses, especially the clauses contained in the first and second conditions for the contract, do not apply to any case but a case where there is for the first time a supply of electric energy. And it is said that those clauses have no application to a case in which there is an existing supply of electric energy and the connections have been made by the company under a previous contract. I do not propose to decide how that may be. I think there are a great many cogent reasons which might be urged to show that the 47th section is a section of general application. I cannot, however, shut my eyes to the fact that there are some arguments which were most forcibly urged by Mr. Warrington to the contrary. But I do not think that one need decide that question at all. According to my view, whether the 47th section applies to other than the first supply of electricity or not, it is plain that under the Act of 1882 no one is entitled to demand a supply of electric energy unless and until he has made a contract with the undertakers, who have the authority to supply the electric energy. The basis of the general Act of 1882 is that persons requiring a supply shall be entitled to contract for the same providing that the undertakers shall not charge a price exceeding the limits imposed by the licence, order, or special Act authorizing the undertakers to supply electricity, and provided also that the undertakers show no preference, and that really is effectively provided for in the 19th section, the effect of which is that every person shall be entitled to a supply of electric energy on the same terms upon which any other person under similar circumstances is entitled to a corresponding supply. But that is only a provision which assumes that there is already a contract fixing the terms of supply as between the corporation and some other persons who are supplied. Then the Act of Parliament says in effect that any other person who wishes for a supply under similar circumstances is to have a right to insist upon having a similar contract. But all that assumes that there will be a contract, and section 20, which is the section which provides for the limit in prices, also is a section drawn upon the basis that there is to be a contract. Section 20 is "The undertakers shall not in making any agreements for a supply of electricity show any undue preference to any local authority, company, or person, but save as aforesaid they may make such charges and supply the electricity that may be agreed upon, not exceeding the limits of price imposed by or in pursuance of the licence, order, or special Act licensing the supply of electricity." The outcome of all this, in my judgment, is shortly this, that the receiver here is not entitled to any supply of electricity unless and until he has made a contract for that supply. He has not made that contract, and as long as he has not made that contract he is not entitled to have the Electric Supply Corporation restrained from cutting off the electricity. As I have already said, if the receiver is not the occupier—if there has been no change of occupation—and the Proprietary Mansions (Limited) are still in occupation, then a fortiori the Electric Supply Corporation ought not to be restrained.

I only wish to add one word upon a point that has been urged upon us in respect of the purpose which it is said the Electric Supply Corporation have here in insisting in cutting off unless and until a contract is made. It is said that their real object is not to get a contract, but to compel the receiver for the debenture-holders to pay this £400—the whole account for electricity supplied—which the debenture-holders are not really liable to pay. I do not know whether that is the object or not, but I will assume that it is part of the object. But even so the Electric Supply Corporation have a right to say, "We will cut off the supply of electric energy until a new contract is made." If the debenture-holders would sooner pay the old account than keep the the hotel or mansions in darkness for a few days, so much the better for the Electric Supply Corporation; they have a perfect right to exercise any rights that they have, and not the less a right to enforce their rights because by so doing they will be likely to get collateral advantage. I cannot say at this present moment whether the Proprietary Mansions (Limited) would prefer to remain in darkness for a week or with only candles or something of that sort, but it seems to me that the question of what the ultimate purpose of the Electric Supply Corporation may be has really nothing to do with the abstract question of law that we have to decide here. It has been said that one can have no sympathy with the Electric Supply Corporation who are putting the screw on in this way. I do not say that that is not so, but it is not necessary to have sympathy for a corporation because a corporation never has sympathy for anyone else.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I shall only say a very few words. This action is based on the infringement of a legal right. The injunction which has been granted is not sought on any equitable ground, but simply because it is contended by the plaintiff that the defendants threaten and intend to violate a legal right of the plaintiff—viz., the continuous supply of electric light to the St. Ermin's Mansions. In order therefore to obtain an injunction he must show a legal right to that supply. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] Now, the limited company, who were the owners of the hotel, have made a serious default, and a large sum is due in respect of the electric supply from them. The stipulation in this contract, if the receiver adopts it, would be binding as against him, but he objects to pay the arrears and therefore naturally he will have nothing to do with this contract. It is not for me to say, and I do not express an opinion one way or the other, whether he can be compelled to adopt that contract or can only get a supply by entering into another and fresh agreement. But if he does not choose to avail himself of that contract the only other way in which he can get a supply is by virtue of his being occupier of the hotel. Now, his title to that arises either under the Electric Lighting Order Confirmation Act of 1889 or under the general provisions of the Electric Lighting Act of 1882, and the learned counsel for the plaintiff rather relied, I think, upon the provisions of the Electric Lighting Order Confirmation Act of 1889, s. 47. That begins by imposing an obligation on the electric lighting company which I shall read very shortly: "The undertakers shall, upon being required to do so by the owner or occupier of any premises (within certain limits which I need not mention), give and continue to give a supply of energy for such premises in accordance with the provisions of this order." Therefore that imposes the duty of giving and continuing to give a supply of energy when required so to do by the owner or occupier of any premises, but such supply is to be given and continued in accordance with the provisions of the order. Now that extends, I suppose, to every owner and occupier within the defined limits. The subsequent portion of the section imposes obligations upon the owner and occupier. The second part of it begins: "Every owner or occupier of premises requiring a supply of energy shall do certain things." The language as far as I have read it is as extensive as that which is used with reference to owners and occupiers in the preceding portion of the order, and it seems to me that primâ facie the meaning must be taken to be that every owner or occupier who desires to avail himself of the provisions in the earlier part of the order and to seek a supply from the undertakers is on his part to comply with the directions which are given in the subsequent portions of the order. These require him to serve a notice upon the undertakers specifying the premises in respect of which such supply is required, and the maximum power required and so forth, and to enter into a written contract.

Now I quite agree that notwithstanding the wide language which was used it may be that the terms of the section and the nature of the obligations imposed show that it is to receive a narrower interpretation, and it is said that in part at least the language as to some of the obligations which are there imposed does show that it did not apply to owners or occupiers who were not requiring supply for the first time, or at all events to occupiers who became such at the time when there was an existing supply to the premises. I do not think it is necessary for me on this occasion to do more than to say that I am not satisfied that that limitation exists. And notwithstanding the points which were very forcibly put both by Mr. Warrington and Mr. Mitchell, I remain as at present advised of the opinion that every owner or occupier must fulfil the conditions imposed by section 47 of this order, but if I am wrong in that then I agree entirely with what Vaughan Williams, L.J., has said as to the effect of section 19 of the Act of 1882; and quacunque via, I am of opinion that the occupier is not entitled as of right to a supply of electric light until he enters into a contract with the corporation. The plaintiff does not profess to have entered into any such contract, and therefore it seems to me that there is no ground for the injunction. I will only add this, that if, as I think, the defendants had the right which they insist upon, of cutting off the electric light, the court has no jurisdiction to interfere with them simply because they may do it for the motive which is suggested. It has been held by the House of Lords in a well-known case that even the existence of malice does not prevent a person exercising his legal right or found a right for an injunction against such person. Here the facts fall very short of that, and it seems to me therefore that there is no foundation for the granting of the injunction which has been granted by Kekewich, J.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The injunction which has been granted can only be justified on the ground of a breach or a threatened breach of some contract between the plaintiff and the defendants or on the ground of a breach of some statutory duty imposed upon the defendants in favour of the plaintiff. Now, there is one contract in existence which has been called the old contract—that is, the contract between the Electric Supply Corporation and the hotel company. That is a contract upon which the plaintiff here does not rely for the best possible reason, that under the express terms of that contract the Electric Supply Corporation has the right to cut off the supply by reason of the non-payment of the arrears due. No new contract is even alleged by the plaintiff, but it is suggested—at least this is how I understand it to be put—that there is a breach of some statutory duty which entitles the plaintiff to relief by way of injunction. I assume, without in any way deciding, that the plaintiff in this case—the receiver in the debenture-holders' action—is by virtue of the form of the order appointing him to be deemed an occupier of these premises. If he is not an occupier, then it seems to me to be plain that there is no statutory duty towards him. But if he is an occupier, and treating him on that footing I cannot find anything in the statutes which entitles a person from the mere fact of being in occupation of premises which have been supplied with the electric light to say "You must continue this supply between you and me, and in fact you are bound to continue it for at least seven days without any security—without any right whatever on my part." Now I prefer to base my view rather, as Vaughan Williams, L.J., has done, upon the Act of 1882, s. 19. I think section 19 contemplates an arrangement or a contract between the occupier and the company, and then the words "entitled to a supply" mean entitled to a supply under and by virtue of a contract made between the occupier and the company. The terms of supply may vary. There is a maximum, and there is a clause in the Act which prevents undue preference. But within those limits it is left to the electric light company to make such bargains as it may think fit with individual customers who apply to them for a supply of electric light. This seems to me really to have been the view taken by Buckley, J., in Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. (Limited) v. Ginder, 49 W. R. 508, [1901] 2 Ch. 799, which has been referred to from which I will only read one passage at p. 810. He says: "Under section 19 every person within such area as this is entitled to a supply upon the same terms on which any other person in the area is entitled under similar circumstances to a corresponding supply." Now that expression "person entitled" means, I think, entitled by arrangement made between him and the company. No such arrangements have been made here, no such contract is alleged now to exist between the plaintiff and the company. I think that for these reasons the injunction granted by Kekewich, J., ought to be discharged.

FLETCHER v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Railway company—Mine owner—Possession of mines—Interest upon purchase-money—Construction of private Act of Parliament—"Losses."

A railway company, owners of a canal, were empowered by a private Act of Parliament to give notice to adjacent mine owners not to work their mines within a prescribed distance of the canal. Upon such a notice being given the company were to purchase the mines affected by the notice, the amount of purchase-money and compensation was to be settled by arbitration, and the compensation was to include "all such additional expenses and losses" as should be incurred by the mine owner by the minerals being left for the support of the canal. In 1892 the company gave a notice under the Act to a mine owner. The amount of the purchase-money and compensation was settled by arbitration in 1901, and was subsequently paid by the company without prejudice to the question of the right of the mine owner to interest.

Held, that the mine owner was not entitled to interest under the Act as an "additional loss."

But, held, that the company were in possession or enjoyment of the mines in question from the date of their notice, and that upon the general principles of equity as between vendor and purchaser the mine owner was entitled to interest at 4 per cent. upon the purchase-money as from that date.

Action.

This was an action to recover interest upon the purchase-money or compensation payable by the defendant company, under a private Act of Parliament, for certain mines and minerals which they had given notice to the plaintiffs not to work.

The plaintiffs were the administators of the estate of one Herbert Fletcher, in whom, at the date of the Act, were vested certain mines and minerals lying under or adjacent to the Manchester, Bolton, and Bury Canal, and who was then engaged in working them. The defendants were the owners of the canal.

By the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway (Various Powers) Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. clxxvi.), it was provided by section 53, with regard to these mines and minerals, that when the mine owner should get within a prescribed distance of the canal he should give two months' written notice to the defendant company of his intention to proceed with the working of the mines, and that within such period of two months he should not continue to work within the prescribed distance.

Section 55, after giving the company, upon receipt of this notice, power to inspect the mines, proceeded: "If the company be willing to purchase and make compensation for such bed, vein, or seam within the prescribed distance or any part thereof to the mine owner, and shall give notice in writing to that effect to such mine owner, then the said bed, vein, or seam within the prescribed distance, or such part thereof as the company may desire to be left, shall not be wrought or gotten, but shall be purchased and paid for by the company; and if the company and mine owner do not agree as to the amount of such purchase-money and compensation, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided for by the Arbitration Act, 1889, or any subsisting statutory modification thereof. Such compensation shall include in addition to the value of the bed, seam, or vein so purchased, all such additional expenses and losses as shall be incurred by the mine owner by reason of the leaving of minerals for the support, security, or preservation of the canal . . . or for the continuous working of the said mines being interrupted."

By section 62 the mines and minerals paid or compensated for were to vest in and belong to the defendant company, and to remain for ever unworked.

The Act was passed in June, 1892, and Mr. Fletcher, who was at the time working within the prescribed distance, in July, 1892, gave notice to the company of that fact, under section 53.

On the 19th of November, 1892, the defendant company gave Mr. Fletcher notice in writing under section 55 that they were willing to purchase and make compensation to him for so much of the mines therein specified as remained unworked, and such further compensation as he might be entitled to under the Act, and that that part of the mines must not be wrought or gotten.

Mr. Fletcher died in December, 1895. His administrators and the company not being able to agree upon the amount of the purchase-money and compensation, the matter was referred to an arbitrator, who in April, 1901, awarded the sum of £16,565 as the amount payable by the defendant company, and that if as a matter of law interest was payable it should be paid as simple interest at 4 per cent. per annum from the 19th of November, 1892, until the actual payment.

On the 20th of December, 1901, the defendant company paid this sum to the plaintiffs without prejudice to the question as to whether interest also was payable. The plaintiffs now claimed a declaration that they were entitled to be paid interest upon the above sum from the 19th of November, 1892, to the 20th of December, 1901, at 4 per cent. per annum.

Astbury, K.C., and O. L. Clare, for the plaintiffs.—The railway company have been in possession of the mines since the 19th of November, 1892, and not having paid the purchase-money till 1901 must pay interest at 4 per cent. upon it: In re Piggott and the Great Western Railway Co., 29 W. R. 727, 18 Ch. D. 146; Rhys v. Dare Valley Railway Co., 23 W. R. 23, L. R. 19 Eq. 93; In re Shaw and the Corporation of Birmingham, 33 W. R. 74. 27 Ch. D. 614. The plaintiffs are also entitled to interest under section 55 as being an "additional loss" incurred by the mine owner.

Littler, K.C., H. Terrell, K.C., and A. M. L. Langdon, for the defendant company.—The amount of the purchase-money was not ascertained until the award, and at any rate no interest is payable till then: Caledonian Railway Co. v. Carmichael, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 56. And interest cannot be given as "losses"; London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. v. South-Eastern Railway Co, [1893] A. C. 429.

BUCKLEY, J.—Directly the company gave the notice of the 19th of November, 1892, the mine owner ceased to enjoy the seam of coal in the only way in which it could be enjoyed, and the company became liable to pay compensation. It is argued for the plaintiffs that they can get interest on the purchase-money under section 55. In my opinion that contention is not well founded. Interest upon purchase-money is not a loss incurred by reason of the leaving of the minerals, or of the continuous working of the mines being interrupted. There might be a loss from those things, and it might be equal to, or greater than, or less than the interest, but it is a totally different thing. If coal was at a very high price, the owner might sustain a very serious loss from being precluded from working it. If the coal was at a ruinous price to the colliery owner, he might sustain no loss from being so precluded. These two things are not comparable. I do not think that there are any words in section 55 which include under compensation (which is compensation for the seam of coal) interest which measures the loss the man sustains by not being paid the purchase price for the seam of coal.

But the question remains, what are the rights of the plaintiff under the general law? The principle laid down in Birch v. Joy, 3 H. L. Cas. 565, is, I think, plain, and has been daily acted upon. When there arises such a state of things between vendor and purchaser as that the purchaser becomes entitled in equity to the thing purchased, and to the receipt of the rents if there be such, or to the enjoyment of the thing purchased, there arises in equity a correlative right on the vendor to have interest upon his purchase-money. That general principle has been frequently acted upon since. The case of Rhys v. The Dare Valley Railway Co. is a fair instance of its application in the case of a railway company. There the right to interest was from the date of the railway company taking possession of the land. You have always to see whether one party has acquired enjoyment of the property and the other party has not acquired the purchase-money. Now what is the possession of a subterranean seam of coal. The railway company did not want to dig it; they wanted it for the support of their canal. On the other hand, the mine owner wanted to dig it; that was his way of enjoying it. Now from the 19th of November, 1892, the railway company had the enjoyment of the coal by way of support. So far as you can have possession of such a thing, they had possession of it. The possession at that date was changed under sections 53 and 55 of the Act. The mine owner could not go there. That is to say, from the 19th of November, 1892, the railway company, who were the purchasers, have enjoyed those mines, and the mine owner, who was the vendor, has not enjoyed them, and consequently the railway company have been in the possession, the occupation, or the enjoyment, or whatever you like to call it, of both the land and the purchase-money. I think, therefore, they ought to pay interest at 4 per cent. upon the purchase-money during that period. The case of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Carmichael seems to me a different case. Sir Thomas Carmichael did not take steps to ascertain the sum to be paid, or ask for payment of it, and in that case the ordinary rule applied that a debt does not carry interest except under contract or after notice given under the statute.

Vendor summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874.

The contract was by correspondence for the sale of a leasehold house held at a ground-rent of £7 per annum for £365.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the considered judgment.

Eve, K.C., and Edward Ford, for the vendor.

W. M. Spence, for the purchaser.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—On the 22nd of June, 1901, Alfred J. Bird wrote to William Highett offering £350 for the leasehold house, 142, Friern-road, East Dulwich, held for an unexpired term of about eighty years, at a ground-rent of £7 per annum, and stating that the present tenants informed him that their tenancy agreement expired the 25th of March, 1902. On the 24th of June, 1901, William Highett wrote that the lowest possible price he could take was £365. On the 25th of June Alfred J. Bird increased his offer to £360, adding, "I shall be glad to hear that you will accept this, as no doubt you are aware that the house requires sundry repairs." This offer was declined, but on the 1st of July, 1901, Bird agreed to purchase for £365. No date was then fixed for completion of the purchase. On the 28th of August, 1901, the parties agreed that the purchase should be completed on the 27th of September, 1901, the purchaser stipulating, however, that he was to be at liberty to complete at any earlier date.

On the evening of the same day, the 27th of September, 1901, the tenant of the house brought to his landlord, the vendor, a notice in writing, dated the previous day, which had been left on the premises and signed on behalf of the London County Council, requiring the owner and occupier of the structure known as 142, Friern-road forthwith to take down, underpin, or otherwise render secure the front bay; also to shore up the structure immediately. The notice was not complied with, and on the 1st of November, 1901, an order was made by the Lambeth police-court, under the London Building Acts, requiring the owner of the structure to take down or underpin or otherwise render secure the front bay, to the satisfaction of the district surveyor, within fourteen days from the service of the order. A copy of that order was served on the vendor's solicitor, Mr. Bartlett, on or about the 8th of November, 1901, and on the vendor on or about the 9th of November, 1901.

The question raised by this summons issued by the vendor under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, was (paragraph 3)—by whom are the costs of complying with this order to be borne, by the vendor or the purchaser?

It was not disputed that in the absence of any stipulation on the subject, the vendor must bear all expenses and outgoings of property sold, down to the time when a good title was first shown, so that the purchaser could prudently take possession, and as from that time that all such expenses and outgoings must be borne by the purchaser. This is settled law: Barsht v. Tagg, 48 W. R. 220, [1900] 1 Ch. 231, at p. 234.

On the 6th of November, 1901, the last outstanding requisition was cleared up. Mr. Bartlett, the vendor's solicitor, wrote to the purchaser's solicitor on that day. that the tenant of 142, Friern-road would leave at Lady-day, 1902, and this answer was accepted as sufficient notwithstanding the previous answer on the 14th of September, 1901, that the tenant had taken the premises for three years from the 24th of June, 1899. The governing date showing the dividing line by which the rights and liabilities of the parties are to be determined is the 6th of November, 1901.

It has been contended before me by the vendor that the cost of complying with the order of the Lambeth police-court must be borne by the purchaser, and that the purchaser is bound to indemnify the vendor against the expense. This contention was based upon the fact that the fourteen days within which the work was ordered to be done did not begin to run until after the 6th of November, 1901, and therefore that the vendor was not in default. Reliance was placed upon Tubbs v. Wynne, [1897] 1 Q. B. 74, 45 W. R. Dig. 168. In that case an order had been made to pull down dangerous buildings, and the twenty-eight days allowed for doing the work were on the point of expiring on the 8th of May, 1893, the date down to which the vendor agreed by the contract to discharge the outgoings. At the trial before Collins, J., it was held that the liability, having been incurred before the 8th of May, was an "outgoing" within the meaning of the condition, that the purchaser, having paid the amount, was entitled to recover from the vendor the sum so paid. The vendor relied upon that case in his favour, and contended that as the order to execute the work had not in the present case been served on the 6th of November, 1901, the cost of the necessary work was not an outgoing to be borne by him, but that the expenses incurred arose after the 6th of November, 1901, and therefore must be borne by the purchaser. He insisted, moreover, that the expenses of the works did not become a charge upon the property until the completion of the work.

This argument does not touch the principle upon which, in my judgment, the present case falls to be decided. The sale is of a leasehold house, the lease containing a covenant to keep the buildings in good and substantial repair and condition. The sale is under an open contract so that the purchaser is entitled to proof that the covenants and conditions in the lease have been performed and observed up to the 6th of November, 1901. Under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 3, sub-section 4, upon production of the receipt for the last payment due for rent, the purchaser is to assume unless the contrary appears that all the covenants of the lease have been duly performed up to actual completion. But in the present case the contrary does clearly appear. There is no dispute that on the 6th of November, 1901, the covenant before mentioned had been broken and that a portion of the buildings was so much out of repair as to be dangerous and to justify the action taken by the London County Council.

The vendor contended that although the premises were out of repair the purchaser had notice of their state and condition before entering into the contract. The result of the evidence is that the purchaser did inspect the premises before agreeing to purchase, and saw some cracks there, but that they afterwards increased to such an extent that the premises became in a dangerous condition by the 21st of September, 1901, and remained so until after the 6th of November, 1901. The knowledge of the purchaser of the state of the property at the date of the contract does not, however, appear to me to be material, as it has been held that the obligation to make a good title to leaseholds is not removed by the knowledge of the purchaser at the time of the sale that the title was bad by reason of the breach of a covenant to repair: Barnett v. Wheeler, 7 M. & W. 364. The vendor then insisted that the purchaser could not object to the breaches of covenant as the receipt for the ground-rent had been produced, and he relied upon the cases of Bull v. Hutchens, 11 W. R. 366, 32 Beav. 615, and Lawrie v. Lees, 30 W. R. 185, 7 App. Cas. 19, at p. 32, but in both those cases the purchaser was bound by the condition of the contract to accept the last receipt for rent as conclusive evidence that the covenants had been performed, whereas under the Conveyancing Act the receipt is only primâ facie evidence, and when the contrary appears the receipt cannot be relied upon. The result is that as between vendor and purchaser of this leasehold house I decide that the expense referred to in paragraph 3 of the summons in respect of which the vendor is clearly liable under the covenant in the lease must be borne by the vendor and cannot be thrown by him upon the purchaser.

With regard to the cost of the summons, I am satisfied that they have been much increased by the purchaser's denying any knowledge of cracks at the date of the purchase or of the state of the bay window. I think it clear that some cracks had then arisen, and that the state of the bay window was to some extent defective. Indeed, in the November previous, Alfred Bate, the builder, had cased the windows by reason of the settlement of the bay, and I arrive at the conclusion that Filmer, the tenant, did point out the condition of the premises to the purchaser, as Filmer states. It would not be right to throw these costs upon the vendor. Justice will be done if I order the taxation of the purchaser's costs of the summons, and order the vendor to pay one-half of the amount.

In re CROMPTON'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark—Registration—Rectification—Combination mark—Sufficiency of description—Double registration—"User"—Registration too wide—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64.

Where a trade-mark consists of a number of labels, and the labels themselves appear on the register, the description of the essential particular as a "combination of devices" is sufficient.

Where a mark essentially the same as a prior registered mark belonging to the same person has been put on the register, it will not be expunged at the instance of a rival trader.

In re Player & Sons' Trade-Mark, [1901] 1 Ch. 382, 49 W. R. Dig. 176, distinguished.

A trade-mark may consist of several pieces, all of which need not be simultaneously visible.

The fact that a mark is registered for the whole of a class, and is only used for part of the class, is not a ground for expunging it from the register.

Motion.

This was a motion by Messrs. Grandage & Co. to rectify the register of trade-marks by removing therefrom the trade-mark of Messrs. A. & A. Crompton & Co. (Limited), No. 107,354, in class 23, cotton yarn and sewing cotton.

An action was pending in which Messrs. Crompton, who are cotton spinners, were seeking to restrain Messrs. Grandage from infringing the plaintiffs' registered trade-mark, and from passing off yarn sold or exported by the defendants as and for the plaintiffs' yarn.

The mark in question was registered on the 10th of January, 1894. The essential particular was described as "a combination of devices," and the applicants disclaimed any right to the exclusive use of the added matters, except so far as the same consisted of their own name and address.

There appear upon the register in respect of this mark three labels of different sizes; their description as stated by the judge, is as follows: "The largest size label consists of an oblong border with a statement in nine different languages descriptive of the quantity and weight of yarn; the medium size label consists of an oblong border in which are two shields, charged with devices, surmounted by crests, with leaves, flowers, and a scroll, and the name of the respondents (Messrs. Crompton) impressed by perforation. The smallest size label is the same as the medium size, but without the perforated name."

D. M. Kerly (O. L. Clare with him), for Messrs. Grandage.—The trade-mark application is bad because it contains no sufficient description of the essential particulars within section 64; it does not say what the devices are, or how they are combined. There are also none of the essential particulars required by the section. The large label is merely descriptive matter, and therefore the only device is that contained in the two smaller labels; that is protected by a previous registration and cannot be again registered: In re Player's Trade-Mark, [1901] 1 Ch. 382, 49 W. R. Dig. 176. A trade-mark cannot be registered in three pieces, between which there is no physical connection and one of which is not seen until the goods are opened. Intention to use as a trade-mark is essential: Batt v. Dunnett, [1899] A. C. 428. The part of this mark which is placed inside the package is not used as a trade-mark: In re Kinahan's Trade-Mark, 10 Rep. Pat. Cas. 393. The registration is for the whole of class 23; it is not applicable to sewing cotton, and is, therefore, too wide.

He also referred to Baker v. Rawson, 45 Ch. D. 519.

Sebastian, for Messrs. Crompton.—The form of claim is sufficient; it is in common use and was that suggested by the comptroller. The mark as a whole is to be protected. The combination of devices consists of the double sets of arms, the scrolls and floral matter, the perforation, and the rectangular shape of the three labels. I do not claim to protect the large label separately, but it is part of the trade-mark, though not part of the essential particulars; it is equivalent to the disclaimed matter in Hubbuck v. Brown, 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 638, where Lord Alverstone said that the whole combination was to be protected. In the present case the combination of the three labels together with the perforation is quite different from the small mark previously registered. Registration in several pieces, even though one piece is concealed, is no objection. Anyone who has been accustomed to see the two outside marks would not be content until he had seen the third one inside. Old marks must be registered as a whole; what is compulsory in respect of old marks must be at least admissible in respect of new marks: In re Spencer's Trade-Marks, 3 Rep. Pat. Cas. 73, 34 W. R. Dig. 200. Concealment of part of the mark is no objection. Marks on the inside of corks have been protected (Moët v. Clybouw, Sebast. Dig. 316; Moët v. Pickering, 26 W. R. 637, 8 Ch. D. 372); the reason must have been that they were trade-marks. Even supposing the mark to be bad if put inside, there is nothing in this registration to compel us to put it inside. In In re Clement et Cie's Trade-Mark, 48 W. R. 67, [1900] 1 Ch. 114, registration in two pieces was allowed. In re Player's Trade-Mark is distinguishable, because in that case the two marks were replicas of each other. If Messrs. Compton wanted to use the three labels together with the perforation the only course open to them was to register the whole: Richards v. Butcher, [1891] 2 Ch. 522, 39 W. R. Dig. 237.

He also referred to In re Powell's Trade-Mark, 41 W. R. 627, [1893] 2 Ch. 388, and Moët v. Couston, 33 Beav. 578, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 38.

O. L. Clare, in reply.—The application does not in form comply with section 64, because it does not state the essential particulars. The object of the application and disclaimer in the case of a trade-mark is the same as that of the specification in the case of a patent; it is to warn the public of what is claimed by the applicant. There is nothing in Messrs. Crompton's application and disclaimer to show that the essential feature of their trade-mark is the use in combination of the specified devices. If it is suggested that the essential particulars consist of the size, shape and manner of user of the labels, the answer is that they have not been specified. There is no distinctiveness about the shape of a rectangle. None of the cases cited as to concealed marks are registration cases. The registration is in point of fact too wide, and may therefore be restricted to the article for which the mark is in fact used: Edwards v. Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454, 34 W. R. Dig. 197. In such a case there is no distinction in principle between restriction and striking off.

He also referred to In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Mark, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 39 W. R. Dig. 237.

SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the facts, continued: The first ground upon which the applicants base their case is that the essential particulars are not sufficiently stated in the respondents' application to register. It appears that the application in writing, as at first carried into the comptroller, did contain some description in writing of the essential particulars, but this was altered (and, as I gather, at the request of the comptroller) to the form in which it now appears on the register, describing it as "a combination of devices," and leaving anyone to refer to the actual combination registered to see for themselves of what the trade-mark consists. I am told that this is now a common form at the office of the comptroller, and Mr. Sebastian referred to some current numbers of the Trade-Marks Journal as showing how general the practice is. However that may be, I am of opinion that the description is sufficient. Where the labels themselves appear upon the register, and in the manner in which they are used, the description is, in my opinion, sufficient. The eye frequently enables a better idea to be formed of trade-mark than any verbal description would have done. In Eno v. Dunn, 39 W. R. 161, 15 App. Cas. 252, the Lord Chancellor, at p. 255, after stating the results of comparing two trade-marks, which he placed side by side, added that no verbal description of the difference did entire justice to the dissimilarity of the two marks.

It was next urged that the trade-mark was not really a trade-mark at all, but, if anything, it was three trade-marks, which could not be registered as one mark, and it was contended that there could not be a valid trade-mark consisting only of the combination of two old labels, each separately registered as a trade-mark, together with something not distinctive at all. In support of this proposition reliance was placed upon In re Player's Trade-Mark, where Cozens-Hardy, J., refused to direct the comptroller to proceed with the registration of a mark which, in all its essentials, was the same as an earlier registered trade-mark of the same applicant, on the ground that it was superfluous. If the mark had been registered, however, by the comptroller in that case, it does not follow from the decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., that, upon an application by a rival trader, it would necessarily have been taken off the register. How is he aggrieved by its registration? If his contention is that registration of the mark is superfluous, as the registration adds nothing to existing rights, then he is not injured by such registration. If, however, registration prevents him from doing anything which, but for the registration, he could lawfully do, then it follows that registration was not superfluous, but has secured to the party registering some additional right. Nor has the argument that the mark is in reality three trade-marks any validity. Provided that the mark complies with the requisites of section 64 of the Act of 1883, the whole mark need not appear on any one ticket, label, stamp, or impression. A combination of several different marks, like that which was the subject of dispute in Robinson v. Finlay, 27 W. R. 294, 9 Ch. D. 487, and which is very common among dealers in cotton goods, may be treated as equivalent to a single mark. In In re Spencer's Trade-Marks, where the words "diamond cast steel" were on one side of files, and the corporate mark of the maker on the other side, the court held that the words "diamond cast steel" had not been used alone as a trade-mark; they treated the marks on both sides of the file as together constituting one mark. In that case Lord Esher, M.R., said: "What was used before 1875 by Mr. Walter Spencer was one distinguishing mark, which one mark was a combination of a mark which had been granted to his father by the Cutlers Company, and a mark which he invented himself. The two together being put on his goods in order to distinguish his goods, they made it one trade-mark, and I do say this distinctly, that whether the things which are put on to make a distinction (for that is all that is wanted) are put close together, or are put at two ends of the same goods, or are put one on one side of the goods and one on the other, if they are on the goods for the purpose of making a distinction they are one mark, and the mere fact that on the files they have been put on the two sides does not make them separate marks—certainly not the separation which is relied on here, even though the name of the person is not a part of the mark." In the present case Messrs. A. Crompton & Co. (Limited) use a combination of the three labels to distinguish their goods. To apply what the Master of the Rolls said in the case just cited, the moment a trader puts on his goods three labels it is clear, it is an inevitable business result, that he puts them all three on in order that all three being there may distinguish his goods.

It was next urged that the respondents had never used and never intended to use the combination mark in question as a trade-mark. It was not disputed that the respondents had used the three labels in combination upon their goods to a large extent, but it was said that two labels were placed outside the wrapper and the third label inside the wrapper, and that it was necessary that all the labels should be visible at once to constitute a user as one trade-mark. In my judgment there is no foundation for this contention. It must very frequently happen that if labels or tickets are put at different ends, or different sides of packages, or if a portion of a mark is stamped or impressed on one side of any article and the other portion on the other side, the whole mark cannot be seen at the same time; the goods may have to be turned over, or turned round, yet it cannot be doubted that marks so used are being properly used as trade-marks.

A further point was made that the respondents have only used their registered mark for cotton yarn, and only intend so to use it, whereas they have registered it in class 23, for cotton yarn and sewing cotton not on spools or reels. It does not appear that the applicants deal in sewing cotton, or are in any way affected, by the registration, except so far as yarn is concerned, and in any case their remedy would be to rectify the register by limiting the mark to those articles in the class in connection with which it was being actually used, as was done in Edwards v. Dennis, and not to strike the mark off the register altogether. No application has been made to me on the present motion to limit the respondents' mark to yarn. The result is that the motion fails and must be refused.

JACOB v. GAVILLER. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Policy on dog—All risks including mortality—Cattle clause—Walking to be deemed safe arrival.

A policy of insurance on a dog during transit from Liverpool to Lahore contained the following clause: "This insurance is against all risks, including mortality from any cause, jettison and washing overboard, but walking at Lahore, Punjab, to be deemed a safe arrival." The dog was injured during the transit, and on arrival at Lahore could only walk on three legs.

Held, first, that the policy covered all risks, and not merely mortality; secondly, that the dog did not walk at Lahore within the meaning of the policy.

Action tried in the Commercial Court without a jury.

The plaintiff was the owner of a valuable fox terrier dog called Hardwood. The defendant was an underwriter at Lloyd's.

The plaintiff's claim was for £25, the defendant's share of liability under a policy of insurance on the dog for £150.

The plaintiff had bought the dog for £55 with a view of sending it out to India for show and stud purposes and possibly for sale, and in the meantime had left it at Messrs. Spratt's depôt at Liverpool for the purpose of being taken care of. When it was sent to the depôt the dog was healthy and sound.

The insurance covered by the policy, which was dated the 23rd of October, 1900, was expressed to be as follows: "From the Mersey to Bombay whilst there and thence by rail to Lahore, Punjab, including seventy-two hours at Spratt's depôt, Liverpool. Including all risks in craft to and from the vessel and of steam navigation . . . in the good ship or vessel called The Clan Chisholm . . . £150—one fox terrier dog (Hardwood) so valued."

The policy then proceeded to enumerate the ordinary perils of a marine risk, and continued as follows: "This insurance is against all risks including mortality from any cause, jettison and washing overboard, but walking at Lahore, Punjab, to be deemed a safe arrival."

On the 27th of October The Clan Chisholm sailed from Liverpool with the dog on board, and duly arrived at Bombay on the 24th of November.

At Bombay the dog was found to have been injured, and on its arrival at Lahore it could only walk on three legs, the fourth leg being useless and somewhat withered.

On examination it appeared that the dog was suffering from periostitis, and it was greatly depreciated in value.

Scrutton, K.C., and Schiller, for the plaintiffs.—The policy, being against "all risks," covers any injury which may have happened to the dog while it was at Spratt's depot, or while it was in transit from Liverpool to Lahore. The words "including mortality from any cause, jettison and washing overboard" are superfluous. The word "risks" is equivalent to "perils": Nigel Gold Mining Co. v. Hoade, ante, p. 108. Secondly, "walking at Lahore" is only an answer to a claim for a total loss, and not to a claim for a partial loss. Thirdly, the dog did not walk at Lahore; "walking" means efficient walking in the ordinary sense of the term.

Hamilton, K.C., and F. D. Mackinnon, for the defendant.—The words "all risks" are qualified by the following words, which show that the policy was only intended to cover a total loss. Secondly, the clause "walking at port of discharge to be deemed a safe arrival" is generally inserted in insurances on cattle for the purpose of precluding any inquiry as to injuries received in transit. Such walking is an answer to any claim under the policy. Thirdly, the dog did walk at Lahore; he was able get along by pedestrian locomotion.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 7.—KENNEDY, J.—On the evidence I have come to the conclusion that the injury was caused during the early part of the voyage. Now, assuming that the dog could not walk at Lahore, the first question is whether on the terms of the policy the defendant is liable. In my opinion the words "all risks" in the clause of the policy cannot be cut down or qualified as the defendant contends. To restrict the risk to mortality would, I think, be to give the words an unnatural construction. I am of opinion that the policy covers all risks, and not mortality only. I cannot accept the plaintiff's contention that the words "walking at Lahore, Punjab, shall be deemed a safe arrival" merely qualify the mortality clause, and do not refer to other risks. If the dog walks at Lahore within the meaning of the policy then no claim can be made. It is true that this might lead to the absurdity that if the dog had been blinded but could walk at Lahore the plaintiff could not recover. Next, did the dog walk at Lahore? I think that walking, applied to a dog, means locomotion in the usual way, on four legs; and therefore I am of opinion that this dog did not walk at Lahore. The case would have been different if he had been limping from some temporary cause, as, for instance, a thorn in the paw. This was not a case of imperfect user, but of incapability of user. I think that the value of the dog has been depreciated to the extent of two-thirds its value, and therefore the defendant is liable to the extent of £16 13s. 4d.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

WESTMINSTER CITY, COUNCIL OF v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Jurisdiction—Temporary structures—London Building Act, 1894—London Government Act, 1899.

The powers over temporary wooden structures conferred by section 84 of the London Building Act, 1894, on the London County Council are transferred by the London Government Act, 1899, to the borough councils created by that Act.

This was a case stated under section 29 of the London Government Act of 1899, which provides that if any question arises or is about to arise as to whether any power or liability is or is not transferred by or under this Act to the council of any metropolitan borough, or any property is or is not vested in any such council, that question may be submitted for decision to the High Court in such summary manner as subject to any rules of the court may be directed by the court, and the court after hearing such parties and taking such evidence (if any) as it thinks just shall decide the question.

Questions arose between the London County Council and the city of Westminster as to whether or not the powers, duties, and liabilities of the county council with respect to the approval or licensing the setting up and control, of certain structures within the city of Westminster were or were not transferred under the London Government Act, 1899, to the council of the borough.

The city of Westminster was created in pursuance of section 1 of the London Government Act, 1899, which gives the Crown power to create certain areas and to make such rearrangements for boundaries as may be found necessary, and the 1st schedule to such section defines those boundaries. By section 5, sub-section 1, of the same Act the powers and duties of the London County Council under the enactments mentioned in Part I. of the 2nd schedule to that Act, subject to the conditions mentioned in that schedule, were transferred to the borough council.

That schedule is as follows:

"PART I.

"Minor powers and duties to be transferred from county council.

"Powers and duties transferred. Conditions of transfer. Power under section 84 of the London Building Act, 1894, to licence the setting-up of wooden structures, and power to take proceedings for default in obtaining or observing the conditions of a licence under that section."

Section 84 is one of a series of five sections, 82-86, in Part VII. of the London Building Act giving to the London County Council power to licence temporary structures and providing for the deposit of plans and also providing for the recovery of penalties.

Section 82 provides that "where a builder is desirous of erecting an iron building or other structure . . . he shall make an application to the council accompanied by plans of the proposed building." Section 83 provides that where an application is made to erect any iron or other building or structure of a temporary nature, the council may, if they approve of the plan, limit the period under which it shall be allowed to remain. Section 84, sub-section 1, provides that "no person shall set up in any place any wooden structure . . . without having first obtained a licence from the council and the licence may contain such conditions with regard to the structure as the council may think proper."

Certain temporary wooden stands were erected at the funeral of her late Majesty Queen Victoria and questions arose as to which was the proper licensing authority. It was contended by the London County Council that notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 and the transfer in the first part of the 2nd schedule they had still jurisdiction over the stands in question under sections 82 and 83 of the Act of 1894. They also contended that by section 238 of the Act jurisdiction was still preserved to the district surveyors. Section 238 is as follows: "Every building or structure and every work done to or in or upon any building . . . shall be subject to the supervision of the district surveyor appointed by the district in which the building is situate."

For the borough of Westminster it was contended that the structures fell within the provisions of section 5 (1) of the London Government Act, 1899, and that by the effect of that section all the powers and duties of the London County Council were transferred to the city of Westminster, and that the county council had no authority to licence such structures, and that the duty of supervising such structures by the district surveyor was now transferred to the council of the city of Westminster and its officers.

Manisty, K.C., and Davis, for the city of Westminster.—The section (84) in question is copied from section 13 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1882, but with the difference that the words movable or temporary do not occur in section 84, which would have made the matter plain. It is difficult to say what structures do fall within section 84 if these do not.

Avory, K.C., and Daldy, for the county council.—The control is still preserved to the county council, as many of the structures are partly composed of iron. The case of Venner v. M'Donell, 45 W. R. 267. [1897] 1 Q. B. 421. In any case the control of the district surveyor is still preserved, and fees will have to be paid to him.

Manisty, K.C., in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The broad question raised in the case is whether the London County Council or the city of Westminster is the proper authority to lay down the conditions of construction of wooden structures which it may be proposed to erect at any public functions taking place in the borough of Westminster. Now it is impossible to deal with every case that may arise or to decide upon every particular state of facts which may be involved in the construction of some special structure. This question arises with regard to a number of constructions wholly made of wood except for the nails used, and I wish to guard against being supposed to say that we do lay down any general rule which must govern some special case which may involve other considerations. In my opinion the main question must be determined in favour of the city of Westminster. The history of the matter has been very clearly stated by the learned counsel engaged in the case. Before the passing of the London Government Act of 1899 there had been a series of enactments which put buildings and structures under certain supervision, and section 56 of the Metropolitan Building Act of 1855 was a section similar to section 82 of London Building Act, 1894. Section 13 of the Metropolis Management Act of 1882 was a section which superseded sections 56 and 128 of the Act of 1855, which dealt with or were intended to deal with temporary wooden structures, and no doubt some question similar to the one we have now got to decide might have arisen under the three sections taken from those two Acts of Parliament. When the London Building Act of 1894 was passed section 56 of the Act of 1855 was replaced by section 82; section 12 of the Act of 1882 was replaced by section 83. Section 84, which replaced section 13 of the Act of 1882, modified that section to a certain extent by the removal of the words which related to movable or temporary wooden structures, and making section 84 apply to all wooden structures except hoardings.

The first question therefore that we have to determine is, what is the class of structures that fall within sections 82 and 83 as distinguished from section 84, because by the subsequent Act the powers of section 84 have been transferred to the borough council. I think as far as I can express an opinion sufficiently for the purposes of this case, without attempting, as I said, to deal with any particular state of circumstances that may arise, that sections 82 and 83 are intended to apply to buildings or structures which would ordinarily have been supposed to come under the provisions of Part VI. of the Act, but as to which, from either their construction or their intended use, it was thought by the London County Council that the provisions of Part VI. of the Act were inapplicable. Section 84 seems to me, as it now stands, a section giving control over wooden structures to which no general provisions or substituted provisions of a general character would be applicable. Then we come to the Act of 1899, the London Government Act. As I have already said, by the combined operation of section 5 and the schedule the powers of section 84 of the London Building Act to licence the setting up of wooden structures and the power to take proceedings for default in obtaining or observing the conditions for licensing under that section are transferred to the borough councils. I was very anxious to learn whether Mr. Avory would assist us to find out what would be transferred to the borough of Westminster if his argument was right. The only case that he was able to suggest to us was, if I may use a somewhat abnormal phrase, permanent temporary structures, or in other words some wooden structures intended to remain but joined on to some other structure. It does not seem to me that that is a satisfactory explanation. I think that the Legislature thought that matters that ought to be dealt with by a central body and could be the subject of substituted regulations in place of the general provisions of Part VI. should be dealt with by the central body, the London County Council, but that local matters—as, for instance, the erection of wooden structures for a limited time, to which no general or substituted regulations could be intended to apply, should be transferred to the borough councils. Therefore on this point, as to which of the two authorities are to fix the conditions and impose the limit of time for temporary wooden structures which are to be erected for the purpose of enabling persons to see public ceremonies, in my opinion the contention of the borough of Westminster is right.

Now there remains only the question of the possible supervision or duty of supervision by the district surveyors. Speaking for myself, I do not think we ought to decide that question for two reasons. In the first place it seems to me that it may to a certain extent depend on the very conditions the Westminster Council may think fit to impose. Secondly, we could not deal with that question without deciding what are the rights, duties, and obligations of district surveyors under the Act. They are not represented before us, and their case has not been argued. I think it would be unwise on our part to express an opinion on such a point without knowing the particular circumstances under which this duty arises. We propose therefore not to answer the third question which has been put to us. On the broad question which has been submitted to us I think that the contention of the City of Westminster Council is the right one.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEE v. CHARLOTTE WALLIS.

Bankruptcy — Property of bankrupt — Assignment of chose in action—Notice of assignment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

Prior to the bankruptcy the bankrupt had borrowed money from his wife and deposited a life policy with her as security for the loan.

The trustee gave notice of the bankruptcy to the insurance company before the wife gave notice of her claim.

Held, that the fact of the trustee having been the first to give notice to the insurance company did not affect his title as an incumbrancer for value prior to the bankruptcy.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy of A. Wallis for a declaratian that he was entitled to a policy of insurance for £500 on the life of the bankrupt.

Some time prior to the bankruptcy Wallis had obtained a loan from his wife out of her separate estate, and had handed to her as security the life policy in question.

She deposited the policy at her bank, but gave no notice of her charge thereon to the insurance company until after the bankruptcy.

On the 11th of October, 1901, a receiving order was made against Walus, and on the same day he gave the official receiver information of the existence of the policy and of the fact that it was charged in favour of his wife, and deposited with her.

On the 16th of October the official receiver gave the insurance company notice of the receiving order.

Mrs. Wallis did not give the company notice of her claim until the 3rd of January, 1902.

In the meanwhile the creditors had elected a trustee, who launched the present motion.

Eve, K.C., and Richard Neville, for the trustee.—Mrs. Wallis obtained no title to the policy by delivery: Howes v. Prudential Assurance Co., 49 L. T. Rep. 133, 31 W. R. Reed, K.C., and Frank Mellor, for Mrs. Wallis.—A policy of insurance is a chose in action, and notice of assignment is not required to take it out of the reputed ownership of the bankrupt: Ex parte Ibbetson, In re Moore, 26 W. R. 843, 8 Ch. D. 519. Mrs. Wallis had a better equity to the policy, for she was an incumbrancer for value, and the trustee was not. Further, the trustee had notice of her incumbrance when he gave notice to the company of his title, and therefore he did not obtain any priority to Mrs. Wallis by giving notice before she did: Newman v. Newman, 33 W. R. 505, 28 Ch. D. 674.

Eve, K.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—It is singular that there is no express authority upon this point, but it seems to me plain enough that at the date of the bankruptcy Mrs. Wallis had a good equitable charge for value upon the policy in question. Now the property of the bankrupt only vests in the trustee subject to such incumbrances for value as may have become attached to it prior to the bankruptcy. The trustee therefore cannot affect the rights of an incumbrancer for value by giving such a notice as he has given in this case. I also agree that as an incumbrancer for value Mrs. Wallis had a better equity to the policy than the trustee, and I think she is entitled to succeed in this motion.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR MANITOBA v. MANITOBA LICENCE-HOLDERS' ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Canada, Law of—Local legislature—Province—Licensing law—Conflict of laws.

A provincial legislature in Canada has jurisdiction to restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors within the province so long as its legislation does not conflict with any legislative provision which may be competently made by the Parliament of Canada and in force within the province.

Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A. C. 348, 44 W. R. Dig. 24, followed.

Appeal from the King's Bench, Canada.

The facts appear in the judgment.

Colin Campbell, K.C. (Attorney-General for Manitoba), Haldane, K.C., and R. O. B. Lane, jun., for appellant.

Blake, K.C., and Phippen (both of Canadian bar), for respondents.

Newcombe, K.C. (of Canadian bar), for Attorney-General for Canada.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—In July, 1900, an Act was passed by the Legislature of Manitoba for the suppression of the liquor traffic in that province. The Act, which is known by its short title of "The Liquor Act," was to have come into operation on the 1st of June, 1901. Before that date on a reference under Chapter 28 of the Revised Statutes of Manitoba the Court of King's Bench pronounced the whole Act to be unconstitutional. From this decision the present appeal has been brought.

Although the questions submitted to the Court of King's Bench by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council were eleven in number, the only one considered in the court below, and the only one argued before this Board was the first: "Had the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba jurisdiction to enact the Liquor Act, and if not, in what particular or respect has it exceeded its power?" To this the answer given was: "It exceeded its power in enacting the Liquor Act as a whole." The other questions are either of an academical character or such as are material only in the event of the Act being declared partially and not wholly unconstitutional. No answer that could be given to any of those questions would be of any practical value. Their lordships therefore will confine their attention to the subject to which the judgment of the Court of King's Bench and the arguments at the bar were addressed.

The question at issue depends on the meaning and effect of those sections in the British North America Act, 1867, which provide for the distribution of legislative powers between the Dominion and the provinces. The subject has been discussed before this Board very frequently and very fully: see Citizens' Insurance Co. v. Parsons, 7 App. Cas. 98, at p. 109, 30 W. R. Dig. 31. Mindful of advice often quoted but not perhaps always followed, their lordships do not propose to travel beyond the particular case before them.

The drink question, to use a common expression which is convenient if not altogether accurate, is not to be found specifically mentioned either in the classes of subjects enumerated in section 91 and assigned to the Legislature of the Dominion or in those enumerated in section 92 and thereby appropriated to provincial legislatures. The omission was probably not accidental. The result has been somewhat remarkable. On the one hand according to Russell v. Reg, 7 A. C. 829, it is competent for the Dominion Legislature to pass an Act for the suppression of intemperance applicable to all parts of the dominion, and when duly brought into operation in any particular district deriving its efficacy from the general authority vested in the Dominion Parliament to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada. On the other hand, according to the decision in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A. C. 348, 44 W. R. Dig. 24, it is not incompetent for a provincial legislature to pass a measure for the repression or even for the total abolition of the liquor traffic within the province provided the subject is dealt with as a matter "of a merely local nature" in the province and the Act itself is not repugnant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada. In delivering the judgment of this Board in the case of The Attorney-General for Ontario v. The Attorney-General for the Dominion, Lord Watson expressed a decided opinion that provincial legislation for the suppression of the liquor traffic could not be supported under either No. 8 or No. 9 of section 92. His lordship observed that the only enactments of that section which appeared to have any relation to such legislation were to be found in Nos. 13 and 16, which assigned to the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures (1) "property and civil rights in the province" and (2) "generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province." He added that it was not necessary for the purpose of that appeal to determine whether such legislation was authorized by the one or by the other of these heads. Although this particular question was thus left apparently undecided, a careful perusal of the judgment leads to the conclusion that in the opinion of the Board the case fell under No. 16 rather than under No. 13. And that seems to their lordships to be the better opinion. In legislating for the suppression of the liquor traffic the object in view is the abatement or prevention of a local evil rather than the regulation of property and civil rights—though of course no such legislation can be carried into effect without interfering more or less with "property and civil rights in the province." Indeed, if the case is to be regarded as dealing with matters within the class of subject enumerated in No. 13, it might be questionable whether the Dominion Legislature could have authority to interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of the province in the matter.

The controversy therefore seems to be narrowed to this one point: Is the subject of "the Liquor Act" a matter "of a merely local nature in the province" of Manitoba and does the Liquor Act deal with it as such? The judgment of this Board in the case of The Attorney-General for Ontario v. The Attorney-General for the Dominion has relieved the case from some if not all of the difficulties which appear to have presented themselves to the learned judges of the Court of King's Bench. This Board held that a provincial legislature has jurisdiction to restrict the sale within the province of intoxicating liquors so long as its legislation does not conflict with any legislative provision which may be competently made by the Parliament of Canada and which may be in force within the province or any district thereof. It held further that there might be circumstances in which a provincial legislature might have jurisdiction to prohibit the manufacture within the province of intoxicating liquors and the importation of such liquors into the province. For the purposes of the present question it is immaterial to inquire what those circumstances may be. That judgment, therefore, as it stands and the report to her late Majesty consequent thereon show that in the opinion of this tribunal matters which are "substantially of local or of private interest" in a province—matters which are of a local or private nature "from a provincial point of view"—to use expressions to be found in the judgment, are not excluded from the category of "matters of a merely local or private nature" because legislation dealing with them, however carefully it may be framed, may or must have an effect outside the limits of the province and may or must interfere with the sources of dominion revenue and the industrial pursuits of persons licensed under dominion statutes to carry on particular trades.

The Liquor Act proceeds upon a recital that "it is expedient to suppress the liquor traffic in Manitoba by prohibiting provincial transactions in liquor." That is the declared object of the legislature set out at the commencement of the Act. Towards the end of the Act there occurs this section: "119. While this Act is intended to prohibit and shall prohibit transactions in liquor which take place wholly within the province of Manitoba except under a licence or as otherwise specially provided by this Act, and restrict the consumption of liquor within the limits of the province of Manitoba, it shall not affect and is not intended to affect bonâ fide transactions in liquor between a person in the province of Manitoba and a person in another province or in a foreign country, and the provisions of this Act shall be construed accordingly." Now that provision is as much part of the Act as any other section contained in it. It must have its full effect in exempting from the operation of the Act all bonâ fide transactions in liquor which come within its terms. It is not necessary to go through the provisions of the Act. It is enough to say that they are extremely stringent—more stringent probably than anything that is to be found in any legislation of a similar kind. Unless the Act become a dead letter it must interfere with the revenue of the dominion with respect to licensed trades in the province of Manitoba, and indirectly, at least, with business operations beyond the limits of the province. That seems clear. And that was substantially the ground on which the Court of King's Bench declared the Act unconstitutional. But all objections on that score are in their lordships' opinion removed by the judgment of this Board in the case of The Attorney-General for Ontario v. The Attorney-General for the Dominion. Having attentively considered the very able and elaborate judgments of Killam, C.J., and Bain, J., in which Richards, J., concurred, and the arguments of counsel in support of their view, their lordships are not satisfied that the Legislature of Manitoba has transgressed the limits of its jurisdiction in passing the Liquor Act.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench of the Province of Manitoba dated the 23rd of February, 1901, ought to be discharged, and that in lieu thereof there ought to be substituted the following answers to the eleven questions submitted to it:

1. In answer to the first question: That the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba had jurisdiction to enact the Liquor Act.

2. In answer to the questions numbered 2 to 11 both inclusive: That no useful answer can be given to these questions.

There will be no costs of this appeal.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Inland revenue — Stamp duty — Railway company — "Increase of the amount of nominal share capital" — Conversion of stock—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 113.

The Midland Railway Co., in pursuance of a special Act, converted various classes of stock, preferential and ordinary, into other stocks of higher nominal value, but bearing a corresponding lower rate of interest;

Held, that, although nothing was added to the working capital of the company, yet there was an "increase of the amount of the nominal share capital" within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 113.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (49 W. R. 243, [1901] 1 Q. B. 220) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.), 49 W. R. 243, [1901] 1 Q. B. 220 (affirming a judgment of a Divisional Court (Ridley and Darling, JJ.), 49 W. R. 138, [1900] 2 Q. B. 353.

An information had been filed by the Attorney-General for duty and penalties under section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891—and a special case was stated by consent.

The case is given very fully in the court of first instance.

The Midland Railway Co., in pursuance of the Midland Railway Act, 1897, re-arranged and consolidated the several classes of their stocks.

As the result of the re-arrangement and consolidation was a very large increase in the nominal amount of share capital, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that duty was payable under section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891 upon £59,230,581 3s. 6d., being the aggregate increase of the amount.

The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Sir E. Carson, S.G., Danckwerts, K.C., and Rowlatt, for the respondent, were not heard.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The only question in this case is whether an increase of the amount of the nominal share capital of the Midland Railway Co. was authorized by the Midland Railway Act, 1897.

It seems that the company were desirous of effecting, as it is called in their Act, a "rearrangement and consolidation of the several classes and denominations of their shares and stocks." This was carried into effect by the Act of 1897. It may be convenient to give two instances of what was done under that Act. The company had a perpetual preference stock, carrying a dividend of 4 per cent. They were desirous of reducing that dividend to a uniform dividend of 2½ per cent.; and that was carried out by the Act of Parliament in this way. It was declared that "the existing and authorized 4 per cent. perpetual preference stock of the company shall be by virtue of this Act cancelled and extinguished," and "there shall be created in lieu thereof 2½ per cent. perpetual preference stock of the company to an amount exceeding by 60 per cent. the nominal amount of the stock so cancelled and extinguished." Was not that an increase in the amount of the nominal share capital? Then there was a large amount of consolidated ordinary stock, and the company were minded to give their shareholders such advantages as would result from splitting their stock; but instead of splitting it in the proper sense of the word, and giving to every holder of £100 stock £50 of preferred ordinary stock and £50 of deferred ordinary stock, they really duplicated their stock and gave each holder of £100 stock £100 of preferred and £100 of deferred. Again, was not that increasing the amount of their nominal share capital? It seems to me that this company has done the very thing which brings them within the words of the Act of Parliament, the Stamp Act, and within the grasp of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

I cannot see any loophole of escape. It seems to me that if you were asked to describe what has been done with regard to the ordinary consolidated stock of the company, you would say that the actual working capital has not been increased by a penny, but the amount of the nominal share capital has been doubled. I therefore move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I will only add a few words to what has been said because of the general importance of the question, for I understand that there are a number of cases which will be regulated by the decision.

I cannot express my view of the case better than it is expressed in the judgment of Ridley, J., in which he said, in reference to the interpretation of the statute: "The words are 'in the case of any increase of the amount of nominal share capital.' Now, the 'nominal share capital' means the capital in shares and the figure value attached to it. The increase of such nominal share capital seems to me to be simply this. If instead of being £100 it becomes £200, not necessarily that it means more but that if the company extends the capital and gives it a greater nominal value, that is an increase which requires an additional statement of the amount of such increase to be delivered by the company." Of course that statement being given to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue infers an increase in the stamp duty which has to be paid.

It seems to me that that is clearly the effect of sections 61 and 66 of this company's private Act. An increase is created in the amount of the nominal share capital, and indeed, it is so called in the Act itself. By section 61 the previous nominal capital is abolished, and the amount is nearly doubled under that same section. And in section 66 those who are obtaining this Act of Parliament, very correctly I think, characterize it in this way: "Any increase in the nominal amount of the preference or ordinary capital of the company by virtue of this Act shall not increase" their borrowing powers, which are there mentioned.

The case seems to me clearly to fall within section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as all the learned judges who have applied their minds to this question think it does. Therefore I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion, and I can really add nothing to what has been said. The section of the Act appears to me to be free from any possible ambiguity, and I cannot bring my mind to entertain any doubt as to the right construction of it; indeed, but for the very learned and able arguments we have heard from counsel for the appellant I should have said that the case was unarguable.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I concur.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I am of the same opinion. The appellants' success depends on their contention that an "increase of the amount of nominal share capital" in the sense of the Act of 1891 only takes place when there is an increase in the resources of the company. It seems to me that this test is purposely disregarded by the Legislature in favour of a standard entirely different and more arbitrary. The standard selected is the amount of nominal share capital; and in the present case that is now, as the result of operations authorized by statute, let us say £70,000,000. It is perfectly plain that if this had been the original amount, this would be the taxable sum. The enactment about change does not let in any new criterion of amount, but adheres to the same criterion as is set up for a new company by the same section. The question therefore comes, as Stirling, L.J., said, to be merely one of arithmetic.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion, and I will express my view by asking and trying to answer two questions: First of all, what is now the amount the nominal share capital of the company, taking the ordinary stock? The only answer to that question is £70,000,000. The next question is, what was it before the Act of Parliament was passed? The only answer to that is £35,000,000. Can it be said there has been no increase? It has been urged for the appellants, supposing there was an increase, the increase was not authorized because it was not done by the company under the powers of the Act, but was done by the Act itself. That is too subtle for me and I cannot follow it. If the Act had been imposed by vis major I could have followed it, but when the company have themselves obtained the power I cannot follow it.

Appeal dismissed.

In re HILL.
HILL v. HILL. (a.)

Will—Construction—Chattels settled to go with dignity—So far as the rules of law and equity permit—Absolute vesting.

A testatrix by her will bequeathed certain jewels to her son, the third Viscount H., for life, and after his death "to each and every of the persons who shall in turn succeed to the title and dignity of Viscount H. . . . severally and successively as they shall in turn succeed to such title and dignity as aforesaid, my intention being that the said jewels shall descend as heirlooms as far as the rules of law and equity will permit."

Held, that the jewels vested absolutely in the first person who succeeded to the title on the death of the third viscount.

Tollemache v. Coventry, 2 Cl. & Fin. 611, followed.

This was an appeal against the judgment of Swinfen Eady, J.

The material facts were as follow:

The case came before the court on an originating summons in the matter of the trusts of the will of Ann, Dowager Viscountess Hill, dated the 28th of May, 1891, and of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, for the determination of the question whether the plaintiff, Viscount Hill, is entitled absolutely, or for life only, or otherwise, to certain diamonds, consisting of a tiara, necklace, pendant, and earrings, and to other chattels bequeathed by the will to her son, the third viscount, "until he shall die, and after his death to each and every of the persons who shall in turn succeed to the title and dignity of Viscount Hill, or any other title or dignity which may be granted to or assumed by any person for the time being entitled to the said title and dignity of Viscount Hill, severally and successively as they shall in turn succeed to such title and dignity as aforesaid, my intention being that the said diamonds and miniatures and ring shall descend as heirlooms as far as the rules of law and equity will permit."

The testatrix died on the 31st of October, 1891, and her will was duly proved.

Her son, the third Viscount Hill, survived his mother, and entered into possession of the said chattels.

He died on the 30th of March, 1895, and was succeeded in the title by his son, the plaintiff Rowland Richard Clegg, fourth Viscount Hill, who was born in 1863.

The plaintiff is married, but has not any issue.

The heir-presumptive to the title is the plaintiff's brother, the defendant Francis William Clegg Clegg Hill, who was born in the year 1866 and is unmarried.

The plaintiff, shortly after the death of his father, took proceedings to recover a portion of the said chattels from his stepmother, Isabella Elizabeth, Dowager Viscountess Hill, who claimed the same on the ground of their having been subject in the hands of the testatrix to an alleged precatory trust. The decision of the Court of Appeal established that the chattels were not subject to any precatory trust, and that the testatrix had power to dispose of them by her will: Hill v. Hill, 45 W. R. 371, [1897] 1 Q. B. 483. The nature and extent of the interest taken by the plaintiff under the will of the testatrix did not arise in those proceedings, and had to be determined on this summons.

It was not disputed that under the will, the son of the testatrix—namely, the third Viscount Hill—was entitled to possession of the chattels during his life. The plaintiff contended that upon his decease the chattels vested absolutely and indefeasibly in himself.

The defendant, F. W. C. Clegg Hill contended that the chattels did not so vest absolutely in the plaintiff, but that upon his death within twenty-one years after the death of the testatrix they would pass and belong to the next Viscount Hill, subject in turn to be similarly divested in favour of the next succeeding viscount if he should succeed to the title within the period of twenty-one years, and that the person who should be Viscount Hill at the expiration of the period of twenty-one years would become indefeasibly entitled to the chattels.

Swinfen Eady, J.—The plaintiff contends that upon the death of the third Viscount Hill the chattels vested absolutely and indefeasibly in himself. The defendant F. W. C. C. Hill contends that the chattels do not vest absolutely in the plaintiff, but that upon his death within twenty-one years after the death of the testatrix they will pass and belong to the next Viscount Hill, subject in turn to be similarly divested in favour of the next succeeding viscount if he succeeds to the title within the said period of twenty-one years, and that the person who is Viscount Hill at the expiration of the said period of twenty-one years will become indefeasibly entitled to the said chattels. The defendant founds this contention on the clause in the will of the testatrix, bequeathing the chattels to each and every of the persons who should in turn succeed to the title and dignity of Viscount Hill severally and successively as they should in turn succeed to the title, her intention being that the chattels should descend as heirlooms so far as the rules of law and equity will permit. It is clear that subject to the rule against perpetuities chattels may be settled to follow the devolution of a dignity: In re Johnston, Cockerell v. Earl of Essex; Hill v. Hill. I have, however, to consider whether in the present case the articles have been effectually settled in the manner contended for by the defendant F. W. C. C. Hill and whether the words which I have read are sufficient to create an executory trust and cut down the interest taken by the plaintiff to a defeasible interest in the event of his dying within the period of twenty-one years from the death of the testatrix. That the mere addition of the words "so far as the rules of law and equity will permit" will not make the trust executory or amount to a direction to settle appears from Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon, 1 Joh. & Hem. 46, at p. 50. In Shelley v. Shelley the testatrix gave certain jewelry "to my nephew John Shelley to go and be held as heirlooms by him and by his eldest son on his decease, and to go and descend to the eldest son of such eldest son and so on to the eldest son of his descendants as far as the rules of law and equity will permit." I stop there, omitting the subsequent direction in that will, because there is nothing equivalent to it in the present case. Wood, V.C., held in substance that the words which I have read, if they had stood alone and unqualified by the subsequent direction, would have created an absolute interest in his nephew John. Again, in In re Viscount Exmouth, Viscount Exmouth v. Praed, the facts were that the second Viscount Exmouth bequeathed to trustees certain plate, jewels, and other chattels "upon trust to permit and suffer the same to go and be held and enjoyed with the title and honours of Exmouth, so far as the rules of law and equity will permit, by the person who for the time being shall be actually possessed of the said title in the nature of heirlooms." There followed in that case other words to which there is nothing equivalent in the present case. In dealing with the portion of the gift which I have read, Fry, L.J., said at p. 162: "There can, in my judgment, be no doubt that the effect of that clause standing alone would be to give an absolute interest in the chattels to the first person who succeeded to the honours, and that therefore if it had stood alone the third viscount would have become absolutely possessed of these chattels. That I think follows from the case of Tollemache v. Coventry. In the case of Countess of Harrington v. Earl of Harrington, Lord Westbury pointed out that in the case of a direct gift of chattels upon trusts corresponding with the ownership of real estates, up to the limit of time allowed by the law against perpetuities, it is settled that, so soon as the real estates (to which the personal chattels are thus made accessory) vest in a tenant in tail in possession, the transmissibility of the personal estate ceases, although the time allowed by the rule against perpetuities, has not expired, and the personal chattels become the absolute property of the tenant in tail in possession although he may be an infant and may afterwards die without having attained majority. To meet the difficulty of the chattels becoming severed from the real estate by reason of the death of an infant tenant in tail it is usual to impose a condition that the heirlooms shall not vest absolutely in any tenant in tail unless he shall attain it. In the same case Lord Cairns pointed out that none of the authorities (except Lord Hardwicke, whose views had not been followed) had doubted, but that indeed all had assumed that a general trust of chattels to go with settled estates, or to be held by persons for the time being entitled to the possession of settled estates as long as the rules of law and equity would permit, would be effectual and effectual by means of those particular words to carry the chattels to the first person with an estate of inheritance, but that that the doctrine of the same authorities was that the Court of Equity could not further protect the chattels if that person died under twenty-one and if the instrument of settlement did not contain any valid clause of defeasance in that event. In my judgment a similar rule applies where chattels are settled to follow the devolution of a dignity and to descend as heirlooms so far as the rules of law and equity will permit, and in the absence of any clause of defeasance in the instrument of settlement they will vest absolutely in the first person upon whom the dignity devolves, upon the decease of any person or persons to whom limited interests in the chattels are expressly given. In the present case, upon the decease of the third Viscount Hill, to whom the chattels were given for his life or until his death, the chattels passed absolutely to the fourth viscount, and I make a declaration accordingly.

The defendant appealed.

Brinton, for the appellant.—The effect of the words "as far as the rules of law and equity will permit" is to prevent this gift being void as offending against the law against perpetuities. The testatrix intended that these chattels should not vest absolutely in any person so long as the law allows the vesting to be postponed. The decision in Harrington v. Harrington, L. R. 5 H. L. 87, 20 W. R. H. L. Dig. 25, shows that the court will give effect to that intention by holding that the chattels do not vest absolutely in any Viscount Hill so long as there are persons living at the date of the death of the testatrix who can succeed to the title. Alternatively it is submitted that the whole gift is void as offending against the law against perpetuities and that the jewels pass under the residuary gift.

He also cited Sugden's Law of Property, p. 337; Montagu v. Lord Inchiquin, 23 W. R. 592; In re Johnston, Cockerell v. Earl of Essex, 32 W. R. 634, 26 Ch. D. 538; Dungannon v. Smith, 12 Cl. & Fin. 546.

Micklem, K.C., and Errington, for the respondent.—If this jewellery had been settled to go according to the limitations of real estate the third viscount would have taken for life and the present respondent as tenant in tail would then have taken them absolutely. There is no distinction in principle between the case of chattels settled to go with real estate and chattels settled to go with a dignity. The decision of the House of Lords in Tollemache v. Coventry, 2 Cl. & Fin. 611, governs the present case.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case Ann, Dowager Viscountess Hill, bequeathed certain jewelry to her son Rowland Clegg, Viscount Hill, "until he should die, and after his death to each and every of the persons who shall in turn succeed to the title and dignity of Viscount Hill, or any other title or dignity which may be grantd to or assumed by any person for the time being entitled to the said title or dignity of Viscount Hill, severally and successively as they shall in turn succeed to such title and dignity as aforesaid, my intention being that the said jewelry shall descend as heirlooms as far as the rules of law and equity will permit." The testatrix died on the 31st of October, 1891. Her son Rowland Clegg Hill survived his mother, and entered into possession of the said jewelry. He died on the 30th of March, 1895, and was succeeded in the title by his son Rowland Richard Clegg, Viscount Hill, the present plaintiff. The plaintiff has several brothers and half-brothers who were alive at the date of the will of the testatrix, and also at the death of her son Rowland Clegg Hill, the third viscount. The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled absolutely, or for life only, or otherwise to the said jewelry bequeathed by the said will to descend as heirlooms with the Hill title.

In my judgment the plaintiff is entitled absolutely to the said jewelry. It seems to me that the case is really concluded by the case of Tollemache v. Coventry. The words in that case were almost identical with the words in the present case. In that case a life estate was given first to the widow and the named only son of the testator. In the present case a life estate is given to the named son of the testatrix, and in each case there is what I will call the heirloom clause disposing of the heirlooms after the termination of the life estate. In the Tollemache case there were alive at the date of the will and of the death of the testator a son who took a life estate and living grandsons who might succeed to the title; and in the present case there were likewise a son, Rowland Clegg Hill, the third viscount, who took a life estate, and living grandsons who might succeed to the title; and in my judgment the House of Lords did in Tollemache v. Coventry decide that the third Lord Vere—that is to say, the first taker under the description, "such person as shall from time to time be Lord Vere"—took the heirlooms in that case absolutely. I know that this has been doubted by some of the judges who wrote opinions in Dungannon v. Smith, but, for reasons which I will give presently, I am of opinion that the House of Lords did so decide, and did not, as has been suggested, merely negative the title of the fourth Lord Vere. If this view is right, it seems difficult to see why the plaintiff must not, on the basis of that judgment, take the heirlooms absolutely. The contrary contention can only be maintained on the assumption either that the third Viscount Hill only takes a life interest in the jewelry, or that he takes no interest at all in the heirlooms as being in his turn the person bearing the title of Lord Hill. The suggestion that he only takes a life estate, or only the use of the heirlooms, seems to be based upon the argument that, as the plaintiff and his brothers were all "lives in being" at the date of the will of their grandmother, they are all persons to whom the user of, as distinguished from the property in, the heirlooms might be given; and that, therefore, in pursuance of the obvious intention of the testatrix to preserve the jewelry as heirlooms as long as possible, one ought, if possible, so to construe her will as to limit the interest of all these grandsons living at the death of the testratrix to use and enjoyment only, and to treat the will as giving the absolute property to Lord Hill, who first takes the heirlooms on the determination of the "life or lives in being," and who, therefore, must take within a period which does not offend against the rule against perpetuities. So to do would be really to give effect to the view of Sir John Leach, Vice-Chancellor of England, in the Tollemache case, when before him under the name of Deerhurst v. St. Albans, 5 Madd. 232. This view he thus expresses: "By the rules of law and equity, any person living at the death of the testator, who should become Lord Vere, might be limited to the use and enjoyment only. The son and the grandson of the testator were living at his death, and were both limited to the use and enjoyment only; but the child who succeeded the grandson as Lord Vere and Duke of St. Albans was not living at the death of the testator, and could not, therefore, by the rules of law and equity, be limited to use and enjoyment only. He took, therefore, an absolute interest." But whatever else may be doubtful in the decision of the House of Lords, there can be no doubt but that they negatived this view of Sir John Leach; for they held that the great-grandson did not take at all. It follows that in the present case it is impossible to treat all the persons living at the date of the will of the testatrix as taking (if they take at all as holders of the title) life estates—that is, mere use and enjoyment. Neither do I think it possible to hold that the present plaintiff takes no interest. The ground on which I understand it is suggested that this may be the case is that the bequest to the person for the time being holding the title (even when qualified with the words "as far as the rules of law and equity will permit") is void as including persons who possibly might come into existence at a time so remote as to offend against the rule against perpetuities; and that, if such bequest is void as regards one person who might fall within the category of those the testatrix meant to benefit in succession, it is void as to all. I cannot assent to this argument. The answer to it is admirably put by Sir C. Pepys (afterwards Lord Cottenham) and Mr. Preston in the argument in Tollemache v. Coventry, as reported 2 Cl. & Fin., p. 617, in which it is pointed out that the first member of the series, the Lords Vere, the first taker of the title of Lord Vere after the survivor of the holders of the life estate in the heirlooms, takes under a bequest which must of necessity vest, if it ever vests, in some person who either was in existence at the time of the testator's death, or would come into existence within the compass of a life in being at that time, or within a few months after the dropping of such life, and was, therefore, good in law; whereas the executory bequest over to the person who would be Lord Vere next in succession after such first taker of the title was not a bequest which must of necessity vest in any person who would be in existence at the testator's death, or within any life then in being, or twenty-one years after the dropping of any such life, and, therefore, was not valid. The first member of this series must take on the death of the tenant for life, and, therefore, at not too remote a period, although the second and all the later members might take beyond the limits fixed by the rule against perpetuities; and I do not quite understand why Cresswell, J., in Dungannon v. Smith, 12 Cl. & Fin. 546, at p. 566, says that the whole of the reasoning of Lord Brougham in Tollemache v. Coventry shows that the executory bequest after the death of the second Lord Vere was void because it possibly might not vest in due time, and that the decision, therefore, must be taken to have been, not that the bequest was good as to the third Lord Vere, but that it was bad as to the fourth. I see nothing in the reasoning of Lord Brougham inconsistent with his adoption of the argument of Sir C. Pepys and Mr. Preston; and Lord St. Leonards, who, in his Law of Property (1st ed.), p. 336, seems to have doubted this, himself in the case of Ker v. Lord Dungannon, 1 Dr. & War. 509, at p. 536, refers to the decision of the House in Tollemache v. Coventry as having been to that effect. The decision in this sense seems to me to have been frequently recognized in later cases: see the decisions of Mr. Justice—afterwards Lord Justice—Fry in Exmouth v. Praed and In re Johnston, Cockerell v. Earl of Essex. I wish to make an observation on Harrington v. Harrington, which was much pressed upon us in argument. Mr. Brinton argued that that case showed that the words "as far as the rules of law and equity permit" would justify the court in holding that no Lord Hill could claim the jewelry absolutely, so long as there were persons living at the date of the death of the testatrix who could succeed to the title. But that case turned upon a proviso preventing the personalty from vesting absolutely in a tenant in tail unless he should attain twenty-one, and it was contended that the proviso had the effect of carrying on to those who came next in remainder after the taker on the determination of the life estate, so exposing itself to be rendered void as aiming at perpetuity; but the House held that the proviso was an essential part of the gift, and, therefore, controlled by the words in the dispositive clause "so far as the rules of law and equity permit." The effect of this was to limit the proviso so as that it should only apply to tenants in tail who took by purchase, and, consequently, it could not be said that the proviso was void as aiming at perpetuity. For the reasons I have given I think that the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., must be affirmed, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree with the judgment that has been just delivered. I think in particular we are bound by the decision of the House of Lords in Tollemache v. Coventry. I think that the ratio decidendi in that case cannot be more clearly, or more compendiously, stated than in the following passage: [His lordship read the passage from p. 617, "The gift was to a class of persons" to "was not valid," and continued:] It is true that these sentences are not found in the report of what was said by the Lord Chancellor in advising the House of Lords in that case, but occur at the commencement of the argument of Sir Christopher Pepys and Mr. Preston; nevertheless I think that they do form the ground-work of the decision of the House of Lords. The most difficult step, in my opinion, appears to be the first—namely, that the gift was to a class of persons in succession—viz., Lords Vere, and not to individuals. Now, a large portion of what was said by the Lord Chancellor is devoted to dealing with that proposition. He appears to me to sum it up and put it abundantly clear at p. 631. [His lordship read the passage from "It is a fallacy" to "came to be Lord Vere," and continued:] As regards the distinction which is drawn in the argument, between the difference in the position, with reference to the rule against perpetuities, of the first taker of the title of Lord Vere after the death of the survivor and the testator's widow and son and that of the person who would be Lord Vere next in succession, it is not explicitly stated in what was said by the Lord Chancellor, but I cannot but think that there is a distinction to which his lordship alluded when towards the end of his judgment he says this on p. 633: "I must run in the face of authority if I denied the third Lord Vere's right, but I have no decision nor any authority supporting the other."

For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed, the plaintiff being, in accordance with what was decided by the House of Lords, absolutely entitled.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—If it were now open for decision, I think it might be reasonable to hold that the words "as far as the rules of law and equity will permit" should be treated as a direction so to frame the limitations that the heirlooms should go with the title as long as possible, or in other words to regard the trust as an executory trust. But it has long been settled that such is not the effect of these words. It only remains to construe the words as they stand. I think it is not possible to avoid the conclusion that the present viscount takes the jewels and heirlooms, and that there is no shifting clause in favour of the successor in title. I entirely agree with the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., and I do not desire to add anything.

BIRCH v. BIRCH. (a.)

Practice—New trial—Allegation of fraud—Res judicata —Probate suit—Evidence.

A judgment obtained in a probate action may be set aside if it has been procured by the fraud of a party to the action, notwithstanding the innocence of other parties to the action having the same interest. But a party seeking to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud must, in order to succeed, adduce evidence to show that there is a reasonable probability of the alleged fraud being established. Accordingly, where an action was brought to set aside a judgment granting probate of a will on the ground that since the judgment a document, which, however, could not have been put into evidence, had come into the hands of the police confessing that the will was a forgery,

Held, that the action ought to be dismissed, on the ground that the matter was res judicata.

Decision of Barnes, J. (ante, p. 192), reversed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Barnes, J. (reported ante, p. 192), refusing an application by the defendants for the dismissal of the action on the grounds that the question raised had been already heard and adjudicated upon and that the action was frivolous and vexatious.

The facts were thus stated in the written judgment of Cozens-Hardy, L.J.:

"The facts, so far as admitted or proved beyond question, may be shortly stated. Arthur Birch died in April, 1899. No will being forthcoming, letters of administration were granted to Walter George Birch, Edwin Birch, and Jesse Joseph Birch. In the month of December, 1899, two actions were brought, one by Mrs. Guise as plaintiff against the three administrators, and Charles Birch and Henry Birch as defendants, and the other by Edwin Birch, Jesse Joseph Birch, and Amy Birch as plaintiffs against Walter George Birch as defendant. These actions were consolidated. Each action claimed revocation of the letters of administration, and probate was claimed of an alleged will of the 18th of December, 1897, or alternatively, of alleged instructions for a will dated the 8th of December, 1897. The document of the 18th of December was the first which was produced, it being forwarded from America by one Sanders, who, with one Ford, appeared to be the attesting witnesses. The instructions, which were subsequently forwarded from America, purported to be attested by the same two witnesses, and also by Mr. Barnes. Walter George Birch pleaded that both of these documents were not signed by the deceased, or by anyone at his direction, and that they were not executed according to the provisions of the statute. The consolidated action came on for trial before the President without a jury on the 22nd of June, 1900. Neither Sanders nor Ford was forthcoming. The existence of such a person as Ford was challenged. Expert evidence as to handwriting was given for and against the will. Barnes, however, was called as a witness, and severely cross-examined; and in the result the President pronounced for the force and validity of the will of the 18th of December, and ordered the letters of administration to be revoked. So far as appears, all the next-of-kin were parties to the consolidated action. The present action was commenced by W. G. Birch as plaintiff against Edwin Birch and Amy Birch, the executors of the will, and it asked that the probate of the pretended will of the 18th of December might be revoked. The writ has since been amended by adding the next-of-kin, and also Henry Guise, the husband of Ada Rose Guise, as defendants. The statement of claim contains the following allegations: "(3) The said judgment was obtained against the plaintiff by the fraud of Frederick Charles Barnes, Alfred Sanders, and a person passing by the name of W. G. Ford, and Henry Guise, the husband of Ada Rose Guise, one of the plaintiffs in the aforesaid consolidated action. (4) In July, 1899, the said Alfred Sanders, at the instigation of and in conjunction with the said Henry Guise, drew up and forged the pretended will dated the 18th of December, 1897. The said Alfred Sanders, in pursuance of the said fraud and at the expense of the said Henry Guise, went to Baltimore, United States of America, and from there wrote a letter, dated the 28th of August, 1899, falsely describing the circumstances under which the said pretended will was executed. (5) In September, 1899, in further pursuance of the said fraud, the said Alfred Sanders drew up and forged a document purporting to be a will executed by the said deceased on the 8th of December, 1897. The said Alfred Sanders was instigated to draw up and forge the said document, dated the 8th of December, 1897, by the said W. G. Ford, acting on behalf of and as the agent of the said Henry Guise. The said Alfred Sanders, W. G. Ford, and Frederick Charles Barnes fraudulently signed the said document as attesting witnesses to the due execution thereof by the said deceased. (6) In pursuance of the said fraud the said Henry Guise and Frederick Charles Barnes falsely represented upon oath to the court that they were strangers to and unacquainted with each other prior to on or about the 29th of July, 1899. (7) In further pursuance of the said fraud the said Henry Guise and Frederick Charles Barnes concealed from the court the fact that the said W. G. Ford had been in personal communication with the said Alfred Sanders between the 13th of July, 1899, and the 15th of November, 1899." The defendants moved before Barnes, J., to stay proceedings in this action. No evidence was filed in support of the motion, but the plaintiff filed an affidavit by himself stating that the will of the 18th of December was entirely in the handwriting of Sanders, and verifying a letter, dated the 10th of September, 1900, from a Mrs. Smith, of San Francisco, addressed to the authorities at Scotland-yard, enclosing what purported to be a confession by Sanders that he had forged the will at the suggestion and with the help of the defendant Henry Guise, then Henry Bagley. In this state of things Barnes, J., held that the court had jurisdiction to set aside the judgment obtained by fraud, and that the action must be allowed to proceed. On the appeal an opportunity was afforded to the parties to adduce further evidence, the nature of which I may shortly state. There was expert evidence, to which I do not attach any great importance, as to the letter enclosing the confession and the confession itself being in the handwriting of Sanders, who also wrote the will. There was evidence intended to prove, or at least to suggest, that Barnes was well known to Henry Guise (formerly Bagley) before the so-called accidental meeting, and, indeed, that there had been previous monetary transactions between them. On the other hand, Barnes and Henry Guise made affidavits entirely denying this, reasserting the truth of the evidence which they gave at the trial before the President, and suggesting that a mistake had been made between Henry Bagley and his brother, James Bagley. The latter, who appears to be a respectable witness, has made an affidavit stating his own connection with Barnes, and thus confirming to some extent the evidence of Barnes and Henry Guise. Barnes, J., held, upon a consideration of the authorities, that the suit could be maintained. In a probate suit a number of persons might be interested who were not parties, and it followed that, if someone interested was guilty of fraud, it affected the whole litigation. To take a hypothetical case, if a will was put forward and executors named in it, and witnesses were procured, the executors might propound the will in all innocency, although it had been obtained by fraud. It would be absurd to allow such a document to stand. It was clear that Mr. Guise had an interest in the suit, and was acting in his wife's interest. If fraud were established, they would not be entitled under the will. His lordship carefully abstained from expressing any opinion one way or the other upon the merits of the case. But, the plaintiff having sworn to the facts which he alleged, the suit must be allowed to proceed, and the motion must be refused. Henry Guise must be added as a defendant. This was accordingly done."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Some of the defendants appealed.

Inderwick, K.C., for the respondent.

The case stood over to enable further evidence to be put in on both sides. When it came on again for hearing.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We think that the judgment must be reversed, but it is right to state that the evidence before us is very different from that before Barnes, J. The question, which in form has to be decided in the present case, is whether or not the action ought to be stayed as being frivolous and vexatious, and whether the statement of claim ought to be struck out as disclosing no cause of action. Now, as to the former part of the question—that is, whether the action is frivolous and vexatious—one is bound to include as an element to be considered the fact that there has already been a judgment binding the plaintiff, affirming the signature of the will of the 18th of December, 1897, to be the signature of the testator Arthur Birch, and by necessary implication the attestation by the witnesses of the will, and by the terms of the judgment as delivered the attestation of the instructions for the 8th of December for the will. And I think that the court ought to treat as frivolous and vexatious any cause of action in support of which the plaintiff does not produce evidence of facts discovered since the judgment which raise a reasonable probability of the action succeeding. But I do not think that it can be laid down as a hard and fast rule that the evidence thus produced must be of such a character that it would be evidence in the action itself. I can quite conceive of a case in which there was evidence of a fact which would not be evidence in the action itself, which evidence would nevertheless make it impossible to say that there was not a reasonable prospect of the action to set aside the judgment being successful. Suppose a case of the judgment based on the validity of a document vouched by one witness alone; suppose that that witness had sent to the police authorities a confession that the document was forged by him, and that that witness had written to say that he desired to return from abroad to give himself up for trial for the offence of forgery; suppose that the witness had actually taken ship for the purpose of coming to England and surrendering for his trial; and suppose that he was accompanied by an English police officer sent to meet him; suppose then that the ship is reported as lost; none of the matters included in this hypothetical case could be had as evidence on the trial of the action. But I do not think that it would be possible to describe the action as frivolous and vexatious, nor do I think that in such a case the weight to be given to the principle interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium is such as to compel the court to stay as frivolous and vexatious an action brought to set aside a judgment. I should think that in such a case the action ought to go on, so as to give the plaintiff the opportunity of discovery in the action. Nor do I think that in such a case the discovery could properly be described as fishing. But in each case it is a question of degree. Is the fact alleged to have been discovered so evidenced and so material as to make it reasonably probable that the action will succeed? If it is, I think the action ought not to be stayed. In the present case my brethren do not think that the evidence of the handwriting of Sanders and the contents of the letter forwarded to the police are sufficient, even in a case in which the evidence which led to the judgment raised in the mind of the judge who tried the case, considerable doubt, if not suspicion, and I do not think I ought to differ from them on such a question.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, L.J., and I entirely agree with it.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., after stating the facts as above, continued: Now it is plain that in the action tried before the President the distinct issue was raised whether the alleged will was signed by Birch. The judgment in that action is binding upon the plaintiff unless and until set aside. This is not an appeal by the plaintiff from that judgment, or an application for a new trial. The present action is an independent proceeding to set aside that judgment on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. I do not doubt that such an action may be maintained, at least when the judgment has been procured by the fraud of a party to the action. Here Henry Guise, against whom fraud is alleged, was acting for and as the agent of his wife, who was a party, and she must be affected by his fraud. In Boswell v. Coaks (No. 2), A. L. Smith, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal, after dealing with the case against the defendant Coaks, who was alone charged with the fraud, proceeded as follows: "As regards the point taken by the Solicitor-General for the other defendants—viz., that the judgment can only be set aside, if at all, against those who procured it by fraud, and it is not suggested that the other defendants had anything to do with the fraud alleged, this point appears to us to be fatal as regards all the defendants except Coaks, and we think it would be fatal to any further action to set aside the sale of the whole." But I do not think this limitation can apply to a probate action. The will is either good or bad against all the world. The defendants other than Mrs. Guise cannot, therefore, rely upon their not having had anything to do with the fraud of Mrs. Guise's agent. The judgments of the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in Boswell v. Coaks (No. 2), 6 The Reports, 175, contain some important observations as to the mode in which a motion such as that which is now before us ought to be dealt with. Lord Selborne points out that it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to allege fraud. It is the duty of the court to receive such evidence, pro and con, as is material to the question whether there really has been, since the former judgment, a new discovery of something material to disturb the former judgment; and A. L. Smith, L.J., states that the plaintiff must show a reasonable possibility of the alleged fraud being established. It is plain that paragraph 3 of the claim is of no importance. A mere general allegation of fraud, without particulars, cannot avail. As to paragraphs 4 and 5, they are based solely on the alleged "confession." But, assuming that document to be written by Sanders, there is no possible mode of making it evidence in the present action. It is not known whether Sanders is alive, and there is no reasonable possibility of the alleged forgery being established. As to paragraph 6, this allegation does not seem to me to be directly material to the judgment. It only goes to the credit of two of the witnesses who were examined and cross-examined on this very point. It would be highly dangerous to allow a solemn judgment to be set aside on the ground of alleged perjury by witnesses dealing with a collateral point, more especially when the alleged perjury is absolutely, and with considerable appearance of probability, denied. Upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that upon the materials before us, which are different from those before Barnes, J., this motion ought to succeed. It is not for us to say whether the President arrived at a right decision upon the evidence before him. That must be assumed in the absence of an appeal. If the present plaintiff were appealing, and all questions of time were got rid of, he might apply for leave to adduce further evidence on the appeal. But I think such an application must have failed. Such a document as the alleged confession, which cannot be adduced in evidence, must be wholly disregarded. No documentary evidence recently discovered is suggested. A mere suspicion is not sufficient. The supposition which I have made of an appeal, coupled with an application to adduce fresh evidence, is probably too favourable to the present plaintiff. Certainly the plaintiff cannot be in a better position when he seeks to set aside a solemn judgment. The importance of finality in litigation is very great; and I think it would be wrong to allow the issue to be again tried between these parties as to the validity of the will, which has been admitted to probate. In my opinion the order of Barnes, J., should be discharged, and an order made in the terms of the notice of motion, and the plaintiff must pay the costs here and below.

THE COURT directed that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the executors in the court below.

MONTGOMERY & Co. v. THE INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE INSURANCE Co. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance, Marine—General average sacrifice — Joint ownership of ship and cargo—Liability of underwriters.

A sacrifice made to avert perils of the sea is a general average act, quite independently of unity or diversity of ownership. Although the assured is the owner both of ship and of cargo, the underwriters of a policy on cargo are liable to pay his loss by reason of the deduction made by the underwriters of the policy on the ship in respect of his contribution as the owner of cargo.

Decision of Mathew, J., 49 W. R. 221, [1901] 1 K. B. 147, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mathew, J., sitting in the Commercial Court, without a jury (reported 49 W. R. 221, [1901] 1 K. B. 147).

The facts were as follows: The plaintiffs were the owners of a ship name The Airlie, and also of a cargo of nitrate on board it, on which cargo the defendants had subscribed a policy of marine insurance at and from any ports or places on the west coast of South America to any port of call and/or discharge in the United Kingdom.

The policy was one of insurance against the perils of the sea and other losses of the same character, and contained the usual sue labour and travel clause.

During a voyage with a cargo of nitrate from Tocopilla, a port on the west coast of South America, to Shields, The Airlie encountered, on the 17th of May, 1900, very bad weather with a heavy cross sea in the latitude of the River Plate, and began to roll and lurch violently. About 9 a.m. it was noticed that the mainmast, which was of iron, and hollow, had settled down; and the rigging was accordingly tightened by a process called "swiftening up." The ship, however, continued to roll, and the master, fearing that the mast would break and fall on deck and cause the loss of the vessel, decided to get rid of it. The ship was brought into position, the windward rigging was cut, and the mast fell on the side, carrying away portions of the other mast and rigging. The wreckage was promptly cut adrift, and the vessel was brought safely home under jury rig.

The plaintiffs brought this action under the policy to recover a general average loss incurred by the cutting away of the mainmast and rigging.

Mathew, J. (after deciding on the facts that the cutting away was a general average sacrifice), held, not following the judgment of Barnes, J., in The Brigella, [1893] P. 189, 41 W. R. Dig. 92, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, notwithstanding that they were the owners both of ship and of cargo, so that as between those interests there was in fact no contribution to general average.

The defendant appealed.

Scrutton, K.C., and Lochnis, for the appellant.—Mathew, J., was wrong in holding that the cargo owner is liable to pay any sum which he can recover from the underwriter. The true theory of the subject is contained in Holt's Laws of Navigation (1846), p. 482, where general average is defined as "the common law and justice of partnership." Whether the subject be regarded as Rhodian law or as matter of contract, there must be more than one interest in the adventure or there can be no general average. General average must be treated altogether apart from insurance. The shipowner as such can never sue the underwriter on goods, but must sue the owner of the goods. The underwriter is only liable when the dispute between the ship and cargo owners has been determined at law, since he is only liable to make good what his assured is liable to pay. But a man cannot sue himself, and no law is necessary to enable a man to deal with his own as he likes.

Carver, K.C., and J. A. Hamilton, K.C., for the respondent. — The question is not one of general average pure and simple as between the parties to the adventure, but one of insurance and what are the losses and risks which underwriters undertake. Contribution is a consequence of general average where the interests differ, it is not a characteristic of general average. The unity of property does not alter the nature of the loss. There is no authority for the appellant here and for the view taken by Barnes, J. in The Brigella, except Parsons. Though the liability to pay general average is admitted, it is never expressly mentioned in policies. The cutting of the mast was a general average loss which has to be distributed, and the underwriters must pay any general average loss which falls on their assured. Barnes, J., and the appellants here take the view that the underwriter is only liable to make good a contribution when contribution has been made, but this is contrary to Aitchison v. Lohre. The theory running through all the authorities is that a loss such as this is a loss by perils of the sea within the policy, and is distributed by law over the two portions of the adventure. It is a voluntary sacrifice for the benefit of the whole adventure: Emerigon, c. 12, s. 39. The mast was cut away to save lives, saving of property is only incidental.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 25.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., delivered the following judgment of the court: This case raises a question of great importance. It is admitted that the case would give rise to a general average claim if the ship and cargo belonged to different owners, but it is said that there can be no general average claim because both ship and cargo belonged to the plaintiffs, and as there was no contribution there can be no general average loss. We have to determine whether the holding of Mathew, J., that a general average act is not affected by the consideration whether there will be contribution or not, or the contrary opinion of Barnes, J., in The Brigella, is the right view. We agree so entirely with the view of Mathew, J., and his reasons for it that we should not think it necessary to add a word to those reasons did we not feel bound to deal with the reasons given by Barnes, J., and to state our view of the principles on which the law of general average should be based. Barnes, J., seems to think, firstly, that there can be no general average act or loss without separate interests in the adventure, contribution being of the essence of general average, and diversity of interests essential to contribution; and, further, that even if there can be a general average act where ship, cargo, and freight belong to the same owner, yet the law of contribution cannot apply, since the right of contribution belongs only to the adventurer who has an interest at risk against one whose goods have been saved by the general average act, and an adventurer cannot possibly sue himself in respect of the salvage of one part of his property by the sacrifice of another. It is said, further, that the fact of the insurance of ship, freight, and cargo with different underwriters makes no difference, since the underwriters have only a subrogated right which they would have to enforce in the name of the assured, as the owner of the property sacrificed, against the same person as the owner of the property saved. It is also said that the obligation to contribute exists between the parties irrespective of whether they are insured or not.

We think that the question whether contribution is of the essence of a general average loss or only an incident of it must depend on the occasion of the general average act, and that it is not only danger to ship, freight, and cargo which necessitates and justifies a sacrifice. It may be made in fear of death, and if it be made on a proper occasion all must bear the loss, the several owners, if more than one, contributing according to the value of their interest, while if therebe but one owner he must bear it all. The object of the maritime law of general average is, we think, to give the master of the ship, absolute freedom to make any sacrifice he deems best to avert the perils of the sea, and such a sacrifice is a general average act quite independently of unity or diversity of ownership.

But there remains the question whether the underwriters of a policy on cargo can be held liable to pay to an owner of ship and cargo the contribution which the cargo owner, if he had been a different person to the shipowner, would have had to pay the latter in respect of the general average loss incurred by the cutting away of the mast. It is urged that the shipowner could not have recovered this contribution against himself as cargo owner, and that the underwriter on cargo is therefore not liable to recoup him for a contribution which he could not be compelled to pay, since the underwriter is only bound to indemnify the cargo owner for a contribution which he could be made to pay, for a loss which he has suffered. If this be so, the converse must also be true—that the underwriter on the ship must pay the whole loss incurred by the sacrifice without getting any contribution from cargo belonging to the shipowner and benefited by the sacrifice; but we do not think this view is the true one. Take first the case of the shipowner who has insured his ship, and suffers a general average sacrifice by the cutting away of the mast, and suppose that there is cargo on board belonging to the shipowner. In this case we think the underwriter on ship is liable to pay the loss incurred by the sacrifice less the contribution by the shipowner on account of the cargo; and there is nothing in Dickenson v. Jardine to prevent this, since the shipowner has his contribution as cargo owner in his pocket, and his loss can be ascertained as the cost of replacing the mast less this contribution. In Dickenson v. Jardine jettison was expressly covered by the policy, and as the assured had not received the contributions of the other owners, the underwiter could recover them in his name on indemnifying him; here there is no contribution to be recovered, and the assured's loss is pro tanto reduced before he makes his claim on the underwriter, since he has his own contribution in his pocket. But if the policy is on cargo, what is the liability of the underwriter on cargo? Surely, to pay the shipowner's loss by reason of the deduction made by the underwriter on the ship in respect of his contribution as the owner of the cargo, and mutatis mutandis the result is the same if the sacrifice is a jettison of cargo, and ship and cargo have a common owner. As to the underwriter's right, where this is the case, to deduct the contribution due from ship or cargo, as the case may be, I will quote the words of Shaw, C.J., in Greeley v. Tremont Insurance Co., where, after stating that the underwriter is liable directly to the assured for a general average loss without waiting to collect the contributions from other owners, he says: "But this rule does not apply where the assured is owner of vessel and cargo. Then, as owner of the cargo, being bound to contribute, he is deemed to have the contribution in his own hands, and is therefore clearly pro tanto indemnified, and cannot collect of the underwriter a sum of money to be recovered back by the underwriter himself." We think this passage is quite right, and a correct working out of the principle on which the law of general average is based; and it seems to obviate any difficulty arising from the fact that a man cannot sue himself, and from the legal proposition that the underwriter's only right in respect of collection of contributions is to sue in the assured's name. There is nothing in it contrary to English authority, though no English case expressly decides the point; but there are a dictum of Lord Campbell in Moran v. Jones, and an opinion of Blackburn, J., in Oppenheim v. Fry. Lord Campbell said, "Where there are separate insurances on ship and freight the calculation must be made as to the amount of the contribution by each, although the whole freight which was in peril is to be received by the owner of the ship, and without insurance the whole loss would fall on him." And Blackburn, J., said, "I think it is not necessary for the decision of this case to say whether the extraordinary expenditure was general average or not, though I have a strong impression that where a voluntary sacrifice is made for the benefit of the whole adventure, it is general average, whether the ship, cargo, and freight belong to one or to different adventures." Against this there is only the opinion of Barnes, J., in The Brigella. American authority is strongly in favour of Mathew, J.'s, view, and the whole question is well discussed by Storey, C J., in Potter v. Ocean Insurance Co.; "But it is urged that here there can be no contribution of freight or cargo, and that therefore it is a particular average on the ship and not general average, on the ground that what is and is not general average does not depend on the nature and objects of the sacrifice made, but only only on the question whether there are different subjects to contribute. I think the rule as to what constitutes general average is founded on the consideration whether it is for the benefit of all interested in the voyage or only for that of a particular interest. Suppose an owner of ship and cargo, and ultimately of the freight also, who insures the three interests with different underwriters. If any sacrifice is made for the common benefit, this is clearly general average, and all the underwriters must contribute; and it can make no difference that the three interests were insured with the same underwriters, or that there was no insurance or only one interest insured. The loss is still a general average, or in the nature of one. General average means a voluntary sacrifice as distinguished from an involuntary loss, and the question is whether the act is intended for the benefit of all concerned, not who are to contribute. If there is an insurance the underwriters are pro tanto benefited, and are bound to contribute."

Generally we think they have throughout the adventure such inchoate property and liability to loss as makes it right to take their right to contribution and their loss into consideration in the final account. Moreover, our view of the law is in accordance with the practice of average staters and underwriters both before and since The Brigella, and this practice is really essential in applying the law of general average to present-day conditions of navigation. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

WHITBREAD & CO. v. WATT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser — Deposit — Vendor's lien — Rescission of contract by purchaser under clause in contract—No default by vendor.

The lien that a purchaser of land has on the land for so much of the purchase-money as is paid by way of deposit exists so long as, and in every case in which, the right to recover the deposit has not been lost by reason of the misconduct of the purchaser. It continues to be operative therefore in a case in which the purchaser himself rescinds the contract under a clause thereof which enables him so to do.

Decision of Farwell, J., 49 W. R. 534, [1901] 1 Ch. 911, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported 49 W. R. 534, [1901] 1 Ch. 911).

By a contract dated the 25th of January, 1897, the plaintiffs agreed to purchase from F. Saunders a freehold plot on the Woodhouse estate, a building estate of Saunders, for the sum of £500, to be paid as to £200 by way of deposit on the signing of the contract and as to the balance of £300 on the completion of the purchase with interest.

The contract provided:

Clause 3. "The purchase is to be completed as soon as 300 houses shall have been erected on the said estate (but without prejudice to clause 10 hereof) at the office of the vendor's solicitors, and the purchasers are to have possession as from the day of completion, when the balance of purchase-money, with interest as aforesaid, is to be paid. All outgoings up to that time will be cleared by the vendor, his heirs or assigns."

Clause 9 enabled the vendor to cancel the contract if the purchasers made any requisition which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to comply with.

Clause 10. "If 300 houses shall not be erected on the said Woodhouse estate within two years from the date of this agreement, the purchasers shall have the right, by giving seven days' notice in writing to the vendor, to rescind and cancel this agreement, and at the expiration of such seven days the agreement shall absolutely cease and determine."

Clause 11. "In the event of either the vendor or the purchasers, cancelling this contract by virtue of any of the powers herein given, no costs, expenses, loss or damage of any kind whatsoever shall be claimed or paid from one to the other, but the deposit without interest shall be paid by the vendor to the purchasers."

The plaintiffs paid Saunders the deposit of £200 on signing this contract. Saunders afterwards sold and conveyed the Woodhouse estate to Saxelby, who mortgaged it. In November, 1900, the mortgagees sold and conveyed the estate to the defendant Watt with notice of the contract of the 25th of January, 1897. The 300 houses were not built, and Saunders did not pay or account for the deposit to any of his successors in title.

On the 3rd of December, 1900, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant rescinding the contract of the 25th of January, 1897, and claiming repayment of the deposit-money. The defendant refused payment.

At the date of the rescission Saunders was a bankrupt.

The plaintiffs thereupon took out an originating summons claiming (1) a declaration that under the contract of the 25th of January, 1897, the plaintiffs were entitled to a charge or lien on the hereditaments therein described by way of security for the repayment of the deposit of £200 paid by them to Saunders on signing the contract; (2) enforcement of the said security by foreclosure or sale.

Farwell, J., gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

Brinton, for the defendant.—It is admitted that if a contract goes off otherwise than by the default of the purchaser he has a right to recover the money he has paid by way of deposit. It is also the fact that in some cases the purchaser may have a lien on the land for which he has paid the deposit. The one right does not, however, necessarily involve the other, and the court may refuse to declare that a purchaser has a lien on the land in a case where he has a perfect right to recover his deposit. [STIRLING L.J.—The theory of Rose v. Watson, 12 W. R. 585, 10 H. L. Cas. 672, was that by paying money the purchaser acquired a lien on the land.] In Rose v. Watson the vendor was in default. That case leaves it still open as to what is to happen where neither the vendor nor the purchaser is in default. The right to a lien on the land which the purchaser is said in that case to acquire is subject to him not rescinding. If he elects to rescind, as in the present case, he has no right to a lien, and Rose v. Watson does not apply.

He also cited Howe v. Smith, 32 W. R. 802, 27 Ch. D. 89; Wythes v. Lee, 4 W. R. 184, 316, 3 Drew. 396; Ewing v. Osbaldiston, 2 My. & Cr. 53, at p. 88; Rodger v. Harrison, 41 W. R. 291, [1893] 1 Q. B. 161; Levy v. Stogdon, [1898] 1 Ch. 478, 46 W. R. Dig. 173; Cornwall v. Henson, 48 W. R. 42, 49 W. R. 42, [1900] 2 Ch. 298.

Hon. Frank Russell, for the plaintiffs.—Where a purchaser pays part of the purchase-money by way of deposit a lien arises and vests in him for repayment of the deposit The lien is not affected by the contract going off, so long as he is not the party in default. The appellant is really contending that the lien arises by the conduct of the parties. That is not so, it arises on the contract. The principle established by Wythes v. Lee and Rose v. Watson covers the present case.

Brinton replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think this appeal fails. When one speaks of the lien that the purchaser gets one is speaking not of a thing which is the result of any express contract, but of some right in the purchaser which has been invented (and to that extent it is a fiction) for the purpose of doing that which is just and bringing about a just result. That is a fiction which has to be resorted to not only in equity, but at law. For instance when you bring your action for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff, it is not true, but it is the way in which the law puts it to do justice. When Lord Westbury speaks in Rose v. Watson of "a transfer to the purchaser of the ownership of a part of the estate corresponding to the purchase-money paid," and Lord Cranworth of the purchaser being exactly in the position of a mortgagee of the estate to the extent of the money which has been paid, all those expressions are merely verbal vehicles to carry the right which justice demands that the purchaser should have. Having read the report of Rose v. Watson, I must say that I agree with Mr. Brinton to this extent, that that decision does not expressly carry the lien of the purchaser beyond a case where the contract has gone off through the default of the vendor. Mr. Brinton admits that the purchaser immediately upon paying the money gets either a lien or an inchoate right of lien—I do not think it makes much difference what you call it; he agrees, I understand, that is a vested right, but he says that that right or inchoate right of lien is defeasible not only in the case (as everybody admits) of the purchaser himself being in default, but also in the case where the purchaser elects without any default of the vendor to rescind the contract. He says that if the purchaser chooses to give up a contract, not being driven thereto by any default of the vendor, he not only gives up the contract, but he gives up the lien or the inchoate lien which is the creature of the contract. I agree Rose v. Watson does not absolutely negative that view, although I think that the illustration given by Lord Cranworth of the mortgage goes a very long way to do so. No one, I suppose, would suggest that, if you had a contract with a clause giving the purchaser a right to rescind, and the purchaser really had a mortgage on the land for the purchase-money that he paid, that he would lose his mortgage because he elected to rescind the contract. In this state of things, one would, on the assumption that Rose v. Watson has more or less left the point open, look to see what the other cases say, and Mr. Russell has, I think, most properly cited a statement of the law by Kindersley, V.C., in Wythes v. Lee. The learned judge said: "The point most discussed and most important was this abstract question. Suppose a person absolute beneficial owner in fee of an estate contracts to sell it and the purchaser pays a deposit in part payment of the purchase-money and by reason of the vendor being unable to make a title or from any other reason not being misconduct on either side the contract goes off and cannot be completed: has the purchaser a lien on the estate for his deposit? That is the most important question." And then he goes on to decide that in such a case the purchaser has a lien. That statement of the law by Kindersley, V.C., covers this case, and, it follows, in my judgment, that the decision of Farwell, J., is right and ought to be affirmed.

I do not mean by having thus attempted to give reasons of my own in any way to depart from or vary the reasons that Farwell, J., has given in his judgment. It seems to me an extremely clear and forcible judgment, and I am not very sanguine that I have added to it anything by what I have said in my judgment now, but I was very much struck as the judgment was being read with what Farwell, J., said as to the common condition. "If the purchaser makes or insists upon any requisition or objection to the title which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply with, the vendor may rescind." The learned judge said: "There is no default there, but I venture to think it would not be arguable, and I do not think counsel for the defendant contended that the purchaser in such a case would have no right to a lien in the same way as if the purchase went off by reason of a want of title on the part of the vendor. It is not default, it is rather misfortune." I think to-day Mr. Brinton was so pressed with that passage that he ceased to say that he could not argue that the purchaser's lien would be lost in such a case, and he did assert that it would be lost.

For the reasons which I have given, and for the very cogent reasons which Farwell, J., has given, I think this appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and after the judgment of Farwell, J., with which I entirely agree, and also that of Vaughan Williams, L.J., in which I also agree, I have very little to add. I think it is quite true, as Mr. Brinton has contended, that the question of the existence of the purchaser's lien for his deposit arises in this case in circumstances which differ from those of previous cases. The contract here has been brought to an end, not by any act or default of the vendor, but by reason of the purchaser exercising a power of rescinding which is reserved to him by the contract itself. That circumstance does not seem to have occurred in any previous case. Nevertheless in the judgment in the two leading cases on the subject, Wythes v. Lee, before Kindersley, V.C., and Rose v. Watson, in the House of Lords, the rule is stated in terms which cover the present case. And, if one looks at what after all is the foundation of the whole doctrine—namely, the desire to do justice as between vendor and purchaser, it appears to me that that reason applies not less forcibly to the present case than in the ordinary cases in which the rescission of the contract takes place by reason of some default on the part of the vendor. I think in a case where the vendor has rescinded under the common condition it would be absolute injustice if the purchaser were not allowed to have a lien for the purchase-money which he had paid, and which was the security on his part for the performance by him of his contract. And I think here also the justice of the case applies to give the purchaser his lien.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I think the lien for the deposit exists so long as, and in every case in which, the right to recover the deposit has not been lost by reason of the misconduct of the purchaser. In other words, when the contract goes off either by reason of the default of the vendor or without any default on the part of the purchaser the lien becomes operative. It would be shocking injustice if the purchaser's lien were to be lost in the common case of a rescission by the vendor under the common form condition. Such a rescission is not unlawful, is not a breach of contract, and is not any default on the part of the vendor.

Solicitor—Client—Commission received by solicitor with knowledge of client—Bargain with client—Independent advice.

A solicitor may bargain with his client provided that the client is fully informed and duly and honestly advised, so that the solicitor and client are substantially at arm's length and on an equal footing, though he may not accept from his client, while the relation of solicitor and client exists, remuneration for his professional services beyond that to which he is legally entitled.

The vendor of a patent promised a firm of solicitors a commission on the purchase-money of the patent in the event of their finding a purchaser. The solicitors mentioned the matter to one of their clients, who eventually became the purchaser. The client knew that the solicitors were to receive a commission. The commission was paid to the solicitors by the vendor.

Held, that the client could not recover the commission from the solicitors.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The question was whether the respondents, Messrs. Haslam & Evans, solicitors, were entitled to retain a commission which they had received from the vendor of a patent to their client. The solicitors had sued the vendor for the commission and he had paid £210 into court, and the solicitors had accepted it.

Kekewich, J., gave judgment in favour of the solicitors.

The executors of the client (who had died) appealed.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J.

Wilkinson, for the appellants.—The solicitors have received a benefit at the expense of their client. Even if he agreed with them that they should receive it, such an agreement will not be allowed to stand unless he had independent advice.

The following cases were referred to: Tyrrell v. Bank of London, 10 W. R. 359, 10 H. L. Cas. 26; Rhodes v. Bate, 14 W. R. 292, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 252; Liles v. Terry, 44 W. R. 116, [1895] 2 Q. B. 679; Barron v. Willis, 48 W. R. 579, [1900] 2 Ch. 121.

J. B. Matthews, for the respondents.—Here the solicitors made full disclosure to their client that they were going to receive a commission from the vendor to him. If the client is allowed to get this commission he will in effect buy this patent at a less price than he contracted for.

He referred to In re Olympia (Limited), [1898] 2 Ch. 153, 46 W. R. Dig. 32; Copp v. Lynch, 26 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 348; Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co., 27 W. R. 65, 3 App. Cas. 1218.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 20.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the short facts are that Mr. Haslam, a solicitor, on or about the 9th of January, 1899, received from Mr. B. Elliot, the owner of a patent, a commission note, under which Mr. Elliot promised, in the event of Mr. Haslam's introducing a purchaser whose terms Mr. Elliot might accept, to pay Mr. Haslam the sum of £250 out of a purchase price of £3,750, £300 out of £4,000, and so on. Mr. Haslam introduced the patent to Mr. Ohlsen, a gentleman for whom Mr. Haslam and his partner, Mr. Evans, had in several matters been acting as solicitors. This was on or about the 11th of January. Mr. Ohlsen instructed Mr. Haslam to make an appointment for him to see the patented article, and on the 17th of January Mr. Haslam and his partner accompanied Mr. Ohlsen to Harley-street for the inspection. On their return Mr. Haslam showed the commission note to his client, who thereupon stated that he should not pay the lowest price therein mentioned, and that, if he could not get the patent at a much lower price, he should not buy. Mr. Haslam says that he and his partner explained to Mr. Ohlsen that they were not quite satisfied with the commission note signed by Mr. Elliot, which was not as liberal as the note which they had submitted to Mr. Elliot, and thereupon, in consideration of a promise by Mr. Ohlsen to allow them a reasonable commission in case they were unable to obtain any commission under the original note, promised to accept the note for what it was worth, and not to insist on obtaining a more satisfactory note from Elliot. It appears from the bill of costs that Messrs. Haslam & Evans received the instructions of Mr. Ohlsen to try to negotiate with Mr. Elliot for a reduction of price, and they did so, and eventually effected a purchase. It seems plain that they were attempting to serve two masters, and that one master, Mr. Ohlsen, knew this, and the other, Mr. Elliot, did not. I think that, if the truth had been known, Mr. Elliot would never have paid the £210 into court. I think that the claim on Mr. Elliot ought never to have been made. I do not see how we can order money to be paid by Messrs. Haslam & Evans to Mr. Ohlsen's executors which Messrs. Haslam & Evans wrongfully obtained, to the knowledge of Mr. Ohlsen, from Mr. Elliot. But even putting aside the consideration that the money was wrongfully obtained, and that in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis, I further think that the executors of Mr. Ohlsen are not entitled to treat the £210 paid by Mr. Elliot to Messrs. Haslam & Evans as money received to Mr. Ohlsen's use, or in any way to surcharge them. There is no ground for saying that the £210 was a secret profit. The only other possible view which, in my judgment, could support the contention that Mr. Ohlsen's executors are entitled to have the benefit of this payment is that the £210 was something put on the price by the vendor, and that Mr. Ohlsen, in allowing Mr. Haslam to keep this sum, was making a gift to his solicitor, which he was not entitled to keep, having regard to his position as solicitor for the donor. I do not think on the evidence that it was a gift. It was a payment for a service. Mr. Ohlsen in effect said to his solicitor, "Keep the sum which the vendor puts on the price to pay your commission, but you must, in consideration of this, serve me and not him." The case, therefore, does not fall within O'Brien v. Lewis,

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

11 W. R. 318. The appeal must be dismissed, but, I think, without costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—All transactions between solicitor and client, which result in the solicitor's obtaining a benefit for himself, are subjected by courts of law to strict scrutiny, when called in question by the client, and are treated as imposing obligations on the solicitor of greater or less stringency. In some cases the obligation goes so far as almost to bind the solicitor to abstain altogether from a transaction of the kind. Thus a solicitor may not accept from his client, while the relation of solicitor and client exists, remuneration for his professional services beyond that to which he is legally entitled. Of the application of this rule O'Brien v. Lewis is a striking example. In the great majority of cases, however, the law does not exact so much. A solicitor may, for example, purchase from his client, but there is imposed on him the burden of proving that his client was fully informed, and duly and honestly advised, and that the price was just: see the judgment of Turner, L.J., in Holman v. Loynes, 2 W. R. 205, 4 De G. M. & G. 270. In Edwards v. Meyrick, 2 Hare, 60 (a case of purchase by a solicitor), Wigram, V.C., says: "The rule of equity, which subjects transactions between solicitor and client to other and stricter tests than those which apply to ordinary transactions, is not an isolated rule, but is a branch of a rule applicable to all transactions between man and man, in which the relation between the contracting parties is such as to destroy the equal footing on which such parties should stand," and this view of the law is approved by Turner, L.J., in Holman v. Loynes, and is in accordance with subsequent decisions. Wigram, V.C., in Edwards v. Meyrick went on to point out how the appropriate duty which falls on the solicitor depends on the special circumstances of each individual case. His concluding remarks are these: "The nature of the proof, therefore, which the court requires must depend upon the circumstances of each case, according as they may have placed the attorney in a position in which his duties and his pecuniary interests were conflicting, or may have given him a knowledge which his client did not possess, or some influence, ascendency, or other advantage over his client, or, notwithstanding the existence of the relation of attorney and client, may have left the parties substantially at arm's length and on an equal footing." It thus appears that, in the class of cases of which Edwards v. Meyrick is a type, it is necessary that the solicitor should establish that he and his client were "substantially at arm's length and on an equal footing." In the present case the solicitors were retained by Mr. Ohlsen, now deceased, to act for him in negotiating and carrying into effect the purchase of certain patent rights. The solicitors had obtained from the vendor a commission note, under which they were entitled to a certain commission in the event of their introducing to him a purchaser. This commission note was handed to Mr. Ohlsen, and remained in his possession some days previously to the contract of sale being entered into. The purchase was carried into effect, and the solicitors, with Mr. Ohlsen's knowledge, recovered payment of the commission from the vendor. After this Mr. Ohlsen died, and subsequently to his death the solicitors delivered a bill of costs to his executors, who have procured an order for its taxation. In the course of the taxation the executors have sought to charge the solicitors with the amount of the commission received by them, and the question is whether they are entitled so to do. I do not think that the rule applied in O'Brien v. Lewis governs this case, for the commission was paid, not by the client, but by the vendor as remuneration for services rendered to him. On the other hand, I think that the less stringent rule discussed in Edwards v. Meyrick does apply. I am fortified in this opinion by what is laid down by Turner, L.J., in Lyddon v. Moss, 7 W. R. 433, 4 De G. & J. 104, with reference to an agreement by a client to allow his solicitor interest upon his bills of costs. The learned judge says: "Every such agreement is a bargain between the solicitor and the client, and can be supported only under the same circumstances as would support any other bargain between them. It is the bounden duty of a solicitor, before he enters into any such bargain with his client, to inform the client that the law allows of no such charge of interest, and that, although he may decline to conduct the client's business without such an allowance, others of equal ability may be found who will conduct it upon the scale of allowances which is sanctioned by the law." The learned judge holds that interest on costs, although in a sense an addition to remuneration allowed by law, may be bargained for, but only subject to the like obligations on the part of the solicitor as any other bargain. I think, therefore, that in the present case the solicitors were under an obligation to give the client full information, and to advise him, if and so far as necessary, with reference to the commission note. The solicitors have established that they did give him full information, but, if legal advice was necessary to be given by them, there is no evidence of their having given it. If the solicitors had not made full disclosure, it is quite clear that the client would have been entitled to recover the amount from them, but no case has been cited to show that a person can recover a profit received, with full knowledge on his part, by one standing in a fiduciary position towards him. It was unnecessary that the solicitors should inform the client that they would have been liable to him if they had not given him the information which they did, and, so far as I have as yet stated the facts, more was not required of them. It appears, however, that the solicitors not only received the commission which they received from the vendor with the knowledge of their client, but bargained with him that they should be allowed what is termed a reasonable commission (of which the suggested amount was £250) from himself in the event of their not being able to recover a commission from the vendor. To that state of things the more stringent rule to which I have referred does appear to me to apply. In O'Brien v. Lewis the promise of additional remuneration appears to have been volunteered by the client, and Lord Westbury says that the solicitors ought to have said that they could accept no such thing, and that it was the bounden duty of the solicitors not to accept such a promise. Still more was it the duty of the solicitors in the present case to abstain from making such a bargain as they did. Since the date of the decision in O'Brien v. Lewis the Attorney and Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1870, has been passed, and solicitors may make bargains with their clients as to their remuneration, which were previously inadmissible, but such agreements are fenced by safeguards imposed by the Legislature, which have not been observed by the solicitors in the present case, nor were they brought to the notice of the client. It is quite true that the bargain has not been enforced, and, in the events which happened, came to nothing; but the fact of its existence affords some evidence that the solicitors and their client were not dealing at arm's length and on an equal footing. It appears to me, however, that in such circumstances the remedy of the client is not to recover the amount of the commission paid to the solicitors by the vendor, but to set aside the transaction between himself and the solicitors. That relief cannot, however, be given in the present proceedings. I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed. But I consider it my duty to express my great regret that solicitors should have made a bargain, which was not merely improper in the eye of the law, but which placed them in a position in which it was scarcely possible for them to fulfil the duties which they had undertaken to both vendor and purchaser of the patent. Although I have rested my judgment on the grounds which I have stated, it must not be understood that I disagree with what has been said by Vaughan Williams, L.J.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., which so entirely expresses my own view of this case that I do not think it necessary to add anything.

STAGG v. MEDWAY (UPPER) NAVIGATION CO. (a.)

Company—Borrowing powers—Surplus lands—Ultra vires.

It is not ultra vires for a company incorporated by statute, with express powers of borrowing upon mortgage limited to mortgages on its undertaking, to offer its surplus lands as additional security in arranging for the transference of an existing debt where the creditor would be entitled to levy execution against such lands.

This was an action to restrain the defendant company from mortgaging its surplus lands.

By the Medway (Upper) Navigation Acts, 1664 and 1739, the Company of Proprietors of the Navigation of the River Medway were incorporated for the purposes of improving the navigation of the River Medway. Those Acts did not in terms or impliedly permit the company to borrow upon mortgage, but the company did in fact in the year 1874 borrow £6,000 upon mortgage.

In the year 1892 the Medway (Upper) Navigation Act, 1892, was passed for the purpose of reincorporating the company and changing its name into the Medway (Upper) Navigation Co. The Act contained the following recital:

"Whereas the company have borrowed on mortgage of their lands, tolls, rates, and duties the sum of £6 000 pounds which is still due and owing, and it is expedient that the company should be empowered to pay off the moneys due thereon notwithstanding any question as to the legality thereof."

Section 13 provided as follows: "Notwithstanding any question as to the legality of the power of the company to borrow the moneys secured by the indenture dated the 8th day of March, 1878, and made between Ambrose Ward and others of the first part, the company of the second part, and William Crundwell and others of the third part, and which moneys have been expended upon the undertaking, the company shall be at liberty to repay the amounts so secured. And for the purpose of paying off such mortgage the company may borrow on mortgage of their undertaking any sum not exceeding six thousand pounds."

The Act gave the company no express powers of borrowing upon mortgage except on its undertaking.

On the 18th of February, 1893, the company in pursuance of the above section paid off the old mortgage and mortgaged the undertaking afresh to William Levett. William Levett called in £2,000 of the mortgage debt, and thereupon the company in 1901 gave notice that they would pay off the whole debt. In order to do so they were making arrangements to transfer the mortgage to two persons who stipulated that the surplus lands of the company should be included in the security. By section 18 of the Act of 1892 the company had certain powers of dealing with their surplus lands, but these did not include the power of mortgaging them.

The plaintiff, Rowland Stagg, a director and shareholder in the company, thereupon brought an action to restrain the company from carrying out this arrangement on the ground that to mortgage the surplus lands was ultra vires.

On the hearing of the motion it was agreed to treat it as the trial of the action.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and Leeke, for the plaintiff, in support of the contention that the company were confined to the express powers of borrowing given them by their Act, quoted Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co., 10 App. Cas. 354, 33 W. R. Dig. 28; Gardner v. Chatham and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 201; and Putney Overseers v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 39 W. R. 291, [1891] 1 Q. B. 440.

Theobald, K.C., and Dunham, for the defendant company.—This is not a question of borrowing, but of adding security now liable for payment of debts: Blackmore v. Yates, 15 W. R. 750, L. R. 2 Ex. 225; Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235. The demand for an injunction is premature.

The case of Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 28 W. R. 769, 5 App. Cas. 473, was also referred to.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The plaintiff in this case is seeking to restrain by injunction the defendant company from executing any mortgage upon its lands and property other than its undertaking—that is, from charging them specifically; and in substance I am asked to restrain the company from charging their surplus lands—that is, the tenements and hereditaments which in the opinion of the company are not required for the purposes for which the company was incorporated. The plaintiff contends that such a charge is ultra vires of the company, and that on that ground the injunction should be allowed. Now what are the facts? In 1892 the company was re-incorporated. Before the Act of its re-incorporation the company had executed a mortgage for £6,000, of which mortgage there is a recital in the Act. Section 13 of the Act gives the company an express power to raise the sum necessary to pay off the existing charge by a mortgage of its undertaking. Accordingly on the 18th of February, 1893, the old mortgage was discharged and a fresh security for £6,000 given to William Levett. That debt is now due and payable. The company were in possession of surplus lands, some of which have been sold for £5,000, but that sum was not used towards paying off this mortgage debt, which still remains owing. The company have found certain persons who are willing to take a transference of the mortgage, but they require further security and stipulate that they shall receive a charge on the surplus lands of the company. This is not a case of borrowing. The company have already exhausted their powers under section 13, and as matters stand they have no further powers. The debt is a valid debt payable now, and the company are making terms for the transference of that debt, one of the terms being that they shall charge their surplus lands.

This question is, will that charge be valid or not? I approach it from this point of view. There is a debt upon which a creditor could obtain payment and take the land of the company in execution. The case of In re Bishop's Waltham Railway Co., 15 W. R. 96, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 382, shows what should be done on such occasions. There was a petition for sale of railway land and the court directed an inquiry as to what part of it was saleable. It would appear to be a singular result that a creditor could obtain judgment, levy execution, and procure the sale of the surplus lands of the company, and yet the company could not prevent this by charging those lands. A similar question arose in Blackmore v. Yates. The facts of that case were these: A railway company gave a Lloyd's bond to their contractors who handed it to the plaintiff to secure an advance. The plaintiff in the name of the obligee brought an action against the company on the bond, but before judgment it was compromised on the terms that the company should transfer to him the whole of their rolling stock as security. This was before the Act protecting rolling stock from an execution creditor was passed. There the objection was raised that the conveyance of the rolling stock was ultra vires of the company, but it was met by the company saying that the transfer was only made in anticipation of what might happen if a creditor obtained judgment against them, and the transaction was held good. Between that case and this I can draw no distinction. If the surplus lands of a company are liable to be taken by a creditor obtaining judgment against the the company, the company can anticipate that event by making them a security for the debt. On that ground I hold that the transaction proposed is valid. The company are making no fresh loan, but are arranging terms with regard to an antecedent debt. The motion therefore fails, and I refuse to grant the injunction asked for by the plaintiff.

In re BOZZELLI'S SETTLEMENT.
HUSEY HUNT v. BOZZELLI. (a.)

Conflict of laws—Marriage—Deceased husband's brother—Italian subjects—Domicil—Lord Lyndhurst's Act (Marriage Act, 1835, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54), s. 2.

A marriage was legally contracted in Italy between a woman and the brother of her deceased husband, the wife and both husbands being Italian subjects and domiciled in Italy.

Held, that the marriage was valid in England.

Originating summons.

Edith M. Jones, an Englishwoman domiciled in England, married Edward Bozzelli, an Italian domiciled in Italy, on the 16th of November, 1871.

The marriage was solemnized in Italy.

On the 15th of November, 1871, a marriage settlement was made between Edith M. Jones of the first part, Edward Bozzelli of the second part, and trustees resident in the United Kingdom of the third part.

By this settlement certain funds were settled on trust for the wife, husband, and the issue of the marriage, with a proviso that if the wife survived her husband she might by deed or will appoint one-third of the settled funds subject to her own life interest in favour of a subsequent husband and the children of a subsequent marriage.

There were three children of this marriage.

Edward Bozzelli died on the 29th of November, 1879.

Mrs. Bozzelli lived with her husband up to the date of his death, and afterwards took no steps to change her domicil.

On the 11th of December, 1880, she married Michael Bozzelli, a brother of her deceased husband, who was also an Italian subject domiciled in Italy, and there was issue of the marriage.

This second marriage was valid in Italy as the necessary dispensations from the civil and ecclesiastical authorities had been obtained.

The wife was now desirous of exercising her power of appointment under the settlement of the 15th of November, 1871, and it was necessary to determine whether the second marriage was valid according to English law.

Austen Cartmell, for the children of the first marriage.—Such a marriage was declared to be "prohibited and detested by the laws of God," under section 3 of the statute 25 Hen. 8, c. 22, and section 11 of 28 Hen 8, c. 7; and by the Marriage Act of 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54), s. 2, "All marriages between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affirmity shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever." There was no question that the parties in the present case were within the degrees of affinity under 28 Hen. 8, c. 7: Brook v. Brook, 9 W. R. 461, 9 H. L. C. 193.

McMullan, for the trustees of the settlement.

Tomlin, for the wife.—On the reasonable construction of the settlement the power was a power to be exercised on her contracting a valid marriage under Italian law; but even if this be not so the marriage was valid according to the law of England.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The general principle in these cases is that the law of domicil governs the contract of marriage. Here the domicil was Italian. The objection was raised that the second marriage was void under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54, which enacted that all marriages between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity should be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever. The leading authority on this question is the case of Brook v. Brook, 9 W. R. 461, 9 H. L. Cas. 193. There, British subjects domiciled in this country went abroad to Denmark, where by law the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister is valid, and were there duly married. Lord Campbell said: "A marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, being Danish subjects domiciled in Denmark, may be good all over the world, and this might likewise be so even if they were native-born English subjects, who had abandoned their English domicil, and were domiciled in Denmark." Here, Lord Campbell treats the law of domicil as being the law governing the validity of marriage even in the case of a deceased wife's sister, and even though the parties were British subjects domiciled abroad. [His lordship then read extracts from Lord Cranworth's judgment in the same case.] The case of polygamous marriage came before the court in Hyde v. Hyde, 14 W. R. 517, L. R. 1 P. & D. 130. There both the man and the woman were single and competent to contract marriage, and the marriage was contracted in a country where polygamy was lawful. It was a valid marriage according to the lex loci, but was not valid in Christendom. In the present case I have to deal with a marriage valid by the law of domicil and also by the laws of many countries, and a marriage which certainly cannot be regarded as an incestuous union. In the case of Sottomayor v. De Barros, 26 W. R. 455, 3 P. D. 1, the marriage celebrated in England of Portuguese subjects domiciled in Portugal was declared null and void because by the law of Portugal a marriage between first cousins is illegal as being incestuous. There the law of domicil was applied to the question of the validity of the marriage. Now in the case before me the marriage was valid by the law of domicil, and was not incestuous according to the general opinion, and in my opinion the marriage was a valid marriage, and the lady has the power of appointing to her second husband.

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors—Notice—Delay in presentation of petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (a).

Where a creditor, who is aware that the debtor has executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, does not assent to the deed and expressly reserves his right to take bankruptcy proceedings, he is entitled to succeed on a petition founded on the deed, even though there be some delay in presenting the petition.

Appeal from the dismissal of a petition by the registrar of the County Court of Norfolk, holden at Great Yarmouth.

On the 4th of November, 1901, a meeting of the debtor's creditors was held, and a resolution was carried approving a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors executed on the 30th of October.

The petitioning creditor was represented at that meeting by a solicitor who neither assented nor dissented, but stated that he must consult his client, and that he reserved the right to take proceedings in bankruptcy.

On the 30th of November the solicitor wrote to the trustee under the deed informing him that the petitioning creditor was not satisfied with the debtor's position, and asking for a report of the debtor's affairs. It also stated that the right to take steps in bankruptcy was reserved. The trustee's letter in reply concluded as follows: "If, however, your client has a desire to make the man a bankrupt I should prefer his doing so now, and to save further time, trouble and expense on the part of myself and staff." No reply was written to that letter, and the next communication received by the trustee was a notice that the bankruptcy petition was filed.

The petitioning creditor lived at a great distance from the district of the court.

The petition was filed on the 27th of January, 1902, and was heard on the 14th of February, when the registrar held that the delay in presenting the petition was not satisfactorily explained, and on the authority of In re Carr, Ex parte Jacobs, ante, p. 336, 85 L. T. Rep. 522, dismissed the petition.

Muir Mackenzie, in support of the appeal, referred to In re Martin, Ex parte The Board of Trade, 36 W. R. 698, 21 Q. B. D. 35.

F. Low, for the debtor, submitted that the facts were the same as in In re Carr, Ex parte Jacobs, and that the petition was rightly dismissed.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case the registrar dismissed the petition on the ground that he was bound by the case of In re Carr, Ex parte Jacobs. That case, however, does not go to the length suggested. In Carr's case the facts were different and the delay was unexplained. Here the agent expressly stated that he reserved all his rights, including the right to take bankruptcy proceedings, and at no time did the petitioning creditor acquiesce in any way in the deed for the benefit of creditors. The petitioning creditor did not do in this case what we thought he had been doing in Carr's case—sit on the rail.

HARBURG INDIA RUBBER COMB CO. v. MARTIN. (a.)

Guarantee—Indemnity—Promise to answer for debt or default of another—Verbal promise—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.

Where there is a main contract, the object of which is not to answer for the debt or default of another, such a contract is not within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, even though incidentally it may involve a liability to answer for the debt of another. But where the object of a contract is to answer for the debt of another, the contract is not taken out of the statute by the fact that the person making it incidentally gains a personal advantage, and that such personal advantage was his motive in making the contract. Accordingly, where a director of, and a large shareholder in, a company verbally promised a judgment creditor of the company to give bills for the amount of the debt due to him in consideration of his refraining from levying execution on the company's goods,

Held, that the promise was a promise to answer for the company's debt within the Statute of Frauds, and must therefore be in writing.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mathew, J.

The action was brought upon a verbal promise by the defendant that he would give bills for a debt due to the plaintiff company from another company called the Crowdus Accumulator Syndicate.

The plaintiff company is a foreign company, and the plaintiff Winter is its agent in England. The plaintiff company had recovered judgment against the syndicate. The syndicate failed to pay the amount due under the judgment, and the plaintiffs issued a writ of fi. fa.

The sheriff found that the works of the syndicate had been stopped, and the place locked up, and he did not actually enter into possession of the premises.

While things were in this state the defendant, who was a director of, and a large shareholder in, the syndicate, had an interview with the plaintiff Winter.

At the trial of the action, the jury found as a fact that at this interview the defendant promised to give bills for the amount of the debt due from the syndicate to the plaintiff company.

On the faith of this promise or guarantee by the defendant, the plaintiff Winter instructed his solicitors not to proceed with the execution.

The defence to the action was that the guarantee was a contract or promise "to answer for the debt of another" within the meaning of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and therefore the action could not be maintained because the promise was not in writing.

Mathew, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs. He held that the object of the arrangement was to protect the goods, not to pay the debt, and, moreover, the promise was given for the purpose of obtaining a direct personal advantage for the defendant, who had invested £5,000 in the syndicate. Consequently section 4 of the Statute of Frauds did not apply.

By section 4 of the Statute of Frauds: "No action shall be brought . . . whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person . . . unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized."

English Harrison, K.C., and Colam, for the defendant.—This is not a promise by the defendant in order to protect his own goods. The goods to be protected are the property of the Crowdus Syndicate, which is a distinct legal entity. The fact that the defendant is a shareholder in the syndidate does not make them his goods. The defendant may have obtained an indirect benefit by the transaction, but the main object of it was to benefit the syndicate and not to benefit the defendant.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Wills, for the plaintiff.—It is necessary to look, not at the form of the transaction, but its substance. Here the defendant has entered into an arrangement in order to secure an interest belonging to him. He agreed to indemnify the plaintiffs against loss if they refrained from proceeding with the execution, and by so doing he procured a benefit for himself. The fact that he at the same time guaranteed the debt of the syndicate does not alter the real nature of the transaction.

No reply was called for.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument: Williams v. Leper, 3 Burr. 1886, 2 Wils. 308; Edwards v. Kelly, 6 M. & Sel., 204; Sutton v. Grey, 42 W. R. 195, [1894] 1 Q. B. 285; Bampton v. Paulin, 4 Bing. 264; Walker v. Taylor, 6 C. & P. 752; Fitzgerald v. Dressler, 7 C. B. N. S. 374; Guild & Co. v. Conrad, 42 W. R. 642, [1894] 2 Q. B. 885; Wilkinson v. Unwin, 29 W. R. 458, 7 Q. B. D. 636; Castling v. Aubert, 2 East, 325; and Couturier v. Hastie, 8 Ex. Ch. 40, 5 H. L. Cas. 673, 5 W. R. H. L. Dig. 253.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the material facts are very short indeed. The plaintiffs had supplied goods to a company called the Crowdus Accumulator Syndicate. The company did not pay what was due, and the plaintiffs recovered judgment and placed in the hands of the sheriff a writ of fi. fa. to realize the amount of the judgment. The sheriff found the works stopped and the place closed and did not take possession. After this there was a meeting between Mr. Brown Martin, the defendant, and Mr. Winter, the plaintiff. A conversation took place at that meeting; and the jury have found that Mr. Winter's account of that transaction is an accurate one. To put the result of that conversation shortly, Mr. Brown Martin promised that he would give some bills. I am not going now to deal with the question of what the form of those bills was, but he was to give some bills for the amount of the judgment debt. It is said that that amounted to an oral promise to give a guarantee of this judgment debt owing by the syndicate to the plaintiffs. It is said on behalf of the appellant that this was a promise by Mr. Brown Martin by word of mouth to make himself answerable for this debt of the syndicate to the plaintiffs. It is said on behalf of the respondents that this was not a promise to make himself answerable for the debt of another—that is, this debt of the syndicate, but that it was a contract of indemnity. I suppose that means a new contract in the nature of an original obligation. Those are the facts of the case, and the question which has to be decided is whether or not this bargain spoken to in the evidence of Mr. Winter as having been come to between himself and Mr. Brown Martin is a contract to answer for the debt of another within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. Mathew, J., has found that it does not come within that section. I am sorry to say that I cannot bring myself to agree with that conclusion. I think that this contract as plainly as possible was a contract by Mr. Brown Martin to make himself answerable for the debt of the syndicate. It is said that it is not, and attention has been called to a great number of cases showing when the court has treated a transaction as being outside this clause in the 4th section. The earlier cases were most of them what I call property cases. They were cases in which the party making the promise either had property which he wished to relieve from liability or which he wished to acquire. It is not necessary for me to mention them one after the other. I cannot agree that the present case does come within those cases which I have called property cases. It does not seem to me that the promisor was either making a new contract of purchase or a new contract for the release of any property which either was his or in which he had an interest. Then attention is next called to the exception to section 4, which is established by what I call for short del credere cases, beginning with Couturier v. Hastie and coming down to Sutton v. Grey. It is said, and I think truly said, that those cases are instances of a different species from the property cases. I deliberately say instances of a different species, I do not say instances of a different genus, because I agree there is a general rule. There is a wider genus which I think can be very plainly and simply defined within which both of these species fall. But as far as I can see the authorities at present have left us with a general rule which I will attempt to define presently, and each of these two classes of cases falls within this general rule. In neither class of these cases, I want to say at once, has the form of the promise given by the promisor ever been held to be conclusive of the matter. The promise may or may not be to answer the debt of another, but whether it is or not, it is the substance that is looked at and not the form. Now before going away from these instances I should like to mention one more class which I do not put as an exception, but I do put as not coming within the section at all, and those are the cases spoken of as indemnity cases. With regard to those I wish to say this, that in one sense all guarantees, whether they come within this clause of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds or whether they do not, are contracts of indemnity. But the difference between indemnities which do and those which do not come within the clause, is a difference which is very shortly expressed in these words in the notes to Forth v. Stanton in Williams's Notes to Saunders' Reports, vol. 1, p. 234: "These cases establish that the statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is already or is to become answerable." That, to my mind, is an accurate description of a guarantee—or indemnity if you like so to call it—which comes within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds as distinguished from an original liability which is not within the statute and which has no reference to a debt of another, but has reference to a new liability which has to be taken on himself by the promisor, and which has been called to-day a contract of indemnity. I do not wish to go at length into the cases but I wish to say that it seems to me that the case of Guild v. Conrad entirely confirms or entirely coincides with this view which I have been suggesting as being the true view of the distinction between an indemnity and a guarantee which comes within the clause in the 4th section. The case of Guild v. Conrad was a case in which the first judgment delivered was a judgment by Lindley, L.J., and there are also judgments by Lopes and Davey, L.JJ. The facts there were that the defendant orally promised the plaintiff that if he, the plaintiff, would accept certain bills for a firm in which the defendant's son was a partner he would provide the plaintiff with funds to meet the bills. Held, affirming the judgment of Mathew, J., that this was a promise of indemnity and not of guarantee, and therefore not required by the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds to be in writing. When Lord Lindley comes to deliver his judgment he says "the authorities are Thomas v. Cook, 8 B. & C. 728, and Wildes v. Dudlow, 23 W. R. 435, L. R. 19 Eq. 198; Thomas v. Cook appears to me to be indistinguishable from this case," and then he cites a passage from the judgment of Lord Wensleydale then Park, J.: "This was not a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, but an original contract between these parties that the plaintiff should be indemnified against the bond. If the plaintiff at the request of the defendant had paid money to a third person a promise to repay it need not have been in writing, and this case is in substance the same." I will now read the passage from the judgment of Lord Davey: "In my opinion there is a plain distinction between a promise to pay the creditor if the principal debtor makes default in payment, and a promise to keep a person who has entered or is about to enter into a contract of liability indemnified against that liability independently of the question whether a third person makes default or not." It seems to me that those judgments entirely confirm the view which is taken in the note to Forth v. Stanton that the statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is already or is to become responsible.

In my judgment in the present case the circumstances show plainly that there was a guarantee for the payment of a debt for which the syndicate was primarily liable and not an original promise by Mr. Brown Martin to keep the plaintiffs indemnified. I have tried to put this question, whether or not a contract of this sort comes within the section, separately and I have dealt with the cases and pointed out what sort of contract does not in my judgment come within the section, and that there is nothing to justify us holding that in the present case the contract is a contract of indemnity. I think it is a contract of guarantee, a contract to answer the debt of another. That being so, I now wish to go back to cases which are not so much cases which do not come within the section, but cases which so far as words are concerned may come within the section, but have been held not to come within it because of the object of the contract. It seems to me that, whether you look at the property cases or whether you look at the del credere cases, the conclusion come to is that the cases in question do not fall within the statute because of the object of the contract, and because really there was a main contract, and the obligation to pay the debt of another in each one of those cases was merely an incident of the larger contract. According to my understanding of the cases, this is not a question of motive, it is a question of object. This is a case in which you must find in fact what was the subject-matter of the contract. If the subject-matter of the contract was to purchase a property—to relieve a property from a liability, to get rid of incumbrances, or to secure greater indulgence in the performance of the duty of a factor, or to secure the introduction of business into a stockbroker's office, in all those cases there is a larger matter which is the object of the contract. If that is the object of the contract, the mere fact that as an incident to that, not as the immediate object, but indirectly, the debt of another to a third person will be paid off, does not bring the case within the section. That being so, I have to ask myself whether in the present case one does really find any larger contract. I cannot find it. It seems plain to me upon the evidence here that the only matter which was present to the mind of Mr. Brown Martin, and was presented by Mr. Brown Martin to Mr. Winter, was this: "Will you forbear for a time, will you give this company, which I believe has a future before it, the opportunity of turning round. I believe that if this company has that opportunity it will do well and will pay you. To induce you to forbear, and to give them this opportunity, I say that I will give you bills which shall secure you payment at the end of a specified period of this debt, in case the company do not come forward and pay you themselves."

It seems to me that really that is the whole of this contract, and there is neither a purchase or del credere arrangement, nor anything else outside this bargain. It is impossible to say that the mere fact that the defendant had, as he seems to have done in this case, financed the syndicate to a large extent, and that that was his motive for coming forward and bargaining for forbearance, makes any difference as to the object of the contract. That might have been the motive that induced him to make himself answerable for the debt of another, but it was not the object of the contract. The object of the contract was simply to obtain forbearance from the creditor in respect of this debt. Mr. Wills wanted to substitute for the definition that I had suggested, that if the obligation to pay the debt of another is the incident of a large contract it does not come within the section, if the main object is to secure personal interest of his own by the promisor. But if you were so to define the cases which do not come within the section there would be nothing left to come within it, because in every case there must be a consideration which the promisor bargains for which is to come to him from the promisee. That is just as true of mere forbearance as it is of anything else. If that is true, suppose a contract between the promisor and the promisee: "I will be answerable for the debt of your debtor if you will forbear." Mr. Wills would have us say that if the main object is to obtain that forbearance, and the promisor wishes to obtain it, that is sufficient to take the case out of the statute. He says that such a consideration is sufficient to take the case out of the statute. To my mind that is not so and so to hold would be simply to repeal the statute.

My judgment has been longer already than I like, but I do wish to say one word about the case of Fitzgerald v. Dressler. There there is a judgment of Cockburn, C.J., delivered long after the judgment in Couturier v. Hastie. He quotes from the notes to Forth v. Stanton, and he expressly approves of that note, subject to one qualification. All that I wish to say about it is, that according to my view there is not a word that I have said in my attempted definition which is inconsistent with those words of Cockburn, C.J. After quoting that part of the note which says the fair result seems to be that the question whether each particular case comes within this clause of the statute or not, depends not on the consideration for the promise but on the fact of the original party remaining liable coupled with the absence of any liability on the part of the defendant or his property except such as arises from his express promise. He says: "I quite concur in that view of the doctrine provided the proposition is considered as embracing the qualification at the conclusion of the passage. For though I agree that the consideration alone is not the test, but that the party taking upon himself the obligation upon which the action is brought makes himself responsible for the debt on default of another, still it must be taken with the qualification stated in the note above cited—viz., an absence of prior liability on the part of the defendant or his property—it being as I think truly stated there, as the result of the authorities that if there be something more than a mere undertaking to pay the debt of another, as where the property in consideration of the giving up of which the party enters into the undertaking is in point of fact his own, or property in which he has some interest, the case is not within the provision of the statute which was intended to apply to the case of an undertaking to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another where the person making the promise has himself no interest in the property which is the subject of the undertaking." I wish to point out that Cockburn, C.J., there in terms is only dealing with the property cases as an instance, and to my mind clearly only meant to deal with them as an instance of a general rule. I have attempted to define that general rule, and I think that every one of the exceptions which is to be found in the cases comes within the rule as I have defined it. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Mathew, J., in this case should be reversed and this appeal allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is one of difficulty, and we are differing from Mathew, J., and we have heard a most excellent and elaborate argument on the subject. In these circumstances I have on my own account very few words to add as I agree entirely with what has been said by Vaugham Williams, L.J. In the first place I think that the decision in Guild v. Conrad does not apply. I think it is impossible to arrive at the conclusion at which the learned judge has arrived at in this case, that the contract is one to pay whether the company of which the defendant was a director could pay or not. In the case Guild v. Conrad it was for the judge to say what the nature of the contract was, and he found that it was not a contract to pay if the foreign firm did not pay, because there was no expectation at the time that the foreign firm would be able to pay, and the contract was to lend funds to enable the plaintiffs to meet certain acceptances. Here it seems to me that the transaction which was in contemplation was to give time to the company in the expectation that in the interval the company would be placed in funds by which it would be enabled to pay all its debts. The important element that there was no expectation that the company would ever be able to pay appears to me to be wanting. Now, that being so, we have to consider whether the case is one of a contract to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person within the meaning of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. Undoubtedly the decisions run fine in these cases and the main stress of the argument has been to extend the doctrine which was laid down in Couturier v. Hastie and in Sutton v. Grey to the present case. I accept the passage which has been cited from the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., in Fitzgerald v. Dressler as stating the law with reference to a class of cases or two classes of cases of which Williams v. Leper and Walker v. Taylor are the types. He said there, "If there be something more than a mere undertaking to pay the debt of another, as where the property, in consideration of the giving up of which the party enters into the undertaking, is in point of fact his own, or is property in which he has some interest, the case is not within the provision of the statute which was intended to apply to the case of an undertaking to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, where the person making the promise has himself no interest in the property which is the subject of the undertaking."

I do not forget that in the case of Williams v. Leper the promise was given by an auctioneer who had possession of the property under instructions from the real owner to sell it, but when the reasons assigned by the learned judges for the decisions which they arrived at are examined it appears to me that the auctioneer was there treated as the agent of the owner, and he had authority from the owner to enter into a contract, which he did upon the terms that the debt in question should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale. That must be taken to have been the promise of the real owner, and therefore is brought within the statement of the law which I have just referred to. Again, in the case of Walker v. Taylor it seems to me that the real transaction was a purchase by the defendant in the action of a right of the plaintiff which the defendant thought would be valuable to him. Having acquired the right, he refused to pay, and it was held to be a case which did not fall within the Statute of Frauds. We then come to the case of Couturier v. Hastie, which is a case of a del credere agent, and there it was held that a case of del credere was not within the Statute of Frauds. Looking at the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in the case of Sutton v. Grey it appears quite clear that he regarded that case of Couturier v. Hastie as going to the verge of the law, and he referred to the remarks which were made on it in Wickham v. Wickham, 2 K. & J. 478, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 76, by Wood, V.C. The case of Sutton v. Grey is one in which there was a contract between a firm of brokers and a person who empowered them. The terms were that the defendant should introduce clients to them and the plaintiff should transact business on the Stock Exchange for clients thus introduced upon the terms that as between the plaintiffs and the defendant the defendant should have half the commission earned by the plaintiffs in respect of any transaction by them for any clients introduced by the defendant, and he should pay to the plaintiffs half of any loss which might be incurred by them in respect of such transactions. An action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant half the loss which they had incurred, and it was held that the defendant, having an interest in the transaction equally with the plaintiffs, the principle of Couturier v. Hastie applied. Lord Esher, in the Court of Appeal, cites the passage already referred to from Fitzgerald v. Dressler and comments on it thus: "The learned judge there used the words 'has himself no interest in the property which is the subject of the undertaking' because he was dealing with the case of property, but if his words be read as I think they should be, 'has no interest in the transaction,' he is adopting that interpretation of Couturier v. Hastie, which I think is the right one." It is really upon this passage that the argument for the plaintiffs in the present case has been founded. As it seems to me in the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., in Fitzgerald v. Dressler, and in the judgment of Lord Esher interest means some species of interest which the law recognizes as the subject of property. Here the defendant had no such interest in the property which was about to be seized by the sheriff. He was simply a director of the syndicate. He had taken, no doubt, a deep interest in the popular sense in its proceedings. He held a large number of shares in the syndicate; I think he was the largest shareholder. He had also financed the syndicate, but he had nothing whatever in the shape of a charge on this property. He was at the best a general creditor of the company. Now it is contended that we should read the words "interest in the transaction" in a wide sense, and as including that sort of business interest which a creditor and a shareholder of a company has in its prospects. It seems to me that so to do would be to go a long way to repeal this 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and to give an extension to the doctrine of Couturier v. Hastie which I am not prepared to give. On these grounds I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It seems to me that this was certainly not a contract of indemnity for the reasons which my lord has given, and which I will not repeat. The contract is one which falls primâ facie within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds unless it can be brought within some recognised exception or some logical exception. One great peculiarity here is that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant was in possession or had any interest whatever in the goods of the syndicate, but it has been forcibly and most ably argued that the case is brought within the recognized exceptions from the section because it is said that though the defendant had no right or interest in the goods yet he had in a business sense an interest in them. It is argued that what you have to look at is what was the object of the promise which the defendant entered into, and if you can come to the conclusion that the object of the the defendant in giving the promise which he did give was to secure a benefit for himself and not to secure forbearance for the syndicate, then the case ought to be held not to be within the Statute of Frauds at all. I cannot agree with that. It seems to me to be a confusion between object and motive. I cannot doubt that the object of the promise which was made by the defendant was to secure forbearance of the enforcement of the debt against the syndicate. It that be so, the authorities do not in any way, as it seems to me, support the plaintiff's contention. They have been divided conveniently into three classes. The first is the property cases. I do not think they can be dealt with more accurately, and certainly not more shortly, than they are by Vaughan Williams, J., in Fitzgerald v. Dressler, 7 C. B. N. S., at p. 394. [His lordship read the judgment from "At the time the promise was made," to "undertaking to pay the debt of another."] Then stress has been placed on what are called the document cases. Those cases seem to me to stand on an entirely different footing. If I go to a banker or another person who has certain documents which he holds as security for a debt, and I ask him to hand over the documents to me on payment of the debt, that is simply a purchase of the security, and although it may involve the being answerable for the debt of another, that is not the main object of the contract. The third class of cases are the cases which have been called the del credere cases. When they are looked at they seem to me to only amount to this—that a contract for the employment of an agent or a contract for a general vendor of almost any other kind need not be in writing although it incidentally involves an answering of a debt of another person. In other words, if the court can find that there is a main contract the object of which is not to answer for the debt of another, that contract is not within section 4 even though incidentally it may result in a liability to answer for the debt. For these reasons I agree with my lords and think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. — March 20.

FARMER v. PITT. (a.)

Mortgage—Agreement to execute a legal mortgage—Provisions of legal mortgage—Construction of agreement—Consolidation—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 17.

An agreement in a memorandum of equitable mortgage that the mortgagor will execute a legal mortgage of the property "with such powers and provisions and in such form as" the mortgagee "may require for further securing the said principal moneys and interest," does not enable the mortgagee to insist upon the insertion in the legal mortgage of a clause excluding section 17 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881; and consequently the mortgagee cannot consolidate the equitable mortgage with another mortgage from the same mortgagor, upon the latter seeking to redeem that other mortgage alone.

Originating summons.

This was a summons by a mortgagor to redeem certain property, and was resisted by the mortgagee, who claimed to consolidate it with other property also mortgaged to him by the mortgagor.

On the 15th of May, 1899, the plaintiff, Mary Ann Farmer, mortgaged certain houses in Walsall and in Wednesbury to the defendant, F. T. Pitt, to secure the sum of £900 with interest.

On the 14th of July, 1899, the plaintiff having deposited certain title deeds with the defendant, signed a memorandum stating that the deeds were deposited with the intent to create an equitable mortgage on all the property comprised therein by way of collateral security, for the repayment of £100 advanced by the defendant to the plaintiff with interest as therein mentioned, and also of such further sums as should be advanced by the defendant to the husband of the plaintiff, with interest thereon. The memorandum continued as follows: "And the said Mary Ann Farmer doth hereby agree at any time or times during the continuance of this security, upon the request of the said F. T. Pitt, but at the cost of the said Mary Ann Farmer, to execute to him a legal mortgage of the said property with such powers and provisions and in such form as the said F. T. Pitt may require for further securing the said principal moneys and interest."

Neither the previous mortgage of the 15th of May, 1899, nor this memorandum contained any clause expressly excluding section 17 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881.

The defendant having brought an action in the King's Bench Division against the present plaintiff upon the covenant in the mortgage of the 15th of May, the plaintiff paid him the £900 and interest and costs due under that mortgage, but the defendant refused to hand back the title deeds or to reconvey the property, claiming to consolidate the two mortgages of the 15th of May and the 14th of July, 1899. Thereupon the plaintiff took out this summons, asking for redemption and reconveyance of the houses mortgaged by the deed of the 15th of May, 1899, the principal, interest, and costs due under that mortgage having been received by the defendant.

Levett, K.C., and Underhill, for the plaintiffs.—The agreement to execute a legal mortgage with such provisions for further securing the principal money and interest as the mortgagee may require does not give him the right to have inserted in the legal mortgage a clause enabling him to consolidate. That would be enlarging his security, which was not intended: Whitley v. Challis, 40 W. R. 291, [1892] 1 Ch. 64. Even if the defendants were entitled to the clause excluding section 17, he would not be entitled to consolidate. The case is different from that of Griffith v. Pound, 45 Ch. D. 553, 38 W. R. Dig. 159; the mortgage sought to be redeemed here is the earlier one, and not, as in that case, the later one.

They also cited Bird v. Wenn, 34 W. R. 652, 33 Ch. D. 215.

Rowden, K.C., and Martelli, for the defendant.—It is not a question of what clauses are usually inserted in mortgages. The defendant may have inserted any which he desires; at any rate so long as they are not entirely unreasonable. It cannot be said that a clause negativing the operation of section 17 is unreasonable. It only leaves the powers of the mortgagee as they were before 1881. The clause is given by conveyancers as one proper to be inserted in mortgages in certain cases, see Key & Elphinstone Prec. Convey. (6th ed.), pp. 59 and 59 note. Whitley v. Challis does not apply, as the defendant is not seeking to bring more property into the legal mortgage, but only to exercise a passive right of refusing to have one mortgage redeemed without the other. If the mortgagee has a right to the insertion of the clause, then that must be considered as done, and then one of the mortgages expressing a contrary intention, the operation of section 17 is by subsection 2 excluded, and the mortgagee has his right to consolidate as before the Act.

BYRNE, J.—It is said that by virtue of the clause in the memorandum of the 14th of July, 1899, the mortgagee might have required the mortgagor to execute a legal mortgage of the property containing a provision excluding section 17 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and that I must treat the case as if a mortgage had actually been executed to that effect. It is said that the mortgagee is master of the situation, and that if he required the insertion of such a clause in the legal mortgage it could not have been considered unreasonable, and that the state of the law before the Act of 1881 shows this. Since 1881 the Legislature has said that the mortgagee shall have no right to consolidate apart from contract, but that the parties may contract that he shall have that right. Now what is the true meaning of the clause in the memorandum we are considering. It is much the same as that in the case of Whitley v. Challis, where the question arose as to what ought to be considered as included in the legal mortgage agreed to be executed. In his judgment [1892] 1 Ch., at p. 72, Fry, L.J., says: "Then it is attempted to enlarge the security by the words which provide for the execution of the formal mortgage, and for the insertion in that mortgage of such powers, covenants, and provisions as the solicitor or counsel for the mortgagee shall advise or require. That clause was only intended to give effect to the previous charge, and does not enlarge the subject-matter of the charge." The question in that case was not the same as here, but the same reasoning applies to both cases. The memorandum of the 14th of May, 1889, does not in terms mention any of the property comprised in the mortgage of the 15th of July, 1889, and incorporate it. The result of the insertion of a provision excluding section 17 in the second mortgage would be to give to the mortgagee in the case of the mortgagor seeking to redeem the first mortgage a right of control over property not included in his security. It would be enlarging his security, and I do not think he has any right to do that. With reference to what has been said as to the practice of conveyancers, the evidence is not clear. The books referred to seem to me to tell as much against the practice of inserting a provision of this kind, as in its favour.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

In re THE ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO.'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark — "Addition" — Label — Disclaimer — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 10.

On the registration under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, a disclaimer of any right to the exclusive use of such portion of a label as constitutes "added matter" must be made.

Appeal from a decision of the Comptroller-General of Trade-Marks.

The Royal Baking Powder Co. of New York made application for the registration of a trade-mark consisting of a label, one half of which contained, on a red ground, a representation of a tin with the words "Royal Baking Powder" upon it, and the name of the firm upon a scroll at the four corners, and the other half, on a yellow ground, the words "Royal Baking Powder" followed by a description of the article, directions for its use, and the name and address of the makers.

The Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks refused to register on the ground, inter alia, that the applicants had made no disclaimer of any right to the exclusive use of the added matter on the label according to the requirements of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 64, as altered by the amending Act of 1888.

That section, in so far as it is material, provides as follows: "(1) For the purposes of this Act a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars . . . (c) a distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, or ticket . . . ; (2) there may be added to any one or more of the essential particulars mentioned in this section any letters, words, or figures, or combination of letters, words, or figures, or of any of them, but the applicant for registration of any such additional matter must state in his application the essential particulars of the trade-mark and must disclaim in his application any right to the exclusive use of the added matter, and a copy of the statement and disclaimer shall be entered on the register; (3) provided as follows: (i.) a person need not under this section disclaim his own name or the foreign equivalent thereof, or his place of business, but no entry of any such name shall affect the right of any owner of the same name to use that name or the foreign equivalent thereof . . ."

From this refusal of the comptroller the company appealed.

Warmington, K.C., and S. Dickinson, for the appellants.—The registrar cannot enforce disclaimer when the matter in dispute is a label. The disclaimer only affects "added matter." Here there is none. The whole label is the trade-mark: Pinto v. Badman, 8 Rep. Pat. Cas. 181; In re Clément et Cie's Trade-Mark, 48 W. R. 67, [1900] 1 Ch. 114; In re Smokeless Powder Co.'s Trade-Mark, 40 W. R. 507, [1892] 1 Ch. 590; In re Colman's Trade-Mark Application, 42 W. R. 555, [1894] 2 Ch. 115.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the comptroller, were not called upon.

FARWELL, J., said: I am clearly of opinion that the matter contained in the yellow part of the label is "added matter" such as is contemplated in the 2nd sub-section of section 64 of the Act. If authority is needed for that view I refer to the case of Clément et Cie's Trade-Mark and to the words of Romer, L.J.'s, judgment. The amending Act of 1888 did not apply to that case, but in the present instance it does, and the words in this yellow portion of the label being, in my opinion, "added matter," disclaimer of any right to their exclusive use should have been made. The motion is dismissed, with costs.

SCOTT v. SCOTT. (a.)

Infant—Life interest contingent upon attaining twenty-one years—Accumulations during minority—Person "ultimately entitled"—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43, sub-section 2.

Where property is held in trust for an infant for life, contingently upon his attaining the age of twenty-one years, the accumulations of the income during the minority of the infant belong to him upon his attaining that age under sub-section 2 of section 43 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and such accumulations are not to be added to the corpus. In the above case the infant, on attaining twenty-one, is "the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property" under that sub-section, the words "the property from which the same arise" meaning the income from which the accumulations arise.

Originating summons.

The question raised by this summons was as to who was entitled to certain accumulations of income of a trust fund under section 43 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881.

By his will dated the 9th of July, 1888, the testator, David Cooper Scott, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and after payment of expenses, debts, and any legacies, to stand possessed of the residuary trust moneys in trust after payment of certain annuities to pay the income of one moiety to his wife during her widowhood, and if she should marry again to pay the income of a third to her for life; and subject thereto he directed his trustees to hold the residuary trust funds for his children, who being sons should attain twenty-five years, or being daughters should attain the age of twenty-one years or marry, in equal shares. And he declared that his trustees should pay his wife during the infancy of any of his children a sum not exceeding one-half of the income of the share of such child for board and maintenance. And that his trustees should retain the share of each daughter upon trust to pay her the income thereof for life, and after her decease upon trust for her children as therein mentioned.

He further declared that his trustees had power to raise any part or parts, not exceeding one moiety of the vested or expected share of any child, for the advancement or benefit of such child.

The testator died in June, 1890, leaving five children, of whom the plaintiffs, Anita Mary Scott and Eleanor C. Scott, were the two youngest.

These two daughters attained their ages of twenty-one in February, 1899, and October, 1901, respectively.

Since the death of the testator, and during the infancy of the plaintiffs, the trustees had paid the widow out of the income of their shares various sums for their board and maintenance, and also under an order of the court in 1890 further sums for their education.

The accumulations of income after these payments arising from the shares of the plaintiffs up to the days of their respectively attaining twenty-one years were the respective sums of £666 and £1,163.

The plaintiffs took out this summons against the trustees of the will for an order that they should be directed to pay to the plaintiffs these respective accumulations.

S. O. Buckmaster, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to the accumulations of income made during their respective minorities. They are the persons "ultimately entitled" under section 43, sub-section 2, because they have become entitled to the fund, although only for life. It has been decided that this is the case where the life interest was vested: In re Wells, 38 W. R. 327, 43 Ch. D. 281, and In re Humphreys, 41 W. R. 519, [1893] 3 Ch. 1.

He also cited In re Buckley's Trusts, 31 W. R. 376, 22 Ch. D. 583.

Beddall, for the trustees.—The persons "ultimately entitled" are the persons entitled to the whole fund, and the accumulations should therefore be added to the corpus of the fund. Suppose A. were a life tenant of the fund and B. were life tenant after A., and A. died under age and B. attained twenty-one, could it be said that B. should take absolutely the accumulations made during A.'s minority?

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—BUCKLEY, J.—The determination of the question raised in this case involves the consideration of the true construction of section 43 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. The gifts in favour of the daughters are gifts to them, as members of a contingent class, of shares of residue. The contingency is that of attaining the age of twenty-one years. Under such a gift the income is accessory to the capital and belongs contingently to the legatees in whose favour the contingent gift is made. The question is how the income which thus follows the capital is applicable in the case of a settled share, regard being had to the statutory provision contained in section 43. First, as matter of principle, the intention of the section was not to affect the construction of wills: In re Dickson, 33 W. R. 511, 29 Ch. D. 331, at p. 338. The object of the Act was to shorten and simplify conveyances and not to alter the devolution of property. Primâ facie, therefore, when the daughter attained twenty-one, she, as tenant for life, would become entitled to receive payment of the income of the settled share accrued up to that date in respect of the contingent gift. For the respondents, however, who represent the possible unborn children of the daughters or other remaindermen, it is contended that under sub-section 2 of section 43 the accumulations are to be held for the benefit, not of the tenant for life absolutely in the events which have happened, but as corpus settled for all the persons entitled in succession under the settlement of the daughters' share—in other words, that the word "property" in sub-section 2 means the corpus from which the accumulated income has arisen. Another argument, but too extravagant to admit of serious consideration, would be that the accumulations are held, not for the persons thus entitled in succession, but for the person "who ultimately becomes entitled to the property"—that is to say, entitled to the corpus after the determination of the tenancy for life. In my judgment neither of these contentions can be sustained. The fact is that if in section 43 the word "property" is read as equivalent exclusively to "corpus" or "capital" its use is far from exact. Thus the section opens with the words, "Where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant . . . for life." If "property" is equivalent to "corpus" or "capital," as contrasted with and to the exclusion of income, this language is not apt. If it is read to mean "corpus or its income, as the nature of the gift may require," the language becomes appropriate. Further, that the word "property" in sub-section 2 cannot mean "corpus" in every instance may be shown by taking a particular case. Thus, suppose that £1,000 is held by trustees for A., an infant, for life, and after his death for B., and suppose that A. survives the testator for ten years and then dies an infant—this is a case within section 43, sub-section 1. The income in such case during the ten years unquestionably belongs to A.—but B. is entitled to the corpus. If "property" in sub-section 2 means corpus, B. is the person entitled to that, and would on such a construction take the income which accrued during A.'s lifetime. Rejecting, therefore, a construction which would read "property" in sub-section 2 as always meaning corpus, I go on to consider whether it ever means corpus. I think not. The property spoken of is that from which "the same"—that is, the accumulations—arise. Income arises, no doubt, from corpus, but the accumulations arise from setting aside and investing income as it is earned. The words of sub-section 2 are not "the property from which the income arises," but "the property from which the same (i.e., the accumulations) arise." The property from which the accumulations arise is the income which is year by year set apart and forms the accumulated fund. The words of sub-section 2 are, I think, to be read thus—"entitled to the property (viz., the income) by the accumulation of which the accumulated fund or accumulations arise." If the words be thus read and for the word "ultimately" there be substituted "in the events which happen," all difficulty disappears. The words will then read thus, "and shall hold those accumulations for the benefit of the person who in the events which happen becomes entitled to the property (viz., the income) from the accumulation of which the accumulations arise." I think that is the meaning of the words. I do not find that any authority is inconsistent with this view. The decision of Fry, J., in In re Buckley's Trusts, decided upon section 26 of Lord Cranworth's Act, is only that that Act applied to gifts absolute or contingent and not to gifts vested but liable to be divested. The decision of North, J., in In re Wells is that a person entitled to a vested interest for life is on attaining twenty-one the person ultimately entitled to the property within sub-section. North, J., I think, thought as I do, that "property" means the income the accumulations of which are being dealt with. The Court of Appeal in In re Humphreys was again dealing with an immediate vested life interest. That decision approved In re Wells, and, while I have felt some difficulty by reason of the fact that the decision was rested upon finding in the will an expression of a contrary intention within sub-section 3 of section 43, I do not think there is anything in it to preclude me from coming to the conclusion that "property" in sub-section 2 means that property the accumulation of which has produced the fund. The court in In re Humphreys left open the point which I have here to decide. I therefore hold that the plaintiffs, who in the events which have happened are entitled to income, are entitled to the accumulated sums.

In re SETON SMITH.
BURNAND v. WAITE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Bequest—"Furniture and other personal effects"—Tenant's fixtures—Trade or business articles—Hotel.

A testator bequeathed to A. "all the furniture and other personal effects belonging to me, and which at the date of my death are at the R. hotel." The testator resided at and carried on the hotel, of which he was yearly tenant.

Held, that all the effects at the hotel belonging to the testator, whether used in connection with the hotel business or not, passed under the bequest, but that tenant's fixtures did not pass.

Harold Seton Smith, the above-named testator, was the yearly tenant of the Roebuck Hotel, Tilehurst, in Berkshire, which he kept and managed as an hotel, and where he resided. He was assisted by Miss Gertrude A. Waite, who also resided in the hotel.

By his will dated the 10th of May, 1901, the testator appointed the plaintiff and another person his trustees and executors, and he bequeathed "all the furniture and other personal effects belonging to me, and which at the date of my death are at the Roebuck Hotel aforesaid, to Gertrude A. Waite, who is now residing at the said hotel."

He bequeathed the residue of his personal estate and his interest in certain real estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and upon other trusts therein mentioned. The testator died on the 11th of May, 1901.

The furniture and personal effects belonging to the testator in the hotel at his death consisted of (a) trade or tenant's fixtures and trade implements, (b) furniture and such personal effects as belonged to him independently of the business of the hotel, (c) linen, plate, glass, china, and other effects used in connection with the hotel business.

The present summons was taken out by the executors against Miss Waite to have determined what effects of the testator passed under the above bequest to Miss Waite.

George Lawrence, for the executors.

W. M. Cann, for Miss Waite.—I claim all the effects, including fixtures, whether connected with the business or not: Cole v. Fitzgerald, 1 Sim. & St. 189, 3 Russ. 301; Swinfen v. Swinfen, 9 W. R. 175, 29 Beav. 207.

Christopher James, for the residuary legatee.—Fixtures do not pass under a bequest of household furniture: Finney v. Grice, 27 W. R. 147, 10 Ch. D. 13. I also claim all the furniture and effects connected with the business of the hotel. "Furniture" must be read ejusdem generis with "other personal effects" in the bequest, and only the furniture and effects used personally by the testator are included: Northey v. Paxton, 60 L. T. Rep. 30, 37 W R Dig. 202; Pratt v. Jackson, 2 P. Wms. 302, reversed on appeal, 1 Bro. Parl. Cas. 222; Le Farrant v. Spencer, 1 Ves. sen. 97; Manning v. Purcell, 3 W. R. 273, 7 De G. M. & G. 55.

BUCKLEY, J.—It is contended that under the bequest of "all the furniture and other personal effects belonging to me, and which at the date of my death are at the Roebuck Hotel" Miss Waite is entitled to the tenant's fixtures in the hotel. I do not think so. They, no doubt, belonged to the testator in a sense, but I do not think that he intended to give Miss Waite the right to take down the roller blinds and things of that description: see Finney v. Grice. Passing to the next question. There was at the death of the testator a considerable quantity of furniture in the hotel, some of which was used by the testator himself, some by Miss Waite, and some of which was used for the general purposes of the hotel by the visitors. There was also the ordinary apparatus of an hotel, such as china, plate, and the like. It is said on behalf of the residuary legatee that only such part of this furniture and of these articles passed to Miss Waite as belonged to the testator and was personally used by him; and that such articles as were required for the trade or business of the hotel did not pass to her. I think that view is wrong. I think all those articles, whether used for the hotel or not, passed to her. The cases cited to the contrary appear to me distinguishable. In Pratt v. Jackson there were two households, and the question was which household was referred to. In Le Farrant v. Spencer household furniture was held not to include trade goods. In Manning v. Purcell the testator had a private house and a tavern, and the decision turned on the word "my" household furniture, &c. I think therefore that all the furniture, linen, plate, glass, china, and other effects belonging to the testator which at his death were at the hotel passed to Miss Waite, whether they were used for his trade or business of the hotel or not, but not including tenant's fixtures.

In re DEVELOPMENT CO. OF CENTRAL AND WEST AFRICA. (a.)

Company—Deferred shares—Scheme—Petition for reduction of capital—No actual reduction—Illegality.

A company entered into an agreement with the holders of its deferred shares of £1 each (to which special rights were attached) that in consideration of the cancellation of the deferred shares the holders thereof should receive ordinary shares in exchange for each deferred share. The company now petitioned the court for an order confirming the reduction of capital.

Held, that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the capital of the company was not being reduced, but increased; that the scheme was illegal and ultra vires, and the reduction could not be confirmed.

The Development Co. of Central and West Africa was incorporated on the 7th of February, 1901, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, with a capital of £100,000, divided into 99,300 ordinary shares and 700 deferred shares of £1 each.

All the deferred shares and about 18,000 ordinary shares were issued, and were fully paid up.

Special rights and privileges were granted to the holders of deferred shares by clause 5 of the memorandum of association. The memorandum gave the company power to increase or reduce its capital and to issue any of the original shares or new shares with special rights attached thereto, provided there was no infringement of the rights attached to the deferred shares.

At extraordinary general meetings held on the 25th of November and the 12th of December, 1901, a special resolution was passed, and it was resolved that the capital be reduced to 99,300 ordinary shares of £1 each; and that this be effected by cancelling the whole of the 700 deferred shares upon the terms of a conditional agreement dated the 23rd of November, 1901. This agreement was made between the company of the one part, and the deferred shareholders of the other part, and it was agreed that the deferred shareholders should consent to the cancellation of the whole of the 700 deferred shares, and should do all acts and things necessary or expedient for that purpose, and that the company should take the necessary steps for reducing its capital in the manner mentioned in the special resolution, and should apply for an order confirming the reduction, and that, if and so soon as the reduction should have been so confirmed, the company should take the necessary steps to increase its capital to £250,000, divided into 250,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, and should allot and issue to the deferred shareholders as fully paid 70,000 of those shares in exchange for the 700 deferred shares to be cancelled as aforesaid, and should, within one month after the allotment, satisfy the requirements of section 7 of the Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48). The agreement was conditional on the company obtaining an order confirming the proposed reduction.

The company now by petition asked the court to confirm the proposed reduction.

Evidence was produced to show that the company had not borrowed any money and that its debts did not exceed £300, made up of sums due for costs, salaries, and office rent.

The petition stated that it was important in the interests of the company that the agreement should be carried into effect.

Eve, K.C., and Wurtzburg, for the company.—So long as the court sees that the interests of shareholders and others are safeguarded, it has power to sanction any scheme of reduction of capital: British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399.

W. Gordon Fellowes, for shareholders.

SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the facts, proceeded: In British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper Lord Macnaghten said that the court must look at the arrangement as a whole, and have regard to all the circumstances of the case and the consequences which the reduction involved. I therefore consider it my duty in the present case to look at the entire scheme as a whole, and see whether or not I ought to sanction it. It is really a scheme for an increase of capital. The extent of the increase would be £69,300 nominal capital, for which the company in its corporate capacity would receive no consideration. The assets would not be increased, but would remain the same, and the only result would be that the 700 deferred shares would be cancelled, and the rights of the shareholders inter se would be altered. In my judgment the scheme involves the issue of 69,300 shares, not only at a discount, but without any consideration at all moving from the shareholders to the company in its corporate capacity. It is not sufficient for the bargain to be beneficial or adequate as between the shareholders. They are the best judges of that, and they all support the arrangement which is made in good faith and may be to their advantage. The real question which I have to consider in the present case is whether the scheme is legal. In my judgment it is not. It involves the issue of nearly £70,000 nominal capital in exchange for a surrender of £700 nominal capital without any consideration to the company. In my judgment such a scheme as this is wholly ultra vires. It is in no way authorized by British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, the observations in which apply to the case of a genuine reduction and not to a case where there is no real reduction, but an increase of capital. I therefore dismiss the petition.

MOORE v. KEYTE. (a.)

Vaccination—Neglect to cause child to be vaccinated—Guardians direct their officer not to prosecute—Proceedings nevertheless instituted by him—Visit of public vaccinator at parent's house not a condition precedent—Conviction—Vaccination Act. 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), ss 16, 29, 31—Vaccination Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 98), s. 5—Vaccination Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 75), s. 1—Vaccination Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 49), s. 1.

A vaccination officer is the proper person to institute a prosecution under the Vaccination Acts.

Therefore, where a vaccination officer had prosecuted the appellant under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, without the consent and contrary to the orders he had received from the guardians.

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the prosecution had been rightly instituted.

Held, also, that it is not a condition precedent to such a prosecution for the prosecutor to duly prove that the public vaccinator had visited the home of the child, after notice, as prescribed by section 1, sub-section 3, of the Vaccination Act, 1898, and had offered to vaccinate the child.

Case stated by justices for the county borough of Leicester.

The appeal was instituted on behalf of Robert Moore, a club steward, against an order of the justices of Leicester, who had in October last convicted and fined the appellant 1s. and costs for neglecting to have his child vaccinated within six months after birth, as prescribed by the Vaccination Act, 1867, s. 29, amended by the Vaccination Act, 1898.

The following facts were stated in the case:

In December, 1899, the respondent H. E. Keyte was duly appointed vaccination officer to the Leicester Board of Guardians. The respondent had, on the

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

8th of October, 1901, laid an information against the appellant under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, for unlawfully neglecting to cause his child Hilda Victoria, born on the 13th of January, 1901, to be vaccinated within six months after her birth, contrary to the Vaccination Acts, 1867 to 1878.

The information was heard on the 23rd of October, 1901, by the justices, who convicted the appellant.

The respondent had, in October, included the appellant in a list of ten defaulters under the Vaccination Acts, and in regard to those named in that list and in another, containing twelve names, which respondent had handed to the guardians in June, they passed resolutions in June and October as follows: "That the vaccination officer be instructed to take no further steps instituting proceedings against those persons whose names are included in the list submitted to the guardians to-day until he receives the instructions of the guardians to do so." These resolutions were sent to the respondent, but he took proceedings against the appellant notwithstanding them, and this, it was said, he had no power to do.

At the hearing the clerk to the guardians read to the justices from his minute book the following resolution passed by the guardians on the 30th of April, 1901: "That this board strongly condemns the action of the vaccination officer in prosecuting defaulters under the Vaccination Acts, and incurring law expenses without consulting the guardians, and instructs him in future to report defaulters to the board, so as to afford them an opportunity to offer a reasonable excuse, as provided by section 29 of the Vaccination Act of 1867. The guardians also point out to the vaccinating officer that he was appointed (inter alia) subject to section 5 of the Vaccination Act, 1871, to enforce the provisions of the Vaccination Acts, 1867 to 1898, and to prosecute such persons as are charged as defaulters under the said Acts, and the guardians will specially authorize him, in writing under their common seal, to prosecute such defaulters as they desired to be prosecuted."

This resolution was also forwarded to the respondent, who accordingly remitted the list above referred to of twelve persons on the 4th of June, 1901, and another list of ten (including the appellant) on the 1st of October, 1901. The guardians resolved on the 4th of June and on the 4th of October, 1901, that the vaccination officer be and hereby is instructed to take no further steps instituting proceedings against those persons whose names are included in the lists, until he receives the instructions of the guardians to do so.

Notwithstanding these resolutions the respondent took proceedings as vaccination officer, and contended that his appointment gave him implied power to enforce the Vaccination Acts and take proceedings for that purpose without the authority of the guardians.

For the appellant it was contended that the prosecution must prove as a condition precedent to the prosecution under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, (a) that the vaccination officer had the authority of the guardians, if he prosecuted as vaccination officer; and (b) that the public vaccinator had visited the appellant's house for the purpose of vaccinating the appellant's child in accordance with section 1 (3) of the Vaccination Act, 1898, and that he had previously served notice of his intention to do so.

For the respondent it was contended that the vaccination officer as such was not bound to have the guardians' authority; that the resolutions of the guardians were ultra vires; that the officer had full powers to take proceedings independently of the guardians, and that proof of notice and of the visit was not a condition precedent to the prosecution.

The questions for the court were (1) whether the vaccination officer by virtue of his appointment as such, without direction general or special, from the guardians at any time, and notwithstanding the guardians' directions not to prosecute in certain specified cases, can institute proceedings under the Vaccination Acts, 1867 to 1898, as vaccination officer of the guardians; and (2) whether it is a condition precedent to a prosecution by a vaccination officer under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, that due proof must be given of the public vaccinator having previously given a notice of a visit and having visited the house as therein prescribed.

Rawlinson, K.C., and Schultess Young, for the appellant.—We submit that this conviction cannot stand, because under the circumstances stated in the case the vaccination officer had no status to prosecute merely by virtue of his appointment to that office by the guardians. Moreover, no evidence was given of a visit after notice of the public vaccinator at the childs home as prescribed by statute having in this case taken place, which is a precedent condition to the right of the guardians to prosecute. This is clearly to be inferred from several sections of the various Acts, and section 29 of the Act of 1867 provides that every parent or person having charge of a child who neglects to cause it to be vaccinated, unless he renders a reasonable excuse, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to be proceeded against. That reasonable excuse, we submit, was to be made to the guardians, who are the persons to make inquiry as to that directed by another section. [DARLING, J.—We know that the guardians of Leicester refused to appoint a public vaccinator, and when the court ordered them to do so they affected to appoint someone who would not enforce the law. Then they were told they must appoint a proper person or go to gaol, and having done so they now attempt to hold his hand.] We are not here to defend the previous action of the guardians, but we contend that the Legislature has given them this discretion, and also the orders of the Local Government Board made under the provisions of the various Acts. A vaccination officer is a servant of the guardians, and their consent, express or implied, to his instituting a prosecution, must be first obtained: Robinson v. Lowe, 13 Times Law Rep. 19; Bramble v. Lowe, 45 W. R. 366, [1897] 1 Q. B. 283.

J. J. Parfitt, for the respondent, was not heard.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and H. Sutton, said they were present on behalf of the Local Government Board, who considered the question raised of such general public importance that they considered it necessary to appear before the court. It was of enormous importance to have it decided once for all whether the vaccination officer, as such, was entitled to take proceedings without the order of the guardians by whom he was appointed and paid, and the resolutions showed that there was no consideration of individual cases by the guardians before they stayed their officer's hand. The resolutions were passed on the same day as the lists of names were received. The question was whether the guardians were to be allowed to nullify the object of the Acts by passing resolutions that prevented that officer carrying out his duties. There were numerous provisions of the Acts and the orders of the Local Government Board which clearly showed that the vaccination officer had power to proceed without the authority of the board of guardians: see Article 27 of the Vaccination Order, 1898, and also Knight v.

Halliwell, 22 W. R. 689, L. R. 9 Q. B. 912. There was no substance in the second objection raised against the validity of the conviction, for it could not be seriously argued that proof of visit, &c., was a condition precedent to a prosecution being taken against a neglectful parent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., in giving judgment, said: The issues raised in this case are of public importance, and it is for that reason that the court has heard the Attorney-General, and would have heard Mr. Parfitt for the respondent had we had any doubt as to what our decision should be. The first point argued was that the prosecutor must prove the notice of the visit and the visit of the public vaccinator before the prosecution could be launched. The answer to that depended on the true construction of three sections. Section 16 of the Act of 1867 as amended by the Act of 1898 is as follows: "The parent of every child born in England shall . . . cause it to be vaccinated by some medical practitioner." By section 1 of the Act of 1898 provision was made, not that the child must be taken to the public vaccinator, but there was the most salutary provision that the medical man must visit the house of the child. It being the duty of the parent to cause the child to be vaccinated and of the vaccinator to go to the house, section 29 of the Act of 1867, under which this prosecution was brought, provides, as amended by the Act of 1898, as follows: "Every parent or person having the custody of a child neglecting to cause the child to be vaccinated, and who shall not render a reasonable excuse for his neglect, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to be proceeded against summarily." And, again, by section 31 of the earlier Act, "the justices may make an order for the vaccination of any child under fourteen." Reading these sections together, it seems absolutely plain that when the magistrates had a case before them they should consider the question whether there was a reasonable excuse, taking into consideration in deciding that question, whether there has been a visit or not. But assuming no such point was raised, it involved useless expense formally to prove in every prosecution all those conditions without which, of course, the magistrates could not reasonably imagine that any prosecution would be instituted. For this court, therefore, to hold that the prosecutor must prove them, though no question was going to be raised except in connection with a reasonable excuse, appears to me to be an argument in which there is no substance.

The important question, however, is whether the vaccination officer, by virtue of his appointment, without directions general or special from the guardians at any time, and notwithstanding the guardians' directions not to prosecute in particular cases, could himself properly institute proceedings. That, no doubt, is a question of greater public importance, but happily it does not present to my mind any greater difficulty than the first point we had to consider. Speaking for myself, I answer it at some length because we have been requested to do so, although it appears perfectly plain from the sections referred to in argument that when the magistrates have a case before them it is for them to say whether the excuse is reasonable or not. It is not for the board of guardians to decide; and to hold that there is to be an investigation by them, would involve everybody in absolutely useless and unnecessary expense and trouble. There is no ground for saying that the assent of the board of guardians must be a condition precedent to the prosecution, and in my judgment, having regard to the provisions of the Act and the duty which the vaccination officer has to perform, the duty of taking proceedings to enforce the law rests with the vaccination officer. As Channell, J., during the argument pointed out, there are cases—in lunacy, for instance—where the fiat of the Attorney-General has to be obtained and has to be proved, but this forms no ground for saying that the consent of the guardians must be taken to be a condition precedent to a prosecution under the Vaccination Acts. But the question went further. [His lordship read question (1).] We are not asked by it to decide any question between the guardians and the officer, as, for example, how they should deal with him, or as to any question of expenses he had incurred, or any other such matter that might arise between them. It is a question dealing simply with the public duties of the vaccination officer, and therefore, before we can decide it, we must go back and see the scheme of the Legislature. As we have seen, section 29 of the Act of 1867 is the section which creates the offence. By section 31 the justices may make an order for the vaccination of any child, and the section gives an alternative method of getting the child vaccinated, which was originally imposed on the registrar, or an officer appointed by the guardians, and later upon the vaccination officer under the Local Government Board (Vaccination) Rules, 1874. Having regard to the provisions of the Act, I should have come to this conclusion quite independently of the order of the Local Government Board under the Act of 1898, but the order makes the matter more abundantly clear. This is not the first time this kind of order has been made. From 1871 these orders have been made under the statutes, and have all the force of a statute. There were provisions in the old order of 1874, articles 16 and 17 of which were discussed in Bramble v. Lowe, 45 W. R. 366, [1897] 1 Q. B. 283, where Wright, J., expressed the opinion that for the purposes of section 31, notwithstanding the provisions of the then existing order as to the power of the guardians, the vaccination officer had the duty to proceed. That is a decision on an analagous matter to the appeal now before us. In that case there was a positive order under the Act of 1898 that the instructions of the Local Government Board were to be obeyed by the vaccination officer. It was ordered that the vaccination officer should give a certain notice, and that if that notice was not complied with, it then became his duty to take proceedings for the enforcement of the law. The officer was bound to obey the order of the Local Government Board, and any order of the guardians interfering with that he would not be bound to obey. It cannot be said that the proceedings could not be entertained by the magistrates because the guardians had not given authority for them. This court cannot assume that there had been a bonâ fide investigation by the guardians. In my opinion it is the duty of the vaccination officer under these statutes and orders to see that the provisions for enforcing them are observed. For these reasons the appeal fails.

DARLING, J.—I agree. In my opinion question (1) in effect, if one looks at the case on which it is founded, comes to this—Whether the guardians, who have been compelled by mandamus to appoint an officer to enforce the vaccination laws, can satisfy the law by appointing an officer and then order him by resolution never to prosecute unless he has their sealed order to do so, and then never issue any sealed order and probably never intend to order one, so that to allow these guardians to act as they wish to do would be to reduce the vaccination law to an absolute nullity. They said that they would authorize him to prosecute, not such as had broken the law, but "such as they desired to be prosecuted." Their action reminds me of a celebrated recipe for preparing a cucumber

You were to choose it very carefully, as no doubt they chose their officer, peel it, cut it up into delicate slices, add to it expensive things like vinegar, pepper and oil, and then throw the whole mixture out of the window. In simple language, that is what the claim of the guardians came to. I cannot believe that Parliament devoted a world of trouble to bringing the vaccination laws to such a pass.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I do not think it is necessary to add anything to my lords' judgments.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Jan. 27; Feb. 18.

In re WEIBKING.
Ex parte WARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Property of bankrupt—Reputed ownership—Building agreement—Mortgage—Power of mortgagee to seize if builder "become bankrupt"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

A builder entered into a building agreement which provided that all the materials and plant brought upon the ground should "be deemed to be annexed to the freehold," and mortgaged all his interest under the agreement by a deed providing (inter alia) that if the builder should "become bankrupt" the mortgagee might take possession and complete the buildings. The mortgagee took possession on the day a receiving order was made against the builder on which he was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt.

Held, that the mortgagee was not entitled to seize because "become bankrupt" meant "be adjudicated a bankrupt."

Held, also, that the plant and materials on the land at the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, with the consent of the freeholder, who was the true owner, and passed to the trustee in the bankruptcy.

In re Ginger, 46 W. R. 144, [1897] 2 Q. B. 461, followed.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy of Weibking, a builder, against Mrs. Ann Hartley, the mortgagee of the bankrupt's interest in a building agreement, for a declaration that the plant and materials on the spot where the building was being carried on at the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy were the property of the bankrupt and passed to his trustee.

On the 22nd of July, 1901, Weibking entered into an agreement with the North London Ground Co. to erect fifty houses on certain plots of land of which the company was the freeholder. This agreement contained the following clauses:

"16. That Weibking was to be deemed tenant at will to the freeholder of the land until the leases agreed to be granted on completion of the houses should have been granted.

"17. That all builder's erections, building materials, and plant on the said land could be taken possession of by the lessor in the event of the tenant making default in erecting any of the houses, &c.; and thereupon the agreement was to cease, but without prejudice to the freeholder's right of action for rent, &c., or in respect of any breach by the tenant.

"18. That all materials and plant brought upon the said premises were to be deemed to be annexed to the freehold, the tenant, however, to have the option of purchasing the freehold."

On the 2nd of August Weibking mortgaged his interest in the building agreement to the respondent Ann Hartley by a deed assigning the building agreement and all interest thereunder as security for repayment to her with interest of moneys then advanced and to be advanced by her to him. The deed further provided that if Weibking should make default in payment of any principal or interest, or should not duly observe and fulfil the terms and conditions of the building agreement, or should "become bankrupt," then and in any such case, Ann Hartley might at any time thereafter enter into and upon and take possession of the land and buildings comprised in the building agreement, and complete any houses or buildings which might be unfinished in such manner as she should think fit, subject to the provisions of the building agreement.

On the 17th of August Weibking presented his own petition, on which a receiving order was made, and he was adjudicated bankrupt upon the 30th of August.

On the 17th of August, after the receiving order was made, Ann Hartley, with the consent of the freeholder, and on the ground that Weibking had "become bankrupt," entered and took possession of the land comprised in the building agreement, and afterwards completed some of the houses, using for that purpose loose plant and materials to the value of about £900, which were on the premises at the date of the receiving order.

Subsequently the trustee in bankruptcy disclaimed the building agreement, and launched the present motion.

Reed, K.C., Muir Mackenzie, and A. A. Hudson, for the trustee.—The goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt at the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy, for they were not seized by the mortgagee until the 17th of August, the date of the receiving order, and the receiving order, being a judicial act, dates back to the earliest moment of that day, thus making the commencement of the bankruptcy prior to the seizure. Nor was the mortgagee entitled under the agreement to seize when she did, for the debtor had not then been adjudicated bankrupt, and the words "become bankrupt" in a commercial document should be construed to mean "be adjudicated bankrupt" Further, if anyone has a right to these goods as against the trustee it is the freeholder and not the mortgagee, for by clause 18 of the building agreement they are to be deemed to be annexed to the freehold: see Reeves v. Barlow, 32 W. R. 672, 12 Q. B. D. 436. The trustee's contention is that the freeholder was the true owner, and that the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with his consent.

Warmington, K.C., and Lewis Thomas, for the mortgagee.—The goods were not the property of the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, the freeholder had the legal property in them by clause 18 of the building agreement, and if the bankrupt had no property in them it follows that the trustee has no claim to them. They were not a security to the freeholder for any debt, and consequently not within the Bills of Sale Acts. The mortgagee took possession of the goods with the assent of the freeholder, and was entitled to do so under the terms of the mortgage because the debtor "became bankrupt" on the 17th of August by committing an act of bankruptcy on which he was afterwards adjudicated bankrupt. In any case the trustee cannot establish his claim to the goods without bringing the freeholder before the court.

Reed, K.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a most embarrassing case. It seems to me neither of the parties here is in a position to make out a sufficient title. As regards the mortgagee, the mortgage gives to her no right to the chattels as such, but it gives to her the right on behalf of the builder to make the same use of them as the bankrupt himself could have made The mortgagee did nothing but what was right under the circumstances, provided she had a right to enter. It seems to me that no right to enter under the mortgage has arisen, because the only right given to the mortgagee is a right to enter if the builder should "become bankrupt." I think that in a contract those words ought to be construed strictly, being words of forfeiture. One knows of many leases and agreements of various kinds in which words of forfeiture occur, such as "if he shall commit an act of bankruptcy or petition the court," and so forth—words which are not found here. It seems to me, therefore, that the right to enter had not arisen in this case, and therefore no question arises as to whether the mortgagee became entitled. On the other hand, supposing the words "become bankrupt" are satisfied by an act of bankruptcy, then the mortgagee appears to me to be in another difficulty. There being an act of bankruptcy, the trustee's title accrued subject to any charge in favour of the mortgagee. There was not any charge in her favour over these chattels so far as I can see. The mortgagee only had the right to build and receive the leases, as the mortgagor would have done. Therefore it seems to me, as the matter stands at present, the mortgagee has no title. But I do not see how I am to give any relief to the trustee in bankruptcy without the presence of the freeholder. I cannot decide the question of order and disposition as against the freeholder in his absence. The building agreement purports to give to him the title to these chattels. I cannot say that the trustee has it. As between the trustee in bankruptcy and the mortgagee it seems clear enough that there was reputed ownership, because, if the freeholder was the true owner, then at the time of the act of bankruptcy I should hold on the evidence that the chattels were in the apparent possession of the builder, as the owner of them with the consent of the freeholder. I cannot decide that. But I think that the mortgagee has no title to these chattels.

Feb. 18.—The freeholder having been served with notice of the motion, the case came on for further hearing.

Reed, K.C., Muir Mackenzie, and A. A. Hudson, for the trustee, relied upon In re Ginger, 46 W. R. 144, [1897] 2 Q B. 461.

Beddall and S. R. Earle, for the freeholder.—In re Ginger is a decision upon the Bills of Sale Acts, which do not apply to this case, for the chattels were not a security for money lent. but were annexed to the freehold by clause 18 of the building agreement: Brown v. Bateman, 15 W. R. 350, L. R. 2 C. P. 272; Ex parte Newitt, In re Garrud, 29 W. R. 344, 16 Ch. D. 522; Blake v. Izard, 16 W. R. 108. The order and disposition clause does not apply because the freeholder is not deemed the true owner until he exercises his right of entry. As to the point that possession was not taken before act of bankruptcy, the court will take notice of fractions of days in calculating the date of an act of bankruptcy: Green v. Lawrie, 1 Ex. Ch. 335; Ex parte Bignold, 3 Mon. & Ayr. 477.

WRIGHT, J.—In my opinion this case is governed by the principle of In re Ginger. In the present case the freeholder had a clause in the building agreement which annexed to the freehold unconditionally all materials and plant brought on to the premises. Therefore the freeholder was the true owner of the materials and plant in a general sense. Then by the same instrument which gave him the ownership of the chattels he consented to their remaining in the possession of the builder as if the builder were the true owner. That being so, according to the principle laid down in In re Ginger, the assent given at the time of making the instrument operates as an assent for the purposes of the doctrine of reputed ownership. That being so, I think the case of the trustee is made out. But of course it does not apply to any plant and materials that had been built into and become part of the houses at the date of the act of bankruptcy. It only applies to the plant and materials which were loose on the premises at that date.

Appeal.
(Henn Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) } Dec. 5, 13; Feb. 13, 14.

LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS CO. v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY CO. AND MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Dock company—Railway lines and sidings on docks—Communication with railway company—Through rates—Regulation of Railways Act. 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), s. 3—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), s. 25.

The London and India Docks Co., constituted under powers conferred by various Acts of Parliament, had, under the provisions contained in such Acts, laid down lines of railway within their docks, forming a junction with the lines of the Great Eastern Railway Co., and extending for a distance of about three miles to the various warehouses and quays of the docks, for the purpose of the carriage of goods in the trucks and wagons of the railway company to and from the railway company and the warehouses and quays, and had also constructed a group of sidings for the accommodation of the trucks, wagons, and engines used in such traffic.

The Acts under which the dock company was constituted did not, in respect of such lines and sidings, incorporate the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Acts or contain any of the usual statutory provisions relating to railways.

The dock company applied under section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, to have through rates fixed by the Railway Commissioners in respect of the traffic from their warehouses and quays to certain places on the Midland Railway Co.'s system, viâ the Great Eastern Railway Co.'s lines.

Railway Commissioners, that the dock company under the provisions of their Acts of Parliament were not a "railway company" nor were their lines and sidings part of a continuous line of railway communication within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, and, therefore, the dock company were not entitled to through rates under section 25 of that Act.

Semble, a railway company entitled to demand a through rate under section 25 must be a railway company constituted by statutory authority and owning a line which forms part of a continuous route, that section presupposing that the demanding company has itself a line which is to form a substantial part of the route.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the railway companies, from the judgment of the Railway and Canal Commission (Wright, J., and Viscount Cobham, Sir Frederick Peel dissenting), on an application made by the London and East India Dock Co. under section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888.

The application was as follows:

The applicants were the owners of certain docks in the port of London, and in particular they had vested in them the control and management of the docks known as the Royal Victoria and Albert Docks.

The docks had been constructed under the powers conferred by various Acts of Parliament, of which those most relevant to the present application are the London and St. Katharine Docks Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.) and the London and St. Katharine Docks Co. Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. cliii.).

Under the powers of these Acts the applicants (including under this term their predecessors in title) constructed lines of railway forming a junction with the lines of railway of the Great Eastern Railway Co. and extending for a distance of three miles or thereabouts on either side of the Victoria and Albert Docks to the various warehouses and quays of these docks. In particular they constructed at great cost a group of sidings known as the "exchange sidings," commencing at a distance of twenty-nine chains from the junction with the Great Eastern Railway. Such sidings were authorized to be constructed as being "necessary and convenient for the marshalling, reception, delivery, standing, and accommodation of trains, carriages, wagons, and engines used for purposes of dock traffic passing or intending to pass to or from the Victoria Dock extension from or to the North Woolwich branch, so as to render unnecessary the shunting or stopping of such trains, carriages, wagons, or engines, on the North Woolwich branch. The applicants conveyed traffic by means of their own engines and servants from all parts of the Victoria and Albert Docks to the exchange sidings and there placed the trucks containing it in train order on lines appropriated for the time to the traffic of the defendants and of the several other railway companies respectively conveying traffic from these docks. The total length of the lines of railway constructed upon the Royal Victoria and Albert Docks for the purpose of bringing railway traffic to and from the Great Eastern Railway was about forty-five miles.

As regards the construction of the lines of railway and the carrying on upon them of the traffic referred to, the applicants contended they were a railway company within the meaning of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, and were entitled under that Act, as amended by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, to apply to the Court of the Railway and Canal Commission for the order hereinafter prayed for.

Under the terms of an agreement made on the 18th of April, 1864, between the dock companies of the one part, and the London and North-Western Railway Co., the Great Eastern Railway Co., and the Great Northern Railway Co., of the other part, the applicants performed the service of loading the traffic referred to in the third paragraph, and the further services therein mentioned for the all-round sum of 1s. 5d. per ton, and the applicants were willing to submit to the order of the court as proposed herein under which the terms of the agreement were made applicable to the through rates proposed. There was a large volume of traffic landed ex ship on to the quays of the Royal Victoria and Albert Docks and dispatched thence, either direct or after warehousing in the applicants' warehouses, to stations on the Midland Railway. The defendants refused to quote appropriate or reasonable through rates to be charged upon such traffic. Instead thereof they charged the rates published in the rate-book of the defendants, the Midland Railway Co., at their Victoria Dock station. Such rates in respect of traffic classified in classes 1 to 5 of the Railway Clearing House classification included, in addition to charges in respect of station and service terminals, a charge for cartage in London over an area extending as far as Stroud Green on the north, Forest Gate and Galleons on the east, Wandsworth-road on the south, and Ladbroke-grove on the west, and varying in amount, according to the class of traffic, between 3s. 9d. and 6s. 8d. per ton.

It was not in the interest of the public that freighters should be required to pay such sums for the service of cartage when, as was the fact in respect of the traffic hereinbefore referred to, no such service and no equivalent for such service was actually performed, and it was in the interest of the public that through rates, omitting charges for such services not rendered, should be quoted for the traffic in question.

The applicants wrote to the defendants on the 12th of June, 1901, proposing the through rates for traffic passing over their lines of railway to certain stations on the Midland Railway—namely, to Bedford, Northampton, Leicester, Derby, Sheffield, and Nottingham.

The route proposed: To the exchange sidings, thence by the Great Eastern Railway to Tottenham, thence by the Tottenham and Hampstead Junction Railway to Junction-road, and thence by the Midland Railway to destination.

The above-mentioned class rates include the provision of station accommodation upon the dock premises, the service of loading and covering, conveyance to the dock company's exchange sidings, conveyance thence to destination and unloading, and also the service of carting within the ordinary cartage boundaries of the towns named.

The apportionment proposed: To the London and India Docks Co. in respect of the following services—namely, haulage of empty trucks belonging to the Great Eastern Railway Co. from the exchange sidings to the point of loading at warehouse, shed, or quay, as the case may be, the loading of the goods and the covering of the same with sheets provided by the said railway companies or either of them, and the haulage of the loaded trucks to the exchange sidings, 1s. 5d.; to the Great Eastern Railway Co., 1s.; to the Midland Railway Co., the remainder of the rate.

The defendants replied on the 21st of June, 1901, to the effect that they objected to the proposed through rates as not being a due and reasonable facility in the interest of the public, to the amounts of the proposed rates, and to the proposed apportionment thereof; and, further, that the proposed through rates would, if sanctioned, create a preference in favour of the Victoria and Albert Docks over other London docks; that the proposed rates were not and could not be made applicable in both directions, and that the London and India Docks Co. were not a railway company and were not entitled to propose through rates in the capacity of a railway company.

The applicants applied to the Court of the Railway and Canal Commission under the above-mentioned Acts, and more particularly under section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, for an order allowing the through rates, and the apportionment of the same, as proposed by the applicants and set out in the schedule appended to the application.

In their answer the Midland Railway Co. alleged (inter alia) that the applicants were not a railway company, and were not entitled to require the defendants to quote the through rates proposed; that the proposed through rates were not required in the public interest as due and reasonable facilities for receiving, forwarding, or delivering traffic to which the through rates applied; that the defendants carried, and were willing to carry, traffic from the docks, quays, and warehouses to the places mentioned in the application at through charges which were lower than the charges which the railway company had power to make and were reasonable, and that the applicants were bound to perform part of the services for which these charges were made as the agents of the company for the sum of 1s. 5d. per ton under an agreement between the company and the applicants' predecessors in title, dated the 18th of December, 1877; and that if the applicants were a railway company and entitled to require through rates, there were through rates already in force, and that the company could not be required to quote any other through rates, and that the proposed through rates were insufficient in amount.

The Great Eastern Railway Co. answered (inter alia) that under an agreement made between the Midland and Great Eastern Railway Co., the Midland Railway Co. exercise running powers over the Great Eastern Railway between the Royal Victoria Dock and the junction at Tottenham with the Tottenham and Hampstead Junction Railway; that the Midland Railway Co. fix the through rates to the Royal Victoria Dock, and pay to the Great Eastern Railway Co. for the use of their line a proportion of receipts.

When the application was first made to the court, the docks company were the only applicants; then a second application was made, in which the Mansion House Association on Railway and Canal Traffic were added to the dock company as applicants, but the dock company did not apply as a railway company. In consequence of the opinion of the court that the dock company were a railway company and ought to apply as such, the application was then made in the present form by the dock company alone, claiming as a railway company.

Section 3 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), provides: "In this Act—the term 'railway company' includes any person being the owner or lessee of or working any railway in the United Kingdom constructed or carried on under the powers of any Act of Parliament; the term 'person' includes a body of persons corporate or unincorporate; the term 'railway' includes every station, siding, wharf, or dock of or belonging to such railway, and used for the purposes of public traffic."

Section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), provides: "Subject as hereinafter mentioned, the said facilities [that is, facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic] to be so afforded are hereby declared to and shall include the due and reasonable receiving, forwarding, and delivering by every railway company and canal company and railway and canal company, at the request of any other such company, of through traffic to and from the railway or canal of any other such company at through rates, tolls, or fares (in this Act referred to as through rates); and also the due and reasonable receiving, forwarding, and delivering by every railway company and canal company and railway and canal company, at the request of any person interested in through traffic, of such traffic at through rates," &c.

The London and St. Katharine Docks Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.), provides: Section 146. "It shall be lawful for the company on the one hand, and the Great Eastern Railway Co., the London and North-Western Railway Co., the North London Railway Co., the Great Northern Railway Co., the Midland Railway Co., and the Great Western Railway Co., or either of them, on the other hand, to enter into agreements with respect to the rates and charges to be levied by the company upon railway traffic using the said docks, and as to the making of any through rates and charges, and the division and apportionment thereof, and as to the facilities to be afforded to such traffic to and at such docks, and as to the use by the said railway companies of the railways, tramways, jetties, and other conveniences at the said docks."

Section 147. "It shall be lawful [for the above railway companies respectively] with their carriages, wagons, and servants, to use free of charge, the railways, tramways, and other conveniences at the London Dock and the Victoria Dock, so as to enable them to convey goods and other traffic to and from the shipping there, subject only to such reasonable rules and regulations as the company may find it necessary in the public interest to make; and the company shall provide space at the Victoria Dock for the erection of offices by [the above-named railway companies, omitting the Great Eastern Co.] for clerks and for storage of sheets, ropes, and other necessary articles required by the said railway companies, or either of them, for the conduct of their business."

The London and St. Katharine Docks Co. Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. cliii.), provides: Section 4. "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the company are further hereby empowered to execute and do the following works and things (that is to say), (b) The making, providing, and maintaining, in connection with the aforesaid works or any of them, of all necessary or convenient locks, gates, graving docks, shipping places, wharves, quays, slips, jetties, landing-places, stages, rails, trams, sidings, stations, platforms, ways, approaches, warehouses, sheds, . . . and other works and conveniences."

Section 6. "With respect to the alteration which will be rendered necessary by the execution of the Victoria Dock extension of the line and levels of the North Woolwich Branch Railway of the Great Eastern Railway Co. (which railway and company are in this section referred to respectively as "The North Woolwich Branch" and "The Great Eastern Co."), the following provisions shall have effect:

"(k) The company shall either set apart such sidings, or shall allow the Great Eastern Co. upon the company's Victoria Dock estate to lay down free of charge and maintain such sidings as may be necessary and convenient for the marshalling, reception, delivery, standing, and accommodation of trains, carriages, wagons, and engines used for purposes of dock traffic passing or intended to pass to or from the Victoria Dock extension from or to the North Woolwich branch, so as to render unnecessary the shunting or stopping of such trains, carriages, wagons, or engines on the North Woolwich branch; and the company shall permit any such sidings, whether set apart by them or laid down by the Great Eastern Co., to be fully and freely worked and used by the last-mentioned company for dock traffic."

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 13.—WRIGHT, J., read the following judgment: This case is an application by the London and India Docks Co. against the Great Eastern Railway Co. and the Midland Railway Co. for through rates, and the application alleges that the dock company are owners of the docks, and the docks have been constructed under powers of Acts of Parliament; that under those Acts the applicants or their predecessors in title have constructed lines of a railway forming a junction with a railway of the Great Eastern Railway Co. and extending for a distance of three miles on either side of the docks, to various warehouses and quays, and in particular that they have constructed the exchange sidings commencing about twenty-nine chains on the dock side from the junction with the Great Eastern Railway. Then they quote the provision of the Act under which those sidings were constructed, and state that they, the dock company, convey traffic by means of their own engines and servants from all parts of the dock to the exchange sidings, and there place the trucks containing the traffic in train order on lines appropriated for the time to the traffic of the defendants, and of other railway companies conveying traffic from the docks. The total length of the lines of railway within the dock property for the purpose of bringing railway traffic to and from the Great Eastern Railway is about forty-five miles. Then the applicants refer to an agreement of 1864, and then state the facts and claim an order allowing a through rate with a particular apportionment.

To-day we have not to deal with any question of the merits. We have merely to deal with the question of jurisdiction, and that is, put shortly, whether the dock company are for this purpose in the position of a railway company owning and working a railway. There is no doubt or question whatever but that for some purposes the dock company are a railway company. Of course they have railways—that is clear, and a very extensive system of railways—on their dock estate. They are a railway company unquestionably for some purposes, and for some purposes of the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts. Under an Act of 1882 they own and work a passenger line in all respects under the same conditions under which ordinary passenger lines are owned and worked. They have been held to be a railway company under the Railway Companies Act, 1867, and the decision holding them to be a railway company, In re East and West India Dock Co., 36 W. R. 849, 38 Ch. D. 576, has been recognized by Parliament in the Act which provides for the amalgamation of the dock companies, which enacted that the amalgamation should not deprive them of their status under that Act. But the question is whether for this particular purpose of through rates they are in the position of a railway company within the meaning of section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888. That section provides (without reading it all) that every railway company owning or working railways which form part of a continuous line of railway or railway communication (I leave out about canals) shall afford all due and reasonable facilities, and so forth; and it goes on to enact that one of these facilities shall be the due and reasonable receiving, forwarding, and delivering by every railway company at the request of every other such company, all through traffic to and from the railway of any other such company at through rates tolls, or fares, and also the due and reasonable receiving, forwarding, and delivering by every railway company at the request of any person interested in through traffic, of such traffic at through rates. Now, in determining whether the dock company are within that enactment, there are many things to be considered. There are two categories under either of which the dock company might be supposed to come. First of all, there may be a dock system in which there are laid down, in the docks, railways which may be called simply dock railways—domestic railways for the purposes of dock traffic within the docks constructed under general powers to do what is necessary for the work of the docks, and merely, as it were, by chance, connect at the dock gates with some external railway. In a case like that it may be that there would be some purposes under the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts with regard to which we should have jurisdiction over them as railway companies, but hardly, I think, in relation to the 25th section of the Traffic Act of 1888 as regards through tolls and rates. It is not necessary to express any opinion whether we should have jurisdiction in a case of that kind. In the other category would fall a dock company whose property includes railways or portions of railways, forming in fact a continuation of general railway systems outside the dock estate, connecting the dock railways with those railways as part of one continuous system, and appropriated for that purpose by statute. It is within that latter category that, as it seems to me (I am afraid we are not quite unanimous), the dock company comes. First of all, by the Dock Companies Act, 1864, s. 146, it was provided that it may be lawful for the dock company and a railway company to enter into agreements with respect to the rates and charges to be levied by the dock company upon railway traffic using the docks, and as to the making of through rates and charges and the division and apportionment thereof, and as to the facilities to be afforded. If that section stood alone it would probably not be enough to make the dock railways a continuation of the railways outside. Then comes section 147, which says: "It shall be lawful for the Great Eastern," and other railway companies there specified, "with their carriages, wagons, and servants to use, free of charge, the railways, tramways, and other conveniences at the London Dock and the Victoria Dock, so as to enable them to convey goods and other traffic to and from shipping there, subject only to such reasonable rules and regulations as the company may find it necessary in the public interest to make," and the dock company shall provide space for offices for the company, and for storage and so forth. Now, if that were the whole of the matter, I should be very much inclined to think it brought the dock company's railways within the scope of the Traffic Act of 1888, because it gives an absolute right for the railway companies named to use these dock railways as a continuation af their own system subject only to reasonable rules and regulations in the public interest. The matter does not rest there, nor does it rest merely on those two sections coupled with the agreement which was made during the passing of the Act of 1864, by which a right was given to the railway companies to exercise their powers on the terms mentioned in the agreement It does not rest there, because there comes next the Dock Companies Act of 1875. By the Act of 1875, s. 6, sub-section (f), the company are constituted proprietors of a branch called the North Woolwich branch, and in relation to that branch it seems to me that they would unquestionably be a railway company for all the purposes of any traffic which passed from outside systems over that branch, but I do not understand that that is the case in this instance, or, at any rate, I have not heard any statement that traffic, to which this application refers, is to be carried over that branch. Then in the same section there is sub-section (k), which provides, leaving out the immaterial words, that, "the dock company shall set apart such sidings"—there is an alternative given which has been adopted—"as may be necessary and convenient for the marshalling, reception, delivery, standing, and accommodation of trains, carriages, wagons, and engines, used for the purposes of dock traffic passing or intending to pass to or from the Victoria Dock extension from or to the North Woolwich branch so far as to render unnecessary the shunting or stopping of such trains, carriages, wagons, or engines on the North Woolwich branch; and the company shall permit any such sidings, whether set apart by them or laid down by the Great Eastern Co., to be fully and freely worked and used by the last-mentioned company for dock traffic." Now it seems to me that the proper conclusion is, that under these various powers and regulations the dock company's railways, which are worked in the ordinary manner with locomotives and so forth as if they were ordinary railways, and are worked under powers, not optional, but compulsory, on the dock company in connection with the system of the Great Eastern Railway Co., must be regarded as railways within the scope of section 25 of the Traffic Act of 1888. I do not see what element is wanting. They are unquestionably railways. The railways are owned and worked by the dock company; they are owned and worked by the dock company under Parliamentary authority, and they are part of one continuous route from the system of the Great Eastern Railway Co. to the quay sides. At any rate, they are part of the continuous route from the system of the Great Eastern Co. to a long way within the dock boundary — namely, the exchange sidings — a distance of twenty-nine chains, I think it is, inside the dock boundary. Now, that part, at any rate those twenty-nine chains, or whatever the distance may be, seems to me to be unquestionably part of one continuous system of railway communication. I do not think it is necessary to say whether the rest of the dock railways reached from the Great Eastern system viâ the exchange sidings are in the same sense part of the continuation of the general railway system or not; but at any rate, as regards that portion of the exchange sidings it seems to me that the section is applicable, and that is enough to make the dock company interested in a portion of the route, which route consists of the Great Eastern system, and of this portion of the exchange siding in combination with the one route. It is said that there are no statutory tolls. That is quite true. There is no statutory regulation of tolls or rates chargeable by the dock company for the use of this railway, although there is a statutory regulation of the maximum tolls and rates which they can charge for all dock services, but the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts do not provide, either in the definition of a railway company or elsewhere, that the existence of a statutory regulation of tolls or rates shall be essential as a condition for the application of the Act. Then it is said no returns are made to the Board of Trade, and no provisional order was issued by the Board of Trade or passed by Parliament in relation to the dock railway company. There may have been reasons for that, or it may have been a slip on the part of the Board of Trade. That cannot govern the construction of the section. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the dock company are a railway company not merely for some purposes but for this particular purpose, and that the application is well-founded in that respect.

Sir FREDERICK PEEL read the following judgment: This is an application to us to order through rates proposed to the Midland and the Great Eastern Railway Companies by the London and India Dock Co. for traffic from the Victoria and Albert Dock, viâ the dock company's lines of railway, to stations on the Midland Railway. The question is whether these dock lines are a railway within the meaning of section 25 of the Traffic Act of 1888, which describes the traffic a railway company may be required to forward at through rates as traffic arriving by the railway of another railway company. Now, a railway for this purpose must be one constructed or carried on under the powers of an Act of Parliament, and I am inclined to think that the dock company's portion of the through route is not a railway of that sort. The three Dock Acts of 1853, 1864, and 1875 are the material we have for judging of this. The Act of 1853 required the dock company to permit the Eastern Counties Railway Co. to lay down railways at the intended Victoria Dock, but gave the dock company itself power only to make tramways in connection with the dock, and the Act of 1864, which transferred the Victoria Dock estate to the London and St. Katharine Dock Co., while it authorized the Great Eastern, the Midland, and other railway companies to use the railways, tramways, and conveniences at the London Dock and the Victoria Dock, left the powers of the dock company for constructing or carrying on railways as it stood under previous Acts. Then under the provisions of the Act of 1875 for the extension of the Victoria Dock, the dock company are either to set aside for the use of the Great Eastern Co., or to allow that company to lay down upon the Victoria Dock estate such sidings as may be necessary for the accommodation of trains with traffic passing between the Victoria Dock extension and the Great Eastern Railway Co.'s North Woolwich branch, so as to dispense with any shunting of the trains on that branch. In the execution of this Act the dock company appear to have constructed on their dock estate large sidings for the exchange of traffic, having a junction at one end with the North Woolwich branch, and connecting at the other end with the docks. By agreement with the Great Eastern and other railway companies they work the dock railway traffic over these lines to and from the exchange sidings to which the railway companies come to receive and forward or deliver it, as the case may be. The sidings and lines so made by the dock company are their portion of the proposed through route, and the question is, I think, does the direction to set apart sidings for dock railway traffic make the sidings so set apart a railway, and the company providing or owning them a railway company? It seems to me that it does not, because the sidings which the dock company are directed to set apart refer, I think, to the sidings which by section 4 of the Act they are authorized to make in connection with the Victoria Dock extension, and, unless these sidings are a railway, I do not think the setting them apart for Great Eastern Railway traffic would make them such. The various works, however, authorized by section 4 are evidently allowed as works incidental to and an integral part of the dock undertaking, and the company's position in relation to them is that of a dock company only. In other respects the applicants have none of the grounds for being regarded as a railway company, which in the case of Manchester Ship Canal Co., 10 Ry. & Can. Traff. Cas. 54, led us to regard that company as a railway company competent to propose through rates to and from their docks, and on the whole I think the through rates as proposed by the applicants cannot be granted.

Viscount COBHAM.—So far as I have been able to form an opinion on the different points of law and construction which are involved in this case my conclusion is in accord with that of the learned judge, and I shall not attempt to add anything to what he has said.

From this judgment the railway companies now appealed.

The case was heard, by consent of the parties, before only two members of the Court of Appeal.

Moon (Cripps, K.C., and Asquith, K.C., with him), for the appellants.

Balfour Browne, K.C., and Waghorn (Freeman, K.C., with them), for the respondents.—The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgments of the court.

The following cases were cited: In re East and West India Dock Co., 36 W. R. 849, 38 Ch. D. 576; East and West India Dock Co. v. Shaw, Savill, & Albion Co., 39 Ch. D. 524, 37 W. R. Dig. 153; Manchester Ship Canal Co. v. Midland Railway Co., 10 Rly. & Can. Traff. Cas. 54; and Williams v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1900] 1 Q. B. 760, 48 W. R. Dig. 106.

HENN COLLINS, M.R.—This is an application under section 25 of the Railway Traffic Act, 1888, by the London and India Dock Co. in its capacity as a railway company for a through rate from its docks or warehouses on the Victoria or Albert Docks to different places named on the systems of the Great Eastern Railway and the Midland Railway Co. [The learned judge here read section 25.] It seems to me that a railway company which demands a through rate must be a railway company owning a line which forms part of a continuous route. Section 25 presupposes that the demanding company has itself a line which is to form a part of that route, not a mere infinitesimal part, but a part which would be substantially treated as part of the transitus between two given places. In this case the applicants are a dock company; they exist for the purpose of making and working a dock, and as incident to that they came into existence under statutory powers, and as incident to that of course they had to take powers to lay down rails or tramways, and generally to bring into existence all the appliances which are ancillary to the working of a dock. I do not propose to go in detail through the numerous clauses in the Act which Mr. Moon, in his very clear argument, has brought to our attention; but I think I am justified in saying this, that you do not find in them provisions treating dock companies as railways, which you would expect to find had the Legislature intended to constitute them railway companies for all purposes. It is a very remarkable thing that in a series of Acts we do not find the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act incorporated except for certain purposes that have no specific relation to the demand in question in this case. They are regarded as dock companies, with the ordinary incidents of dock companies as such; they are not treated as railways in the ordinary sense of the term.

Now it is said that the dock company in this case comes within the statutory definition of a railway which is to be found in section 3 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873: "The term 'railway company' includes any person being the owner or lessee of or working any railway in the United Kingdom constructed or carried on under the powers of any Act of Parliament." It must be a "railway" to begin with; and then it must be constructed or carried on under the powers of an Act of Parliament. Further down it says: "The term includes every station, siding, wharf, or dock of or belonging to such railway and used for the purpose of public traffic." It seems to me perfectly clear, and Mr. Balfour Browne did not contend to the contrary, that though the term "railway" includes siding, wharf, and so on, a siding or wharf which is not otherwise part of a railway does not of itself constitute a railway; and, therefore, if you have a siding which is used as a siding and is brought into existence under statutory powers, it is not a railway unless it belongs to a railway and is a siding of a railway. You have to find your railway before you can say that the siding itself is a part of the railway or that it comes within the law dealing with railways.

Now in this case the through route in respect of which the applicants desire a through rate is one from their warehouses on either of the said two docks to what are called the exchange sidings, and thence on to the line either of the Great Eastern or the Midland Railway Co. The applicants' share of the route is simply composed of railway lines round about and over the docks by means of which they carry on the ordinary business of the dock. These lines, in no sense, in my judgment, form a continuous route between two given places. They are the lines over which the dock traffic is managed, and I think it would be a departure from common-sense and the ordinary meaning of terms if we were to hold that these lines which constitute the ordinary means of dealing with dock traffic, moving goods from warehouse to warehouse, and so on, are parts of a through route, parts of the transitus from one point to a distant point on another railway.

When one looks at the thing broadly, it seems to me that the dock and the appliances about it are really nothing more than a large station, and that all these appliances subsist for the purpose of doing that which would be done at a station, getting traffic about to and fro, where it is necessary in the station. They are not part of a line with a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem at all, and, therefore, if Mr. Balfour Browne had been driven to rely on these lines only he would not, I think, have contended that he had any locus standi as a railway company.

But the dock company, having been made up of a series of amalgamations, has within it, as it now exists, several docks, to some of which railways in the full sense of the term are annexed, and being in that sense owners of railways, he contends that the dock company is a railway company and entitled to demand a through rate. He points to two lines, the Royal Albert Dock Railway and the Blackwall Railway. With respect to the former it is not one that has anything whatever to do with the point in discussion before us now: it is not part of a route over which the through rate is asked for, because it is a line that at the present time has no power to carry goods, and the through rate is not demanded in respect of it, neither for the same reason is the Blackwall line.

Then we come to what has here been called the transferred line. The facts with respect to that are these: When the Royal Albert Dock was being made it was found that the work would interfere with the already existing line of the Great Eastern Railway Co., which ran across the site of the proposed dock and on to North Woolwich station, and therefore the Great Eastern Railway Co., in order that its traffic might not be interrupted, carried its line under the site by means of a tunnel, but they left the old line which had been used before in its old position.

That had to be interrupted by a drawbridge, and an arrangement was made whereby that part of the line which was so interrupted, and for which the tunnel was substituted, was handed over to the dock company, the Great Eastern Co. still retaining the right in special circumstances to pass trains over it, and they have occasionally done so. The dock company, on the other hand, acquired a right to run trains over it, and it was contended on their behalf that because they own part of a fully-constituted railway line they are railway owners and are therefore entitled to demand a through rate. I do not think they are the owners of this bit of the line in the full sense of a railway company in the ordinary sense of the word. This railway has been denuded of its special railway characteristics in the process of transfer to the dock company, and the dock company do not even now possess over it any charging powers whatever, such as one would expect to find, and such as the Great Eastern Railway Co. did possess over it. It has been taken out of the position of an ordinary railway and is now used by the dock company simply for the purposes of their dock. They cannot be treated in reference to their ownership of this piece of line as a railway company or as the owners of a railway in the proper sense of the terms. Nor do I think if they were a railway company they could avail themselves of the section simply in respect of this particular piece of line and make that their ground for their demand for a through rate, because they had to propose their through route, and their proposal is from the different warehouses along the dock most of which are apparently not in connection with this particular bit of railway line at all.

But it is contended on the part of the dock company that inasmuch as they have a piece of real railway they are a railway company in respect of it, and can draw in all the lines connected with it and say that they are sidings and approaches to a railway, and therefore are entitled to demand over them a through route. I think that it would be quite absurd to say that the sidings in this case and the rest of these lines are ancillary in any sense to that bit of railway. On the other hand, it seems to me that the bit of railway is really merged into what I may call the tramways, and that their lines are used simply as ancillary to the dock system. I think therefore that these lines cannot be called a railway in any sense within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888.

On these grounds it seems to me that the applicants have failed to show anything in the nature of a through route, part of which passes over their own line, or that they are owners of a railway over which they are prepared to offer a through route. But it is said that the decision in the case of the Manchester Ship Canal Co. v. The Midland Railway Co. concludes this case against the defendants. I was a party to that case, as was also Sir Frederick Peel, and I think that instead of it being an authority in favour of the applicants in this case, it is an authority against them. The decision was in favour of the applicants in that case simply and solely on grounds which do not exist here, and, in fact, it is a decision that, but for the existence of those very special circumstances, must have been the other way. In that case there were special powers whereby the Ship Canal Co. were able to charge tolls on railways, and they had actually an order made by statutory power regulating the tolls and charges which they were to make, and they were therefore held to be in the position of persons who owned a real railway in the proper sense of the term over which the public were allowed to travel at certain given rates, and that they were therefore in the position of a railway company so as to leave it within the jurisdiction of the railway commissioners to grant them a through rate. I think that was an extreme case. I think it was decided on very special circumstances which do not exist here. I think Sir Frederick Peel has taken the right view in the present case. He differs from my brother Wright, and I can say no more than that in this case I prefer his reasoning, which commends itself to me and which I agree with, to that of my brother Wright. I think, therefore, this appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is clear that section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, explained by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, contemplates a continuous line of railway communication with complete different lines of railway, and that it must be a railway created by statutory authority. Has that section any application to the present case? Here it is said: You have tramways worked by steam called railways; they are provided by the dock company for the accommodation of their goods, and are railways within the meaning of this Act. I should have thought that it is perfectly clear that they are not. They are not part of a continuous line of communication from one terminus to another. They are provisions made by the dock company for carrying on its business in a way convenient to itself.

It was said by Mr. Balfour Browne that there was another ground on which these lines of communication and sidings could be treated as a railway. That was that the portion of the railway called the transferred line was a railway constituted by a proper authority created in the ordinary way, and that this line of tramway and sidings must be treated as belonging to that, and forming part of a railway system. Now, I am unable to accept the statement that that transferred line retains its old character of a railway. It seems to me that it has been practically transferred into the group of tramways which were used by the dock company for the purpose of their business. Then we had an argument as to the sidings, and the sidings were said to be of themselves a railway, and that the communication with them therefore belonged to the dock company as a railway company. But suppose the sidings had been placed at the boundary of the dock premises, and the goods had been taken from the railway company there by the dock company, could it be reasonably said that the sidings under those circumstances, because of their communication with the railway lines outside, had become a railway within the meaning of the Act?

I am clearly of opinion that this last argument fails, like the others, and I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., [1901] 1 Ch. 550, 49 W. R. Dig. 175, affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., [1901] 1 Ch. 550, 49 W. R. Dig. 175.

The National Biscuit Co. of New Jersey City, in the United States of America, applied, under section 62 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, for registration of a trade-mark consisting of the word "Uneeda" in respect of biscuits and other articles.

Section 64 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, as amended by section 10 of the Act of 1888, enacts as follows: "For the purposes of this Act a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars: . . . (d) An invented word or invented words; or (e) a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name."

An affidavit made in support of the application stated as follows: "The word 'Uneeda' was first invented by H. N. MacKinney, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, U.S.A., of the advertising department of the applicant company, and was originally intended to be associated with a picture of an Indian maiden, and was therefore the name of an aborigine of the North American Continent. It was also intended that a pathetic legend or story should accompany this word, but the pictorial part was afterwards abandoned and simply the word used."

The comptroller refused to register the trade-mark on the grounds—first, that the word "Uneeda" was not an invention, but was a mere misspelling of the words "You need a," and misspelling could not be considered invention; secondly, that the words "You need a" were words having reference to the character or quality of the goods, as they conveyed the idea that the prospective purchaser's personal comfort would be promoted by the acquisiton of the article.

The company applied to Cozens-Hardy, J., for an order directing the comptroller to proceed with the application for registration.

Cozens-Hardy, J., refused the application, being of opinion that on both the grounds taken by the comptroller the word "Uneeda" was not a proper subject of registration as a trade-mark.

The company appealed.

Moulton, K.C., and E. F. Lever, for the company.—There is as much invention in the word "Uneeda" as there was in the word "Solio," which was held by the House of Lords to be an invented word: Eastman Photographic Materials Co. (Limited) v. Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks, 47 W. R. 152, [1898] A. C. 571.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the Comptroller-General, were not called upon to argue.

THE COURT (COLLINS, M.R., and ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ.) dismissed the appeal.

Settled land—Conflict between provisions of will and provisions of Settled Land Acts—Consent—Undivided shares—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 56 (2)—Settled Land Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), s. 6 (2).

If lands are settled in undivided shares, a power of sale of the whole given to the trustees will conflict with the powers of sale of their shares possessed by the tenants for life under the Settled Land Acts, and cannot be exercised without the consent of all the tenants for life of undivided shares. Each of such persons is merely tenant for life of his undivided share, so that the consent of one of them would not be sufficient under section 6 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1884, to enable the trustees to sell the entirety.

Adjourned summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874.

By the will of E. C. Osborne all his real estate and also his residuary personal estate were devised and bequeathed to trustees upon trust that they should stand possessed thereof and of the investments and proceeds as to one-fifth part for each of his four daughters, and as to the remaining fifth part for the children of a deceased daughter who being a son or sons should attain the age of twenty-five years, or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry. The share of each daughter was settled upon her during her life, with a restraint on anticipation, with remainder to such person or persons as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for children or other issue who should attain the age of twenty-five years, or in the case of daughters should marry. There was also a gift over in case of the death of any of the daughters without issue and without having exercised her power of appointment, and a power to the trustees to sell or dispose of any part of the real and personal estate either by public auction or private contract as they should think proper and beneficial.

In June, 1901, the trustees of the will contracted to sell certain leasehold property which formed part of the testator's residuary estate.

At that time three of the testator's daughters were still living and had husbands living, and a fourth had died intestate and without exercising the power of appointment, and left a husband and a son who was her heir-at-law. There were five children of the daughter who had died before the date of the will, and three of them had attained the age of twenty-five years. It was stated that only one of the shares of the three daughters who were still living had become vested by the exercise of the power of appointment.

The purchasers required the concurrence of all the tenants for life of undivided shares; the vendors offered the concurrence of only one of them, which they submitted was sufficient.

The present summons was accordingly taken out by the purchasers, who asked for a declaration whether or not the power of sale given by the will to the trustees was exercisable without the consent of any person or persons, and if any such consent was required, then of whom.

Upon the hearing of the summons it was admitted that the limitations in favour of the children of the testator's surviving daughters were void as transgressing the rule against perpetuities.

J. T. Prior, for the purchasers.—There is in this case a conflict within the meaning of section 56 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, between the powers conferred by the Act on the tenant for life and those which the will gives to the trustees: In re Pocock and Prankerd's Contract, 44 W. R. 247, [1896] 1 Ch. 302; Earl of Lonsdale v. Lowther, [1900] 2 Ch. 687, 49 W. R. Dig. 157. Therefore the trustee cannot sell without some consent, and the persons whose consent is required are all the tenants for life of the separate shares.

E. P. Hewitt, for the vendors.—First, there is no conflict within the meaning of the section, for there is no tenant for life of the entirety. Secondly, if there is a conflict, and the consent of some person is required, then the consent of one of the tenants for life of an undivided share is sufficient, under section 6 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1884.

Prior, in reply.—The section does not apply because there are not two or more persons who together make up a tenant for life, but several tenants for life of undivided shares. Cooper v. Belsey, 47 W. R. 443, [1899] 1 Ch. 639, shows that the case of a settlement of an undivided share falls within section 56 of the Act.

KEKEWICH, J., after referring to the terms of the will, continued as follows: It is necessary for the present only to notice that the testator's daughters became tenants for life in possession of their shares with absolute powers of appointment by deed or will. The testator gave his trustees power to sell or dispose of his real and residuary personal estate, and they have purported to exercise that power of sale. The question is whether they can exercise that power of sale, or whether by reason of the provision in section 56 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, they are bound to get the consent of some persons to the sale. It seemed good to the Legislature in introducing the new code contained in the Settled Land Act, 1882, to provide for the case of conflict between the provisions of a settlement and those of the Act. [His lordship read section 56 (2), and continued as follows:] If the trustees were selling the share which has been settled in trust for any one of the daughters, no doubt her consent would be required. The sub-section is strangely worded, and it seems to me that the first and second parts of it do not exactly fit together; but it is perfectly clear that the object of the sub-section was to maintain the code of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and to provide that no power exercisable under a will shall in any way conflict with the exercise of the power conferred by the statute on persons beneficially interested under the will. The first argument on behalf of the vendors is that here there is no conflict. It is said that there can be no conflict between a power given to trustees to sell the entirety and the power of a tenant for life to sell his or her part or share of the estate. That there is a conflict as regards the particular part or share of the estate can hardly be denied, and I think that if authority were wanted to show that, it is supplied by the case of Earl of Lonsdale v. Crawford. But the main point is that the sale of the entirety by the trustees does not conflict with a sale of one fifth part or share by the particular tenant for life thereof. I think that this first contention is not well founded. This lady, on the assumption I am now making, is tenant for life of a share, and that share has been settled. No doubt she can sell the share under the Settled Land Act if she pleases, and so, as between herself and the purchaser, convert the beneficial interest under the will. It is perfectly competent to her to exercise that power under the Act. If, therefore, the trustees sell the entirety, they are depriving her of the power to sell her share. That immediately raises a conflict, and makes it necessary that she should be a consenting party to the sale by the trustees.

But then it is observed that the provision in section 56 applies only when there is a tenant for life, but that this lady is not a tenant for life, but only a person having the powers of a tenant for life. That she is such a person is, I think, clear from In re Pocock and Prankerd's Contract. Does the provision bear that meaning? The second branch of section 56 (2) does not say "tenant for life, or person having the powers of a tenant for life"; but the word "accordingly" does not imply that the the powers of the Act are to prevail in the case specified and in no other case. The clause is brought in by way of illustration of the cases in which the first branch of the sub-section is to apply. Then it is said that there again it is only "the tenant for life" that is mentioned. There is a little obscurity in the language there; but the object of the section was to provide against conflict, so that where there are two powers, one outside the Act, and one under it, then the Act shall be called in; the former power shall not be exercised without the consent of the person having the latter.

Then there is a further argument that under section 6 (2) of the Act of 1884 only the consent of one of the tenants for life is necessary, and that the consent of one being obtained, that of the others is not required. It is said that the different tenants for life are tenants in common, and therefore they together constitute the tenant for life, and the consent of one of them only is necessary. It seems to me that the lady whose consent has been obtained is not one of several persons who together constitute a tenant for life, but is simply tenant for life of an undivided fifth. She is not tenant for life of the entirety, nor is she one of several persons who are together tenant for life of the entirety. There is no person who is tenant in common with her of the undivided fifth. And the same is true of any other person in a similar position with respect to any other undivided share. Accordingly, I think I ought to make an order declaring that the power of sale given by the will is not exerciseable without the consents of the persons beneficially interested under the will who are tenants for life, or entitled to exercise the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts.

Will—Satisfaction—Bequest of legacies to several persons of sums equal to debts secured by promissory notes—Time for payment of legacies.

Pecuniary legacies which by the express terms of the will were not payable until a period of four years after testator's decease are not a satisfaction for debts of equal amount secured to the legatees by a negotiable instrument made by the testator.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Summons.

This was a summons in an action commenced in 1898 by originating summons for the administration of testator's estate and the payment of certain sums due for the costs of a probate action in connection therewith.

The whole of testator's personal estate having been exhausted in the payment of his debts, his real estate was directed to be sold and paid into court.

The present application was by Humphrey Pritchard on behalf of himself and others for payment of certain legacies mentioned in testator's will.

The question was as to whether the doctrine of satisfaction applied to the legacies.

The facts of the case were as follow:

The will of the testator so far as it is material was as follows: "This is the last will and testament of me, Richard Roberts, Cefnpontref Aberwch, Carnarvonshire. I give all my property to Elizabeth Pritchard, who is at present in service here, and I appoint her executrix. And I direct that she is to pay the following sums—to Humphrey Pritchard, Ponfras, £50, to Hugh Pritchard, brother of Elizabeth Pritchard, £200; to Robert Pritchard, her brother, £100; to Humphrey Pritchard, her brother, £80" (the applicant); "and I direct that Elizabeth Pritchard is to have four years after my death to pay the above money, and that she is after that, to pay £40 a year from the land to Mary, the daughter of my son Robert."

The testator was indebted to the above-named pecuniary legatees on the joint and several promissory note of himself and his son in sums equalling in amount the legacies bequeathed to them under his will, in respect of advances made by them to his son.

With the exception of two sums of £50, all the liabilities had been discharged by the testator before his death.

Brydges, for Humphrey Pritchard.—This is not a case in which the doctrine of satisfaction applies. The rule has no application when the debt is of greater value than the legacy. Here there is a debt on a negotiable instrument, on which interest will run immediately; but in the case of the legacies under this will interest will not run until four years after testator's death.

Matthews v. Mathews, 2 Ves. sen. 635; In re Fletcher, 36 W. R. 841, 38 Ch. D. 373; Atkinson v. Littlewood, L. R. 18 Eq. 595; Nicolls v. Judson, 2 Atk. 300; In re Horlock, 43 W. R. 410, [1895] 1 Ch. 516.

W. Ll. Williams, for the executrix.

Corrie, for the plaintiff in the action.—The doctrine of satisfaction applies here, as in this case there are a number of different sums bequeathed to different persons which exactly correspond in value to the debts due to the same persons by the testator.

Farrer v. Park, 3 Ch. D. 309, 29 W. R. Dig. 323; and Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), p. 673, were also referred to.

Brydges replied.

BYRNE, J., after stating the terms of the will and the facts of the case: The fact is that the precise sums which the testator in his will bequeathed to the legatees were the sums in which he was indebted to them. The legacy to Humphrey Pritchard is a legacy of the sum of £80, the amount of his debt. Is this sufficient to establish satisfaction? I do not think that it is. Construing the will it appears, firstly, that these legacies could not be sued for until four years after the death of the testator, while the debts could be sued for at once; there is therefore here a difference of time between the payment of the debt and the legacy, and this will negative satisfaction. Secondly, it appears that the debts were secured by negotiable instruments, and the authorities show that where this is the case the doctrine of satisfaction does not apply. Thirdly, it appears that the legacy is not for the same sum as the debt. No interest is given on the legacy for four years, but interest is payable on negotiable instruments. I have not gone at length into all the authorities. They have been lately carefully examined by Stirling, L.J., in In re Horlock. There will be judgment for the defendant H. Parry for payment of the legacy of £80 subject to legacy duty and liberty to the other persons to whom legacies were given in the will to apply in chambers for the payment of such legacies.

FINCHLEY ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. (LIMITED) v. FINCHLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Street—Fee simple of road—Vesting in local authority—Electric light company—Overhead wires—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 149—General Turnpike Act, 1822 (3 Geo. 4, c. 126), s. 84.

A strip of land was acquired in 1828 in fee simple by trustees under the General Turnpike Act, 1822, for the purpose of making a public road. In 1872 the turnpikes were removed from the road, and from 1878 onwards the Finchley Local Board and its successors, the Finchley Urban District Council, maintained the said road. In 1901 an electric light company carried their wires across the road, and the urban district council caused these wires to be cut. The electric light company now brought an action for an injunction to restrain the district council from interfering with their wires.

Held, that the legal estate in the road lay in the real representative of the surviving trustee of the original conveyance in 1828, who held for the local authority, and that the land in fee simple had been in this case acquired and still was required for the purposes of the street, and consequently the action was dismissed.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the Finchley Urban District Council, from breaking, cutting, severing, or otherwise interfering with the electric cables of the plaintiffs over or across the Regent's Park-road, Finchley, or from hindering and obstructing the plaintiffs in the erection of electric lines over or across roads or streets within the urban district of Finchley.

The plaintiffs were a limited company incorporated in August, 1900, having offices at 17, South-street, Finsbury, and having as one of the objects of its formation the supply at Finchley and elsewhere of electricity for lighting and other purposes. Since the incorporation of the company the plaintiffs had begun to develop their business in the district of Finchley.

The Urban District Council of Finchley, who were the defendants in the action, had obtained in 1899 a provisional order from the Board of Trade empowering them to undertake the necessary works for supplying electricity to the inhabitants of their district.

On the 19th of April, 1901, a compromise was effected in an action started by the defendants, and an order was taken by consent whereby the present plaintiffs undertook that they would not without the council's licence open or break up any road vested in the council until fourteen days after application had been made to the council for liberty to open the road in question.

On the 28th of September, 1901, the plaintiffs carried their wires across the Regent's Park-road at a height of more than thirty feet above the ground.

On the 1st of October the defendants caused the wires to be cut, and in consequence the present action was brought.

It appeared that the Regent's Park-road was constructed by certain turnpike trustees under the provisions of a special Act of Parliament (7 Geo. 4, c. xc.). The site of one side of the road where the plaintiffs wires crossed formed part of land acquired by the turnpike trustees under an indenture dated the 7th of November, 1828. The said site was duly conveyed to and vested in the turnpike trustees, their heirs and successors, in fee simple free from any reservations in favour of the owners of the adjoining lands or other reservations.

In 1872 the turnpikes were removed from the Regent's Park-road, and from 1878 (on the constitution of the Finchley Local Board) and onwards the road was maintained by the defendants.

Jenkins, K.C., and Buckmaster, for the plaintiffs.—The fee simple of the road is not vested in the defendants; it is either in the present real representative of the last surviving trustee or in the county council under section 64 of the Local Government Act, 1888, or in the adjoining owners, or it has reverted to the grantor. The word "street" in the Public Health Act, 1875, is a certain physical thing which is arrived at without reference at all to the fact in whom the real estate in which the street is situated may be vested. The ownership of the fee simple usque ad coelum has nothing to do with the "street" defined in the Act: Coverdale v. Charlton, 27 W. R. 257, 4 Q. B. D. 104; The Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird, [1896] A. C. 434, 45 W. R. Dig. 92; Rolls v. Vestry of St. George, 28 W. R. 867, 14 Ch. D. 785; Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co., 32 W. R. 776, 13 Q. B. D. 904; Reg. v. Thomas, 5 W. R. 321, 7 E. & B. 399.

Upjohn, K.C., and Chubb, for defendants.

FARWELL, J.—This case raises the old question as to the meaning of the words "vest" and "street" in the Public Health Act, 1875. The true view is that what passed to the defendants was "so much of the land in question as is required for the purposes of the road, considering the nature of the particular purposes in a given case." In The Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird Lord Halsbury said, [1896] A. C., at p. 437, "It is intelligible enough that Parliament should have vested the street qua street, and, indeed, so much of the actual soil of the street as might be necessary for the purpose of preserving and maintaining and using it as a street." [His lordship then read other extracts from the judgments of Lords Halsbury and Herschell in the above case, and from the judgment of James, L.J., in Rolls v. Vestry of St. George, and proceeded:] Now, the circumstances in the present case are unlike those which have been considered in any of the reported cases. The street had been constructed under the provisions of a private Act of George IV. The piece of land in question was purchased by the turnpike trustees for the purposes of the Act, and it was conveyed to them in fee simple, the conveyance being taken under the powers of section 84 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126. The trustees being empowered by that Act to purchase land in fee simple—usque ad coelum and usque ad inferos—the fee simple was vested in them by virtue of the conveyance. Now it was argued that as the result of the Acts of Parliament under which the street became a main road, and became vested in the urban authority of the district, the court should hold that though the fee simple is required for the purposes of the road, there is now vested in the defendants not the whole of the land so acquired, but only so much as, according to the decisions in other cases, is necessary for the purposes of the road. It appears to me that I am bound to say that this land was required and acquired for the purposes of a road. The legal estate in it was conveyed out and out to trustees, and it now lies in the real representative of the last surviving trustee, who holds for the local authority. The local authority is the only possible cestui que trust. Why should it vest in the adjoining owners? There is no resulting use in the conveyance. The other suggestion was that the land vested in the county council by virtue of section 64 of the Local Government Act, 1888, but in view of section 11 of the same Act this is an extravagant contention. I desire to point out that the reasoning on which former cases have been decided is inapplicable to the present case, because the land here was acquired for the purpose of making a road, and the doctrine that a public authority should not be presumed to acquire, without compensation, greater rights than is necessary for their immediate purpose is not applicable to the present case. The defendants hold the land for the purposes of a street. The plaintiff had no right to take his wires across the atmosphere above the road and consequently the action is dismissed.

In re ANDREW'S ESTATE.
CREASEY v. GRAVES. (a.)

Will—Construction—"My personal estates, &c., &c."—Devise of real estate.

A testator, after giving and bequeathing his real estates and all his personal estate and effects to his wife for her life, after her death gave to certain relatives "an equal share of my personal estates, &c., &c."

Held, that the gift after the death of the wife included the real estate of the testator.

Originating summons.

The question raised on this summons was whether, in a will, the words "my personal estates, &c., &c.," included the real estate of the testator.

The will, which was dated the 13th of July, 1859, was as follows: "This is the last will and testament of me, Thomas Andrew, of Partney, in the county of Lincoln, farmer and jobber; I give and bequeath all my real estates consisting of" [describing them], "also I give and bequeath all my personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever (subject to the payment of my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, with nineteen guineas to William Sherwood Mawer, John Mawer, Maria Mawer) unto my dear wife, Eliza Andrew, for and during her natural life, and from and after her (sic) decease of my said wife I give to my brother Joseph Andrew, sister Mary Graves, sister Ellen Briggs, also all my nephews and nieces, an equal share of my personal estates, &c., &c. And I revoke all former wills by me at any time heretofore made and declare this to be my last will and testament, and I appoint my said wife, Eliza Andrew, executrix of this my will."

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died in October, 1861, possessed of personal property, and also of some freehold cottage property which his widow took possession of as tenant for life. She died in November, 1901.

This summons was taken out by one of eight co-heiresses of the testator against two nephews and a niece of the testator, and against his legal personal representative, for a determination of the question whether the real estate as well as the personal estate of the testator was included in the gift after the death of his wife.

G. Brodie Cooper, for the co-heiresses.—"Etcetera" must be construed ejusdem generis with "personal estates," and does not include real estate; Newman v. Newman, 7 W. R. 6, 26 Beav. 220. The heir can only be disinherited by clear devise of the real property. Here there is none. The cases of Chapman v. Chapman, 4 Ch. D. 800, 25 W. R. Dig. 314, and Mullaly v. Walsh, Ir. R. 6 C. L. 314, where the word "etcetera" occurred, are distinguishable. In the former the testator directed his real property to be sold by his executrix, to whom the bequest in question was made, while in the latter the bequest was of "the remaining part of my whole property."

Peterson, for the respondents, was not called upon.

BUCKLEY, J. (after reading the will).—I hold that the persons claiming under the gift upon the death of the testator's wife are entitled to the real estate of the testator.

EASTON v. ISTED. (a.)

Light—Ancient lights—Consent or agreement—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4), s. 3.

In 1873 E., the owner and occupier of an hotel, erected on the northern side of his premises a conservatory adjoining the defendant's property, and entered into an agreement, dated the 13*th of July*, 1873, with the defendant's predecessor in title, whereby E. agreed to pay 1*s. a year to defendant's predecessor for allowing "the window" of his conservatory to overlook and open on to the defendant's property. The sloping top of the conservatory was of glazed glass, as also was the whole of the vertical side adjoining the defendant's property above a few feet from the ground. Portions of the glazed side of the conservatory were movable, so that, when opened, they overhung the defendant's property. The yearly rent was duly paid until* 1888, when the conservatory was converted into a passage or corridor of the hotel, the sloping top of the conservatory being retained in its former position and by means of its glazed glass giving light to the hotel corridor, and forming the roof to the corridor. The defendant erected certain buildings which obstructed the access of light to the hotel corridor through the glazed roof; and the plaintiff, E.'s successor, brought an action for an injunction and damages.

Held, that the agreement of the 13*th of July*, 1873, referred to the sloping roof of the conservatory as well as the vertical side.

Held, also, that E. and his successor, the plaintiff, enjoyed the light only by virtue of the said agreement, which was a consent or agreement within the meaning of section 3 of the Prescription Act, and therefore that the plaintiff's action failed.

Action.

The plaintiff, who was the owner and occupier of certain premises known as the Golden Fleece Hotel, Commercial-road, Portsmouth, brought this action against the defendant, who was the owner and occupier of the adjacent premises in the said road, in respect of the obstruction by the defendant of the access of light over a yard at the back of his premises to a window or skylight over a passage or corridor on the north side of the plaintiff's hotel.

The plaintiff alleged in his statement of claim that the skylight was an ancient light, and that free and unobstructed access thereto of light had been enjoyed as of right for twenty years and upwards prior to the commencement of the action without interruption.

The defendant did not admit that the said skylight was an ancient light, or that free and unobstructed access thereto of light had been enjoyed as of right for twenty years without interruption before action brought; and he denied that the buildings recently erected by him (in respect of which this action was brought), seriously obstructed the access of light to the plaintiff's skylight.

The defendant's buildings, of which the plaintiff complained, consisted of a wall recently erected along or close to the boundary line of the plaintiff's and defendant's properties, which obstructed the access of light over the defendant's property to the plaintiff's window or skylight.

The window or skylight in question was inclined at an angle of somewhat less than forty-five degrees to the plane of the horizon, and at somewhat more than forty-five degrees to the vertical plane, and its northern or lower side was practically on the boundary line between the plaintiff's and defendant's properties.

It appears that this window or skylight originally formed the sloping top of a conservatory erected by the plaintiff's predecessor in title in the year 1873 on the northern side of the hotel, and abutting on to the defendant's property. This top was entirely glazed, as also was the vertical side of the conservatory adjoining the defendant's property to within a few feet of the ground. Portions of the glazed side of the conservatory, amounting to less than one-half thereof, were movable and opened out in such a way as to overhang the defendant's property.

It further appeared that an agreement in writing was entered into in the year 1873, at the time when the conservatory was built, between the predecessors in title of the plaintiff and defendant, but which was only signed by the plaintiff's predecessor in title

The agreement, which was dated the 13th of June, 1873, was as follows: "I hereby agree to pay Mr. Isted, of No. 43, Commercial-road, Landport, the sum of one shilling a year as an acknowledgment for allowing the window in my conservatory adjoining to open on to and overlook his property, and do also agree to close the same when required to do so." The yearly payments of one shilling were duly paid under this agreement until the year 1888, when the conservatory was pulled down, and the space converted into a passage or corridor in the hotel by building a brick wall where the glazed side of the conservatory formerly stood, to the height of the skylight, and retaining the skylight, with its glazed glass in its original position.

The plaintiff alleged that the buildings which the defendant had recently erected at the rear of his premises were of such a height as to obstruct the access of light to the glazed roof of the passage or corridor in the hotel, and he brought this action claiming an injunction and damages.

Hughes, K.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the plaintiff.—The agreement of the 13th of June, 1873, only referred to the windows in the vertical side of the conservatory, which, when opened, overhung the defendant's property, and it did not refer to the skylight or glazed roof at all. There was no mention of the skylight in the agreement. The ordinary and natural meaning of "window" does not include "a glazed roof." The court will grant a mandatory injunction against interference with light, even although the plaintiff allow some time to elapse before asserting his right, in cases where the buildings are of such a nature as to be easily altered: Baxter v. Bower, 23 W. R. 334, 805, 44 L. J. Ch. 625.

Kenyon Parker, for the defendant.—The agreement of the 13th of June, 1873, is conclusive, and includes the skylight or glazed roof. The right to light in respect of the skylight or glazed roof has been enjoyed merely by consent or agreement within section 3 of the Prescription Act: Bewley v. Atkinson, 28 W. R. 638, 13 Ch. D. 283.

JOYCE, J., after stating the facts: The plaintiff's window or skylight having been in existence ever since 1873 must be what is called an ancient light, unless the right to the access of light thereto has been enjoyed "by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing," as provided by section 3 of the Prescription Act. It appears, however, that with respect to the construction of the conservatory an agreement evidenced by writing was entered into in 1873 by the then owners of the respective properties. [His lordship then read the agreement, and continued:] It was not contended, nor, in my opinion, could it have been contended with success, that this agreement was limited to the movable sashes in the northern or verticle side of the conservatory. It certainly extended and applied to the whole of the glazed portion of that side. But it is obvious that the object of the arrangement was to preclude the acquisition by the owners of the plaintiff's property of a statutory right to light over the defendant's property. It is suggested, however, that although, while the arrangement continued and the annual payment of one shilling was duly made—as it was until the year 1888—no right was being acquired in respect of the glazed portion of the sloping top, notwithstanding the existence of the arrangement and the continuance of the payment.

In my opinion it is impossible that this was intended by the parties to the arrangement, and I think that the agreement will very well bear the construction that will effectuate what must, I think, have been their intention. The sloping top receives rays of light across, and in that sense overlooks, the defendant's property in the same manner as, though to a less degree than, the fixed portions of the side; and it is in respect of the obstruction by the defendant of these very rays of light that the action is brought. If the written agreement applied, as it did, to the fixed and glazed portions of the side, it equally, in my opinion, applied to the glazed portion of the sloping top. A window is not less a window because it is not capable of being opened, nor because it is not fixed in a vertical plane. The glazed top is just as much a window as the fixed portion of the vertical side, and inasmuch as it receives light over the defendant's property, it overlooks that property in the sense in which that term was used in the agreement.

KELCEY v. HARRISON. (a.)

Administration — Power of appointment — Appointed fund—Valid receipt—Administrator with will annexed.

Where a married woman having a general power of appointment over a fund of personalty makes an appointment of the fund by will and appoints executors, and the said executors die without having proved the will,

Held, that the administratrix with the will annexed of the testatrix could give a valid receipt and discharge for all the settled funds.

This was an originating summons by the administratrix with the will annexed of Lucy Jemima Peacock, deceased, asking to have the question determined whether she could give to the defendant, who was the trustee of a marriage settlement dated the 20th of January, 1875, a valid receipt and discharge for the moneys comprised in the settlement which had become divisible.

The settlement was made upon the marriage of Lucy Jemima Ogilvie, spinster, with Henry Peacock, and thereby certain funds and securities were settled for the husband and wife for their lives and the life of the survivor, and after the death of the survivor if (as happened) there should be no issue of the marriage, upon trust for such persons as Lucy Jemima should during coverture by will or codicil, and when not under coverture by deed, will, or codicil, appoint.

The marriage took place on the 21st of January, 1875.

Lucy Peacock died on the 14th of September, 1882, and Henry Peacock on the 6th of April, 1900.

By her will dated the 30th of September, 1880, Mrs. Peacock, after referring to the settlement and her general power of appointment thereunder, appointed and directed that the settled funds should be paid or transferred to her sister Eliza Jane Ogilvie and her brother Charles Frederick Ogilvie, upon trust to pay £200 to her niece Mrs. Ashe, and to divide the residue among certain named persons, and she appointed her said sister and brother executrix and executor of her will.

By a codicil, dated the 5th of October, 1881, the testatrix made a different disposition with regard to certain policy moneys, part of the settled property, and in all other respects she confirmed her will. The said Eliza Jane Ogilvie and Charles Frederick Ogilvie respectively died without having proved the will of the testatrix, and on the 31st of May, 1901, letters of administration to the estate of Mrs. Peacock with the will and codicil annexed were granted to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then applied to the defendant, the trustee of the fund, to pay and transfer to her the funds subject to the settlement, in order that she might carry out the testamentary directions of the testatrix, but the defendant objected to do so, alleging that the plaintiff could not give him a valid discharge.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—It was settled by the cases of In re Philbrick's Trusts and In re Hoskin's Trusts, that where a married woman or any other person having a general power of appointment over a fund of personalty makes an appointment of the fund by will and appoints an executor, such executor after he has proved the will is entitled to receive and give a valid discharge for the appointed fund. Counsel for the defendant did not dispute the authority of those cases, but contended that they only established the proposition that an executor was so entitled and that an administrator with the will annexed stood in a different position. It was conceded that there was no authority which showed that such an administrator stood in any different position, and I am not aware of any principle which requires any distinction to be made. If the donee of a power does not exercise it she leaves the funds to go as in default of appointment and to be administered by the trustees of the instrument, and the like result will follow if she exercises the power by deed and appoints only to beneficiaries; if, however, she exercises the power by deed, and wishes other trustees to administer the fund, she has only to appoint the fund to those trustees to be held by them upon the trusts then declared. If the donee exercises the power by will, and still wishes the original trustees to administer the fund, she can appoint them her executors, or, if she so desires, she may appoint different persons to be her executors, and those persons will then distribute the appointed funds. If, however, she appoints by will, and does not appoint any executors, or if executors appointed by her die or disclaim, I am of opinion that she commits the distribution of the fund to the person to whom the Probate Court shall grant letters of administration with the will annexed. It has been the practice of the Probate Court for many years to grant administration with the will annexed in the case of the will of a married woman, made by virtue of a power, where no executor is named: see rule 15 of the Rules and Orders for the Principal Registry in Non-Contentious Business, 1862. If the contention put forward by defendant were correct, such an administrator would have no duties whatever to perform. Moreover, a rule that an executor should be the person to administer, but not an administrator, might give rise to considerable difficulties, thus an executor might prove the will and receive the trust fund and die intestate before administering. Who, then, is to complete the administration and division? If an administrator de bonis non cannot do so, is it to be held that the funds must in such a case be repaid to the original trustees? Again, it has long been settled that by exercising a general power of appointment by will a testator subjects the appointed property to the payment of all his debts, if and so far as his own property may be insufficient for that purpose; the appointed fund becoming equitable assets. Practical convenience requires that the person to administer these assets shall be the person whose duty it is as executor or administrator to ascertain and provide for the debts in due course of administration. Again, it is settled law that where a testator with a general power of appointment gives legacies and appoints an executor, he must be taken as exercising his general power to the extent to which the fund subject to it, is required to make the legacies effective, and the same rule would apply though no executor were appointed: In re Davies' Trusts, 20 W. R. 165, L. R. 13 Eq. 163. Now the executor or administrator, as the case may be, is the person to pay these legacies, and the only person who can ascertain in the event of the testator's own estate being insufficient, how much of the appointed funds will be required to make up the deficiency so as to render the legacies effective. Upon these grounds I decide that the plaintiff in the present case can give a valid receipt and discharge for all the settled funds.

MILLAR v. LAW ACCIDENT INSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Policy on cattle—"Restraint of people"—Inability to land cattle at foreign port owing to order prohibiting landing—"Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention."

Under a Lloyd's policy cattle were insured for a voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres against "arrests, restraints, and detainments of princes and people." The policy also contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention." Prior to the shipment the Argentine Government passed a decree prohibiting the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases. On arrival at Buenos Ayres the authorities refused to allow the cattle to be landed, as they were found to be suffering from a contagious disease. The cattle, being transhipped, were subsequently sold at a considerable loss.

Held, in an action on the policy, that such a loss was not a loss within the policy, and that the mere operation of a municipal law affecting or preventing the delivery of the insured goods at their destination was no "restraint of people" within the meaning of the policy; that the words did not cover the operation of the ordinary law of the land, but related only to some violent departure from the ordinary course of things.

Held, also, that "warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention" freed the underwriters from liabilities under the words arrests, restraints, and detainments in the body of the policy.

Action tried in the commercial list without a jury.

This was an action brought on a policy of insurance on live stock dated the 24th of August, 1900, to recover as for a total or a partial loss.

The live stock were on board the steamship Bellevue; and the policy contained the following clause:

Amongst the risks insured against were: "Arrests, restraints, and detainments of princes and people . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods . . . or any part thereof."

The policy also contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention."

Cur. adv. vult.

BIGHAM, J., delivered the following judgment: This action is brought to recover the amount of a total or partial loss of cattle under a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance granted by the defendants to the plaintiffs. The risks insured against are described in the usual way, and include "arrests, restraints, and detainments of princes and people . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods . . . or any part thereof." It is under these words that the claim is made, and the question for me to determine is whether the facts of the case bring the loss within the meaning of the words. The story is short. The plaintiffs shipped a number of bulls by the steamer Bellevue, to be carried from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres; and having made the shipment they effected the policy sued on. Many months before the shipment was made the Argentine Government had passed a decree forbidding the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases, or coming from countries where such diseases prevail. The decree contained articles describing the diseases and providing how animals suspected of being affected were to be dealt with. The Bellevue arrived at Buenos Ayres on the 10th of September, 1900, and the cattle were duly inspected on board the vessel by the Argentine officials, with the result that the Ministry of Agriculture came to the conclusion that they were suffering from disease within the meaning of the decree, and ordered the vessel to leave the port. The order contained a provision that the captain, if he so wished, might tranship the cattle to another vessel outside the limits of the port for carriage to some other destination. On the next day, the 11th of September, the ministry issued a general order forbidding the discharge of any cattle arriving from the United Kingdom until further notice. I find as a fact that the animals were suffering from disease within the meaning of the decree, and that the order forbidding the landing was lawfully made by the Argentine authorities. In obedience to the order The Bellevue left the dock in Buenos Ayres, and on the 14th of September the cattle were transhipped into lighters at a place called Santiago, which is outside the limits of the port. On this day notice of abandonment was given. The cattle remained in the lighters for some days, when a ship called The Sallust was found to take them on to Monte Video, at which place, after being forty days in quarantine, they were landed and sold, and of course at a considerable loss. It is in these circumstances that the plaintiffs claim for a total or partial loss, alleging (to follow the words of the pleader) that the prohibition of the landing constituted a "restraint of people" within the meaning of the policy.

The right to recover depends upon whether the loss is directly due to a "restraint of people." I am of opinion that it is not. It is not necessary for me to give an exhaustive definition of the expression "restraint of people," and I shall not attempt to do so. It is sufficient to say that the mere operation of an ordinary municipal law affecting or preventing the delivery of the insured goods at their destination is no "restraint of people" within the meaning of the policy. As in the case of perils of the sea, there must be something violent and out of the ordinary course of things before the peril is brought within the meaning of the policy. The maker of a bill of lading protects himself by an exception of the acts and restraints of princes. Such an exception was held in Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co., not to cover the case of a judgment in a court of law of the United States of America directing the goods to be delivered to third parties who had claimed them. The "acts and restraints of princes," said Baron Martin in that case, mentioned and provided against in the bill of lading, have reference to the forcible interference of a state or of the government of a country taking possession of the goods manu forti, and do not extend to the legal proceedings which take place in the courts of the country. So in the present case the words do not, in my opinion, cover the operation of the ordinary law of the land, but relate only to some violent departure from the ordinary course of things. The plaintiffs relied upon the authority of Rodocanachi v. Elliott. There goods were in transit from Marseilles to London. They had to pass through Paris, and no their way they came within the lines of the German army by which Paris was then completely invested. In consequence of this state of things the goods could not be moved. This was held to constitute a restraint of princes. Baron Bramwell, in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, says (at p. 522): "But it is said that there has been no loss of the goods by restraint of kings and princes in this case, because there has been no specific action on the goods themselves. It is true that there has been no actual seizure or arrest of the goods, nor was there any specific or published order prohibiting the transport of the goods from the besieged city; but the city in which the goods were was besieged and completely invested, all commerce was stopped, and the goods were as effectually prevented from coming out as if they were actually seized by the German army." This shows that the court was of opinion that the goods were, for all effective purposes, seized by the German army and taken out of the control and disposition of the owners; it was by the forcible and therefore by the violent act of the German army that the goods were prevented from reaching their destination. No other view of the facts in that case could have been taken, and having regard to that view, no other conclusion could be arrived at than that the plaintiffs had lost their goods by a "restraint of princes." But in the present case no force of any kind was used; the captain was required to obey the ordinary law existing in the country at the time when the goods arrived; and he obeyed it. To call the resulting consequences a loss by restraint of peoples or princes is, in my opinion, to give to the expression a meaning which it was never intended to bear.

A further point arose in the case, on which I also think I ought to give judgment for the defendants, although, having regard to my decision on the first point, it is not really necessary to consider it. The policy contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention." It was said that this exception ought not to be interpreted to include "restraint." I think, however, that the very object of this exception is to free the underwriters from liability under the words arrests, restraints, and detainments in the body of the policy. It is true that the same words are not used, but the exception must be taken to refer to something which has gone before; and to what if not to the words I have mentioned? An attempt was made to bring the loss within the general words "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that shall come to the damage of the goods," but as to this it is sufficient to say that these words only cover losses of a kind similar to those particularly enumerated in the previous part of the policy, and do not include a loss of an exceptional kind like that which has happened in this case.

REX v. ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.
In re GORE.
Ex parte COBHAM AND GARBETT (No. 2). (a.)

Practice—Costs—Crown—Prerogative writ of mandamus —No jurisdiction to give costs to Crown.

Rules nisi were granted at the instance of certain prosecutors calling on the Archbishop of Canterbury and his vicar-general to show cause why a prerogative writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to hear opponents of the confirmation of a bishop-elect. Notice of the rules was directed to be served on the dean and chapter. There was no similar direction to serve the Treasury on behalf of the Crown, but the application affected the rights of the Crown. Cause was shown by the law officers appearing on behalf of the Crown without any objection being raised, and by counsel on behalf of the archbishop and the vicar-general. The rules were discharged, costs being allowed to the archbishop and the vicar-general. Subsequently the case came before the court again on the question whether the court had jurisdiction to order the prosecutors to pay costs to the Crown.

Held, that the court has no jurisdiction to order such costs, and that the ancient doctrine that in matters at common law the Crown neither pays nor receives costs had not been altered either by 1 Will. 4, c. 21, s. 6, or the Rules of the Supreme Court.

In this case, reported ante at p. 348, rules nisi were granted, at the instance of the prosecutors Cobham and Garbett, calling on the Archbishop of Canterbury and his vicar-general to show cause why a prerogative writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to hear opponents of the confirmation of Canon Gore as bishop-elect of the diocese of Worcester.

Notice of the rules was directed to be served on the dean and chapter.

There was no similar direction to serve the Treasury on behalf of the Crown, but the application affected the rights of the Crown.

Cause was shown by the law officers appearing on behalf of the Crown without any objection being raised, and by counsel on behalf of the archbishop and the vicar-general, and after argument the rules were discharged, costs being allowed to the archbishop.

The question now raised was whether the court had jurisdiction to order the prosecutors to pay costs to the Crown.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Morton Smith with him), for Garbett.—In this case two questions arise. Firstly, as to the costs of the Crown, which was not a party to the original rules, and only came in to show cause. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—That makes no difference, for I think that these rules ought to have been served on the Crown.] Secondly, as to the costs of the archbishop and of the vicar-general. Their right to the costs they had personally incurred is not disputed, but such costs were very little, if any, as the Crown took up their case, and instructed counsel to appear for them, and their costs stood on the same footing as the costs of the Crown. The inflexible rule of the common law, apart from any Act of Parliament, is that the Crown neither pays nor receives costs: Kerr's Blackstone's Commentaries (4th ed.), vol. 3, p. 402; Chitty on Prerogatives of the Crown, p. 310; West on the Law of Extents, c. 22, p. 227; Manning's Exchequer Practice, p. 69; Burton's Exchequer Practice, vol. 1, p. 248. Modern practice has not altered this rule: Rex v. Corum, 1 Anstr. 50; The Lord Advocate of Scotland v. Lord Dunglas, 9 Cl. & Fin. 173; Smith v. Earl of Stair and Others, 2 H. L. Cas. 807; The Lord Advocate for Scotland v. Hamilton, 1 Macq. 46; Kane v. Reynolds, 3 W. R. 85, 4 De G. M. & G. 565, at p. 571; The Queen v. Burial Board of Bishop Wearmouth, 5 Q. B. D. 67, at p. 72, 28 W. R. Dig. 31 (in which case the order as to costs was subsequently reversed); Mews v. The Queen, 31 W. R. 385, 8 App. Cas. 339, at p. 353; The Queen v. Justices of Middlesex, 33 W. R. Dig. 49, 9 App. Cas. 757, at p. 786; 9 Anne, c. 20, is the only statute which ever gave the court power to give costs in proceedings upon writs of mandamus, see section 5; but that statute only deals with costs where a rule is made absolute. The costs were payable by common law as a punishment for erroneously putting the jurisdiction of the court in motion: see vol. 6 Viner's Abridgment, p. 322. The Judicature Acts and the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 65, r. 1, do not enable the court or a judge to order costs to be paid by persons who before the Acts came into operation could not have been ordered to pay them; they only regulate the mode in which costs are to be dealt with in cases where the court antecedently had jurisdiction, either original or statutory, to award costs: In re Mills's Estate, 35 W. R. 65, 34 Ch. D. 24; Pringle v. Secretary of State for India, 40 Ch. D. 288. A person who is not called upon to show cause is not entitled to costs.

Bramwell Davis, K.C. (B. Whitehead with him), for Cobham, did not argue.

Sutton, for the Crown.—The Crown is entitled to costs. In Moore v. Smith, 7 W. R. 206, 1 E. & E. 597, which is a decision under section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), it was held that the court, on confirming a conviction on an information laid on behalf of the Crown, had jurisdiction under section 6 to award costs to the Crown. Under 1 Will. 4, c. 21, s. 6, costs have been given both in favour of and against the Crown. The words of that section are quite wide enough to include proceedings by or against the Crown. This section was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 59), which extended the powers in the Judicature Acts to make rules of court. The general effect of the Supreme Court Rules is to give the court a discretion as to costs in all cases. In The Queen v. Secretary for War, 40 W. R. 5, [1891] 2 Q. B. 326, the Crown obtained an order for costs.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 3.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment of the court: In this case rules nisi were granted at the instance of the prosecutors Cobham and Garbett, calling on the Archbishop of Canterbury and his vicar-general to show cause why a prerogative writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to hear opponents of the confirmation of Canon Gore as Bishop-Elect of the Diocese of Worcester. Notice of the rules was directed to be served on the dean and chapter. There was no similar direction to serve the Treasury on behalf of the Crown, but the application affected the rights of the Crown, and, in our opinion, the Attorney-General had a clear right to oppose the motion. Cause was shown before us by the law officers appearing on behalf of the Crown without objection raised, and by counsel on behalf of the archbishop and vicar-general, and after argument the rules were discharged, costs being allowed to the archbishop.

The only question remaining to be considered is whether we have jurisdiction to order the prosecutors to pay costs to the Crown. We have not been referred to any case, nor have we been able to discover any, in which the ancient doctrine that in matters at common law the Crown "never paid nor received costs," as it is laid down by Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Beadle, 5 W. R. 498, 7 El. & Bl. 492, and in Rex v. Miles, 7 Term Rep. 367, Lord Advocate v. Lord Dunglas, 9 Cl. & Fin. 173, and Smith v. Earl of Stair, 2 H. L. Cas., at p. 809, has been expressly questioned in regard to the prerogative writ of mandamus. There certainly have been some instances in which the doctrine has been disregarded, whether from inadvertence or otherwise we do not know; but in the only reported cases in which it has been considered, the doctrine has been admitted at the bar, whether in favour of or against the Crown; and we think it clear that neither the Act 1 Will. 4, c. 21, s. 6, nor the existing Rules of the Supreme Court have altered the law as affecting the present case. We must not be understood as expressing any opinion either in relation to matters other than the prerogative writ of mandamus, or even as to that writ when it is applied for by or against the officers of executive departments of the public service in relation to their statutory or other duties. On the one hand, the fact that statutes have been passed providing for payment of costs to the Crown in relation to Crown specialties (33 Hen. 8, c. 39), and by or to the Crown upon petitions of right (23 & 24 Vict. c. 34), or upon revenue suits (18 & 19 Vict. c. 90 and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21), proceedings in relation to customs (40 & 41 Vict. c. 13, s. 5), and upon proceedings by the Commissioners of the Admiralty (27 & 28 Vict. c. 57, s. 11; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 124, s. 2; and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 78, s. 5), is of some weight as an indication that express legislation was necessary in order to exclude the rule of the common law. On the other hand, as incidental to departmental administration, there must often be litigation which does not directly affect any prerogative of the Crown and as to which no good reason can be assigned for the denial of costs to the successful party. And the case of Moore v. Smith supports this view. The question does not arise in this case, but the question may be worthy of consideration whether the Act of 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 59, s. 6) gives power to make Rules of the Supreme Court in relation "to proceedings by or against the Crown." The words are primâ facie wide enough to include power to make provision for costs, but it may be that the decision in In re Mills's Estate shows that the terms of this section cannot be construed so widely as to enable rules to be made binding the Crown to pay costs in all cases. We agree with the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Beadle that it is very desirable that such provision should be made, and, if effectual and proper provision cannot be made by rules for enforcing payment of costs by the Crown, the matter is one very proper for the consideration of the Legislature. In the Crown Suits Act and the Petition of Right Act a special procedure is provided, but in the Customs and Admiralty Acts a simple declaration of liabilility was regarded as sufficient. In the present case, for the reasons which we have given, we cannot make any order for payment of costs to the Crown.

Held, that the reservation was valid, and that prohibition lay to the official principal to prohibit him from proceeding without the bishop's consent in a suit in which one of the parties earnestly craved the bishop's judgment.

Judgment of the Divisional Court, [1901] 2 K. B. 141, reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Darling and Channell, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a prohibition to the Chancellor of the Diocese of Chichester: [1901] 2 K. B. 141, 49 W. R. Dig. 61.

On the 18th of January, 1899, a suit was brought in the Consistory Court of Chichester for the purpose of obtaining a faculty authorizing the removal out of the Church of the Annunciation, in the town of

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Brighton, in the Diocese of Chichester, of certain ornaments which were alleged to be illegal.

The petitioner was George Davey, a parishioner of the parish of the said church.

The opponents were the Rev. Henry Fitzrichard Hinde, the vicar, and William Henry Hammond and William Henry Funhall Littlechild, the churchwardens.

The opponents, by their answer, inter alia, alleged and propounded that "before any decision or final determination of the cause aforesaid, the Right Reverend Father in God, Ernest Roland, Lord Bishop of Chichester, should be first consulted and his consent had, and they earnestly crave his judgment in the premises, and humbly complain and supplicate that the said Lord Bishop should examine and determine the said cause in his own proper person in this court."

The petitioner, by his reply, submitted that the consent of the Lord Bishop of Chichester prayed for by the answer was not necessary to the hearing and determination of the cause, and humbly supplicated that the said cause might be examined and determined by the official principal of the court.

The cause came on to be heard before Dr. Tristram, Q.C., the Chancellor of the Diocese and Official Principal of the Consistory Court of Chichester, sitting alone, the bishop not being present. The objection on the part of the opponents that the bishop ought to be consulted and that they were entitled to his judgment, was taken at the hearing and was argued.

The letters patent under which Dr. Tristram held his appointment as chancellor and official principal were dated the 30th of August, 1892, and were granted by the then Bishop of Chichester, Dr. Durnford. So far as material they were as follows:

"Richard, by divine permission, Lord Bishop of Chichester, to all the faithful in Christ to whom this present writing shall come, grace and health in the Lord Everlasting. Know ye that we, regarding the holy doctrine, life, manner, integrity, and learning, as well as knowledge in all law, and his dexterity, fidelity, and prudence in transacting business, have given, granted, and confirmed, and by this present writing do for us and our successors, give, grant, and confirm to our beloved in Christ, Thomas Hutchinson Tristram, of 12, King's Bench-walk, Temple, one of her Majesty's counsel and a doctor of civil law, during his natural life, the office or offices (hereafter and in the manner hereafter defined) of our vicar-general in spirituals and official principal of our consistory and our successors in and throughout the Archdeaconry of Lewes, also of our sequestrator and administrator-general within the archdeaconry aforesaid (which said office is now vacant by the death of our beloved in Christ, Robert Wintle Wintle, Esq., Master of Arts). And we do by these presents ordain, constitute, and make him the said Thomas Hutchinson Tristram our commissary, official principal, and vicar-general in spirituals of us and our successors in and through the whole Archdeaconry of Lewes, with power of surrogating, substituting, constituting, and making any other and others fit person or persons in his stead and place in this behalf as often as he shall happen to be hindered, and of recalling or removing them as often as need shall be (nevertheless and in either case consulting us and our successors and having first our consent and approbation). Moreover, we do for us and our successors give, grant, and confirm unto the said Thomas Hutchinson Tristram during his natural life that in our absence from our Consistory Court of Lewes he shall and may proceed by himself, his assignee or substitute, assignees or substitutes, as well in all and singular causes, businesses, suits, and complaints, spiritual and ecclesiastical, at the instance or promotion of whatsoever parties as by our mere and mixed office; also in all causes of dilapidation of the goods of the church and robbing of churches, and in all other businesses and causes whatsoever (except hereafter excepted) in our episcopal Consistory Court of Lewes moved or to be moved, the cognizance and decision whereof is known by law or custom of the realm to belong to our ecclesiastical court, and to decide and finally determine all and singular those the causes aforesaid (except hereafter excepted) with all the rights thereto incident issuing, depending, annexed, and connexed without breach of the laws and statutes of this excellent kingdom; Nevertheless first consulting us and our successors, and having our consent in case either party earnestly crave our judgment. . . . Except, notwithstanding, and always reserved to us and our successors the complaints and applications hereafter to be made by whatsoever clergy in all and singular causes, and reserved also to us and our successors equally to examine and determine every cause in our proper person in our Court of Consistory."

Dr. Tristram, after taking time to consider, held that the question of the validity of the reservation of the bishop's jurisdiction, contained in the letters patent, was for the determination of the High Court, and expressed an opinion that such reservation was invalid; and he gave judgment on the merits of the case, decreeing a penalty for the removal of certain ornaments from the church: see the report of Davey v. Hinde, [1901] P. 95, 49 W. R. Dig. 59.

The opponents then applied for and obtained a rule nisi calling on Dr. Tristram and George Davey to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit them from further proceeding in the suit.

The Divisional Court discharged the rule on the grounds, first, that, even if Dr. Tristram ought to have consulted the bishop, he had at the utmost merely adopted a wrong procedure, and, had not acted without jurisdiction; and, secondly, that, even if there had been a want of jurisdiction, it was not apparent on the face of the proceedings.

The opponents appealed.

Duke, K.C., and E. W. Hansell, for the appellants.—The chancellor acted without jurisdiction, and prohibition ought to be allowed to issue. The patent by which the Bishop of Chichester conferred jurisdiction on the chancellor to hear and determine causes contains this reservation: "Nevertheless, first consulting us and our successors, and having our consent in case either party earnestly crave for judgment." Where either party earnestly craves the judgment of the bishop, his consent is a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the chancellor to hear the cause. Either party has a right to have the cause heard and adjudicated upon by the bishop. Even if the consent of the bishop is only necessary to the judgment which the chancellor proposes to deliver, no such consent was obtained in this case. The want of jurisdiction appears plainly on the face of the proceedings—viz., in the pleadings.

They referred to Mayor of London v. Cox, 16 W. R. 44, L. R. 2 H. L. 239; Ex parte Medwin, 1 E. & B. 609; Bishop of St. David's v. Lucy, 1 Salk. 134; Serjeant v. Dale, 2 Q. B. Dibdin, K.C. (Reginald Dodd with him), for the respondents.—The Divisional Court were right in refusing to grant a prohibition. The appellants did not continuously crave the bishop's judgment. They asked for it in their pleading, but they appeared before the chancellor and argued various points, and took their chance of a judgment in their favour. Further, no want of jurisdiction is apparent on the proceedings; for it does not appear that the bishop's consent was not in fact obtained. But there is another answer to the application for a prohibition The reservation in the patent of the bishop's jurisdiction is invalid. Such a reservation was required to be inserted in a patent appointing a chancellor by Canon 11 of the Canons of 1640. But the Canons of 1640 were annulled by 13 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 5. The respective jurisdictions of the bishop and the chancellor are shown by Canon 122 of the Canons of 1603. The chancellor has sole jurisdiction in all cases except where a sentence of deprivation is to be pronounced against a clergyman. The patent in use in the diocese of Ely is the only patent which has a reservation similar to this; such a reservation must now be treated as obsolete.

He cited 4 Co. Inst., p. 338; Ayliffe's Parergon, p. 160; Godolphin's Repertorium Canonicum, p. 80; Procurator-General v. Stone, 1 Hagg. Consist. 424, at p. 433; Middleton v. Crofts, 2 Atk. 650, at p. 664; Phillimore v. Machon, 1 P. D. 481, 25 W. R. Dig. 10.

Duke, K.C., in reply.—The appellants never gave up their point that the chancellor had no jurisdiction, but continued to take that objection at every step in the proceedings. The case of Ex parte Law, 2 A. & E. 45, shows that they were right in waiting for the judgment of the chancellor before they asked for a prohibition. As to the validity of the reservation in the patent, there is nothing repugnant to good sense in it, neither has it ever been suggested until now that it was obsolete. It is true the Ely patent is the only one which has a reservation in exactly similar terms. But the patents in use in the dioceses of St. Asaph, Bangor, and Carlisle contain a reservation of jurisdiction to the bishop, though there are no words giving power to the parties to crave the judgment of the bishop. This reservation is not based on the Canons of 1640. The right of the bishop to reserve jurisdiction to himself existed long before that date: see Dr. Stubbs's Historical Appendix to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission. And this right was not taken away by section 5 of 13 Car. 2, c. 12.

He referred to several instances of jurisdiction being exercised by the bishop collected in Rothery's Returns, and cited Gibbons v. Bishop of Cloyne, Holt 599, and Boyd v. Phillpotts, L. R. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 297, at p. 316.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 10.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court discharging a rule nisi for a prohibition obtained by the appellants prohibiting the respondents from proceeding further in a certain suit instituted in the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Chichester, in which the respondent Mr. Davey was the petitioner and the Rev. Mr. Hinde and others were respondents, and of which court Dr. Tristram is the official principal.

Dr. Tristram holds his appointment as vicar-general in spirituals and official principal of the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Chichester under a patent from the bishop; and the question is whether, having regard to the terms of that patent, Dr. Tristram had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case. The patent confers jurisdiction in the following terms: "Moreover we do for us and our successors give, grant, and confirm unto the said Thomas Hutchinson Tristram during his natural life, that in our absence from our Consistory Court of Lewes he shall and may proceed by himself, his assignee or substitute, assignees or substitutes, as well in all and singular causes, businesses, suits, and complaints, spiritual and ecclesiastical, at the instance or promotion of whatsoever parties as by our mere and mixed office; also in all causes of dilapidation of the goods of the church and robbing of churches and in all other businesses and causes whatsoever (except hereafter excepted)"—the exceptions are not material in this case—"in our Episcopal Consistory Court of Lewes moved or to be moved the cognizance and decision whereof is known by law or custom of the realm to belong to our Ecclesiastical Court, and to decide and finally determine all and singular those the causes aforesaid (except hereafter excepted) with all the rights thereto incident issuing, depending, annexed, and connexed, without breach of the laws and statutes of this excellent kingdom; nevertheless, first consulting us and our successors and having our consent in case either party earnestly crave our judgment."

The respondents on the face of their answer pleaded "that before any decision or final determination of the cause aforesaid the Right Reverend Father in God Ernest Roland, by Divine permission Lord Bishop of Chichester, should be first consulted and his consent had, and they earnestly crave his judgment in the premises, and humbly complain and supplicate that the said Lord Bishop should examine and determine the said cause in his own proper person in this court." To this paragraph the petitioner in paragraph 4 of his reply "submits that the consent of the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Chichester prayed for by paragraph 5 of the respondents' answer is not necessary to the hearing and determination of this cause, and humbly supplicates that the said cause may be examined and determined by the Worshipful Thomas Hutchinson Tristram, Doctor of Laws, the official principal of this court."

The point was again raised by counsel for the respondents at the hearing before Dr. Tristram (see the report of Davey v. Hinde, [1901] P. 95, 49 W. R. Dig. 59), who, nevertheless, proceeded with the hearing of the case, and, after the determination of another preliminary point made by the respondents, delivered judgment on the 21st of August, 1900, holding that he had jurisdiction and dealing with the merits of the case. Though the fact was not and could not be averred on the face of the proceedings, it is clear from Dr. Tristram's judgment that he did not consult the bishop or obtain his consent either to his hearing the case or to the terms of his judgment. The question is whether the qualification contained in the concluding words in the grant of jurisdiction above set out deprived Dr. Tristram of the right to determine the case without first consulting the bishop and obtaining his consent, the respondents having earnestly craved the bishop's personal judgment.

The case was argued and decided in the Divisional Court only on the grounds (1) that, assuming the qualification in the patent to be valid in point of law, it went to procedure only, and not to jurisdiction; and (2) that in any view the objection was not sufficiently raised on the face of the proceedings to entitle the respondents, the now appellants, to apply for prohibition. Before us the additional point was made and argued that the qualification in the patent was itself illegal and nugatory.

First, then, with respect to the grounds on which the case was decided in the court below. Does the limitation or qualification in the grant go to the jurisdiction, or is consultation with the bishop a mere matter of procedure not affecting jurisdiction, as the court below held? On the hypothesis that the patent is valid, the chancellor takes no jurisdiction but that which it confers. He is a delegate, and is bound by the terms of the instrument of delegation. Two constructions have been put upon the limiting words; but in either view it seems to me that they go to jurisdiction, and that under the patent the grantee does not acquire jurisdiction to determine the case when either party craves the bishop's judgment, unless the bishop has been consulted and consented. It seems to me that the clause, read in its context, has the effect of shutting out from the jurisdiction of the chancellor such cases unless he has consulted and obtained the consent of the bishop to his entertaining them. I think the word "nevertheless" at the beginning of the clause, coming as it does after a general delegation of authority, points to an exclusion from the jurisdiction of a certain class of cases, unless the bishop has after consultation consented to his grantee entertaining them. Without such consent there is no grant of jurisdiction at all. But, even if the construction of the clause is that adopted in the Divisional Court by Darling, J., and, I think also, though I am not quite sure, by Channell, J., it seems to me that it also goes to jurisdiction. They treat it—the consultation and consent—as having regard to the judgment only and not to the entertaining of the case; but they did not and could not ignore the fact that the clause does require consultation with the bishop and his consent to the judgment to be given. If this is the true meaning of the clause it seems to me that the judgment given in such a case, without consultation and without the consent of the bishop, would be a judgment given without jurisdiction. It is a condition precedent to the right of the grantee to give judgment, and unless he fulfils the condition he exceeds his jurisdiction in pronouncing judgment.

It was, however, argued that the objection to jurisdiction had been waived, and that whether it had been waived or not it was not sufficiently raised on the face of the proceedings to justify the appellants in asking for a prohibition. Mr. Dibdin did not insist upon waiver in the ordinary sense, as being capable of founding jurisdiction, but he urged that in truth and in fact the now appellants had shown by their conduct of the case that they did not earnestly crave the bishop's judgment and that in that sense the objection to jurisdiction must be taken to have been waived. I can see no ground whatever for saying that the appellants ever receded from the position which they took up in their pleadings. They there formulated a demand for the bishop's personal intervention; they took the point at the trial; they never receded from it, and the learned judge obviously did not consider that they had abandoned it, for in his judgment given in August he discusses and deals with it. It is true they had, in the meantime, raised another preliminary point, as to the locus standi of the petitioner, which was decided against them, the learned judge holding over his judgment until that point was determined. But these facts seem to me to afford no evidence whatever that the appellants had ceased to desire the bishop's judgment; nor could they know, nor were they bound to anticipate, that, in his judgment so given, the learned judge would, from their point of view, exceed his jurisdiction. There is clear authority that the right to ask for prohibition, if not otherwise defective, still remains open to them. "For till sentence be given," says Lord Ellenborough in Gould v. Gapper, 5 East. 345, at p. 364, "the courts of common law have no reason to suppose that the Ecclesiastical Court will determine wrong; which, however, if it should do, it is not too late to come then, that is, after sentence, for a prohibition; for the sentence is in such case the gravamen; and so it was expressly stated to be by Holt, C.J., and the court in Shotter v. Friend, 2 Salk. 547."

As to the objection not appearing on the face of the proceedings, I think it was sufficiently apparent to take the case out of the principle on which courts act in refusing prohibition on that ground, which is really one not letting in jurisdiction, but going only to the discretion of the court in granting prohibition in cases where there was in fact no jurisdiction. The rule laid down in the memorable judgment of Willes, J., in the case of Mayor of London v. Cox, which has been frequently followed, is really limited to cases where a party has allowed a court to proceed without disclosing his objection and has afterwards come to set aside the proceedings. Its effect is well summarized by Lopes, L.J., in Farquharson v. Morgan: "The result of the authorities appears to me to be this, that the granting of a prohibition is not an absolute right in every case where an inferior tribunal exceeds its jurisdiction, and that where the absence or excess of jurisdiction is not apparent on the face of the proceedings, it is discretionary with the court to decide whether the party applying has not by laches or misconduct lost his right to the writ to which, under other circumstances, he would be entitled." There is really nothing like laches or misconduct in the present case; on the contrary, the point is sufficiently apparent on the proceedings, and it was taken in court and never withdrawn. Therefore I am of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court cannot be supported on the grounds on which they have placed it.

It is, however, necessary to consider the larger question raised by the argument of Mr. Dibdin—viz., that the limitation to the grant in the patent is itself void. This raises an historical question of some interest, but I think the burden rests on the respondents, and in my judgment they have not satisfied it. The form of the patent is, from its phraseology and the matters it embraces, obviously of very considerable antiquity. The exact form of this patent appears to be peculiar to the dioceses of Chichester and Ely; but forms reserving the bishop's jurisdiction in some shape, in cases such as the present, are still in use in sixteen dioceses (see the report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, 1883), and it has not been suggested that these forms have not all been in use, at all events from 1640 onwards. Mr. Dibdin, indeed, suggested, but he failed to support the suggestion by any authority, that the origin of these reservations of jurisdiction to the bishop was to be found in certain canons, of which Archbishop Laud was said to be the author, and which were promulgated in 1640, but were subsequently, as he said, abrogated by the statute of 13 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 5; in fact, he contended, broadly, that, before those canons were promulgated, the bishop had no jurisdistion whatever in cases of this class, but that the exclusive jurisdiction was in his chancellor. There is no doubt that a chancellor may be imposed upon a bishop: see Godolphin's Repertorium Canonicum, p. 81, quoting Ridley, "Chancellors of dioceses are nigh of as great antiquity as bishops themselves, and are such necessary officers to bishops that every bishop must of necessity have a chancellor; and that if any bishop should seem to be so complete within himself as not to need a chancellor yet the archbishop of the province in case of refusal may put a chancellor on him, in that the law presumes government of a whole diocese a matter of more obligation than can be well sustained by one person alone; and that, although the nomination of the chancellor is in the bishop, yet his authority is derived from the law. . . . It is most probable that the multiplicity and variety of ecclesiastical causes introduced the use and office of chancellor originally; for after that princes had granted to ecclesiastical persons their causes and their consistories, and circumstances varying these causes into a more numerous multiplication than were capable of being defined by like former presidents, necessity called for new decisions, and they for such judges as were experienced in such laws as were adapted to matters of an ecclesiastical cognisance, which would have been too prejudicial an avocation of bishops from the exercise of their more divine function, had not the office of the chancellor in determining such matters been an expedient to prevent the said prejudice or inconvenience." But that the chancellor's power, whatever the extent of it, is a delegated power only is clear—see Gibson's Codex, vol. 2, p. 1027, ed. 1713, quoting Stillingfleet: "And the law nowhere determines the bounds of a chancellour's power as to such acts, nor can it be supposed so to do since it is but a delegated power, and it is in the right of him that deputes to circumscribe and limit it." In a manuscript in the Public Record Office of 1636-37, apparently drafted by Sir John Lambe, Dean of Arches, and copied in Rothery's Returns, Appendix, p. xxvii., there is this passage: "Note that in all these offices derived from and under the bishop the bishop cannot so graunt his jurisdiction to his chauncellor, comissary, archdeacon, deane, and chapter, &c., or so abdicate it from himself, but that he also may use the same, not by prohibiting them (unlesse by way of appeale where it lieth to him), but by doing also with them or without them." It was nevertheless suggested by Mr. Dibdin, as I have said, that the reservations of jurisdiction to the bishop, which continue to be found in the patents in use in so many dioceses down to the present day, took their origin from the canon of 1640 (the 11th). But the language of the canon (see it set out in Gibson, p. 1028) seems to assume an existing power of reservation. And though by 13 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 5, these canons were expressly not confirmed, that statute saves all jurisdiction existing in 1639. If the effect of the Act of 13 Car. 2, c. 12, passed in 1661, was to leave the bishop denuded of all jurisdiction in his Consistorial Court, as Mr. Dibdin's argument assumes, it is certainly very strange to find Lord Holt no more than forty years later asserting the bishop's right to sit there himself, and reiterating the same opinion some years afterwards. In Bishop of St. David's v. Lucy, decided in 1699, he says: "The archbishop may hold his court where he pleaseth and he may convene before himself and sit judge himself, and so may any other bishop, for the power of a chancellor or vicar-general is only delegated in case of a bishop." And in Bishop of Cloyne v. Gibbons, decided in 1706, he says: "As to what is said that a bishop may sit in his own court and that the vicar and he are but one person, it is true a bishop may sit when he pleases in his own court, but the vicar, chancellor, shall have fees." In 1853 a patent in the same form as at present, being that in use in the diocese of Chicester, came before the court of Queen's Bench, consisting of Lord Campbell, C.J., and Coleridge and Wightman, JJ., in Ex parte Medwin. In delivering the considered judgment of the court, Lord Campbell says: "We desired to look at the patent before we granted or refused a rule. We have now examined it." He then summarizes it, and refers to the qualifying clause. He then proceeds: "The court therefore is in style the bishop's court, as this is the Queen's, and the chancellor is the bishop's chancellor, as we are the Queen's judges. By a special provision, at the prayer of the party, the bishop's judgment may be invoked, in which respect the analogy fails. But where this prayer is not made, the chancellor, or official principal, seems to be an independent judge; nor is he the less so because some cases are expected from his jurisdiction, or because that jurisdiction ceases, or is suspended, when the bishop is present. If absent the bishop cannot interfere; the parties are never supposed, by the citation or other proceedings, to be before him; nor is there any appeal from the chancellor to him." Again, after citing two passages from Ayliffe, he says: "This passage is not very accurately expressed; but the meaning is sufficiently clear in one sense. The chancellor, or the official, has a delegated power as much as the commissary, because they equally receive from the bishop a power which was originally in him, and which originally he might have exercised himself, and probably often did. But it was a power to be exercised in a court, open to the subjects of the diocese, for the trial of all causes over which he has jurisdiction." This suggestion that they "often did" finds support in the diary of Cartwright, Bishop of Chester, in the years 1686 and 1687, cited to us by Mr. Duke, as also from some of the cases mentioned in Rothery's Return, though that collection is limited to those cases only which found their way to the Court of Delegates. In his Historical Appendix (I.) to the report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission (1883), p. 32, Bishop Stubbs says: "The commission of the chancellor or official principal of the bishop differed from that of the official principal of the archbishop in not necessarily conferring the whole judicial authority of the bishop, who in some instances reserved particular portions of jurisdiction for his own hearing, as is done at the present day." He casts no doubt on the legality of this practice. At p. 46, paragraph 3, he says: "The Court of King's Bench, in the case of Bishop of St. David's v. Lucy, held that the commission of chancellor, or vicar-general, could not be regarded as excluding the archbishop or bishop from sitting in his own court (Stephens, I., 289). But, although this is reasonable as an affirmation of law, it is not easy to adduce instances in which the power has been exercised since the Reformation. It appears, from the return on the patents of official principals, made for the present commission, that in several dioceses it is the practice of the present day to reserve to the bishop himself important sections of judicial work, or a general right to execute in person the offices otherwise deputed." From the references above given it would seem that the power has been in fact occasionally, if not frequently, exercised since the Reformation. There seems to be no judicial pronouncement to be set against those above cited. The passage in Sir G. Lee's judgment in Hillyer v. Milligan, 2 Lee, 8, does not seem necessarily to involve the question of a reservation in the patent itself. I think therefore that it is impossible to hold void a proviso which merely excludes the jurisdiction of the chancellor in cases where the parties or either of them crave the judgment of the bishop himself unless upon consultation the bishop consents to his assuming it. The demand of a party and the good sense of the bishop would seem to be sufficient safeguard against abuse. With regard to the form of the rule, we think it would be sufficient if the prohibition went quousque—that is to say, as against Dr. Tristram, until consultation with the bishop and consent by him to the judgment, and as against the other respondent until there has been such consultation and consent or until the bishop agrees to hear the cause himself. I have to add that Romer, L.J., agrees with this judgment.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree with the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls for allowing this appeal. In the judgment of the Divisional Court it would seem to have been supposed that the bishop was bound in every case by the decision of his chancellor, that his assent was a ministerial act only, and that the omission of a mere formality was no objection to the chancellor's authority to pronounce a final judgment. It is difficult to reconcile this view with the language of the patent. The authority conferred upon the chancellor to decide and finally determine causes is subject to this proviso: "Nevertheless first consulting us and our successors and having our consent in case either party earnestly crave our judgment." The legal construction of the patent would seem to be clear. Before the chancellor can pronounce his decision, where either party earnestly craves "our judgment," it is for the bishop to determine whether or not he will give his consent. But it was argued for the respondents that the patent gave rise to no question of construction. It was said that the terms might be disregarded because the document should be treated in law as obsolete and illegal. It was pointed out that the bishop was bound by ancient usage to nominate a chancellor, and it was said that when the appointment was made the bishop was divested of every judicial function, even where, as in the present case, the patent contained express reservations. The bishop, it was contended, was prohibited by law from interfering with an official who appeared to derive such powers as he possessed from his patent, but who might, nevertheless, repudiate the terms by which he had undertaken to be bound. No reliable authority was cited in support of this proposition. The law would seem to have been laid down in the contrary sense in the decisions and records which have been fully discussed by the Master of the Rolls. It is clear that patents in analogous forms have been long in use in many of the English dioceses, and the instrument in question was considered in the Court of Queen's Bench in the case Ex parte Medwin, and was treated as unobjectionable. No reason was given for holding the clause in question to be contrary to public policy, and no ground suggested for the suspicion with which the control retained by the bishop would seem to be regarded. It may be true that the judgments of chancellors have not in recent times been interfered with, and that litigants have been left to their remedy by appeal; but this does not show that the form of patent continuously used had become obsolete or invalid. It was next contended that, even if some of the provisions of the patent were lawful and binding, the particular clause upon which the appellants rely was illegal and had been condemned by the Legislature. To establish this the canons of 1640 were referred to, and it was suggested that then, for the first time, it was declared by convocation that the bishop might reserve to himself the right to examine and determine every cause in his court. These canons were promptly condemned by the Long Parliament and were treated as being subversive of the constitution in matters relating to Church government (see Gibson's Codex, p. 956*n*.). It perhaps would be sufficient to dispose of this argument to point out that the clause we are dealing with was not that provided for by the canon of 1640. But there is the further answer that there would seem to be no good ground for the assertion that the general reservation which is found in this patent "to examine and determine every cause in our proper person in our court of consistory" was intended to be stamped by Parliament with illegality. The statute of 13 Car. 2, c. 12, recited the Act of 17 Car. 1, and by section 2 repealed all other provisions with the temporary exception of what concerned the High Commission Court. [His lordship then read sections 1 and 5, saying that section 1 contained a clear reservation of the jurisdiction of the bishop in all causes and matters belonging to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.] It has not been shown that the reservation of causes from the chancellor's jurisdiction has been condemned or even questioned in any decision of the courts of common law; and the fact that so many patents still contain a similar clause would seem to show that in this respect the forms in use before 1639 continued to be followed. Another point made for the respondents was this—that no effect could be given to the clause which permitted the litigant in the consistory court to crave the judgment of the bishop, because it was not pointed out by what method or to what extent inquiries were to be made by the bishop before he consented to adopt or to differ from the judgment of the chancellor. But no such directions would seem to be required. It would be the duty of the bishop to obtain all necessary information, and there would seem to be no reason to suppose that the duty would be neglected. Moreover, it should be borne in mind that the determination of the bishop would be subject to appeal. A further point was made for the respondents that, even if the patent must be regarded as valid and binding, the appellants had so acted in the course of the litigation as to show that they had abandoned their earnest craving for the judgment of the bishop. In the fifth paragraph of the answer the respondents raise the point and pray "that before any decision of the cause the bishop should be consulted and his consent had," and they earnestly crave his judgment. In the reply the petitioner objected to the bishop being consulted or to his sitting to try the cause. It appears from the report of Davey v. Hinde, [1901] P. at p. 105, that the point was argued, and the chancellor dealt with it at some length in his judgment. There was no evidence that the appellants so acted as to indicate that their objection was abandoned. But reliance was placed on the delay which it was said had taken place before the application was made for a prohibition. The facts were these: A question had been raised as to the right of the petitioner to institute proceedings and that point was decided in his favour. The judgment was suspended pending an appeal to the Court of Arches. The appeal was subsequently abandoned, and the chancellor, in August, 1900, proceeded to judgment, and in the following term prohibition was applied for. The delay was thus fully explained. I agree that the appeal should be allowed and the prohibition issued in the terms suggested by the Master of the Rolls.

Appeal allowed.

The rights of equality inter se attached to debentures

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

of a series ought not to be interfered with by an accidental omission to register some of them within the time required under section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, and the proviso inserted in orders for the extension of time for registration, saving the rights of parties acquired prior to registration, ought to be framed so as not to make any difference to the rights of debenture-holders inter se.

Form of order considered.

This was an appeal from orders made by Kekewich and Joyce, JJ.

In 1899 the company passed a resolution to issue £85,000 of debentures.

In 1900 a covering deed was executed conveying property to trustees by way of mortgage.

By the conditions of the debentures the company charged all its property, present and future, including uncalled capital for the time being, by way of mortgage; and the debentures were stated to be part of a series all of which were to rank pari passu.

Over £60,000 of debentures were issued before the 1st of January, 1901, on which date the Companies Act, 1900, came into operation.

By section 14 of that Act "(1) Every mortgage or charge created by a company after the commencement of this Act, and being either (a) a mortgage or charge for the purpose of securing any issue of debentures; or (b) a mortgage or charge on uncalled capital of the company; (c) a mortgage or charge created or evidenced by an instrument which, if executed by an individual, would require registration as a bill of sale; or (d) a floating charge on the undertaking or property of the company, shall, so far as any security on the company's property or undertaking is conferred, be void against the liquidator and any creditor of the company unless filed with the registrar for registration in manner required by this Act within twenty-one days after the date of its creation, but without prejudice to any contract or obligation for repayment of the money thereby secured."

Since that date the company issued 327 other debentures of the same series.

Owing to a misapprehension these debentures were not registered within the time prescribed by the Act.

The company—which was in a prosperous condition—and the holders of the 327 debentures, whose names and holdings were given in a schedule to the notice of motion, applied for an extension of time for that purpose under section 15 of the Act, which is as follows: "A judge of the High Court, on being satisfied that the omission to register a mortgage or charge within the time required by this Act, or the omission or misstatement of any particular with respect to any such mortgage or charge was accidental or due to inadvertence or to some other sufficient cause, or is not of a nature to prejudice the position of creditors or shareholders of the company, or that on other grounds it is just and equitable to grant relief, may on the application of the company or any person interested, and on such terms and conditions as seem to the judge just and expedient, order that the time for registration be extended, or, as the case may be, that the omission or misstatement be rectified."

Kekewich, J., made an order extending the time, but following In re Joplin Brewery Co. (Limited), ante p. 75, [1902] 1 Ch. 79, he directed that the order should contain the words, "But this order is to be without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when such debenture shall be actually registered." His lordship refused to qualify these words by a statement that they were not to affect the priorities of the debenture-holders inter se.

Joyce, J., subsequently, in the absence through illness of Kekewich, J., further extended the time till the 18th of May so as to give them time to appeal, and made the order in the same form.

The company appealed.

Haldane, K.C., and Christopher James, for the company.—By this order as it stands those debenture-holders whose debentures did not require registration will acquire priority over the other debenture-holders. This is directly opposed to the terms of their contract that all shall rank pari passu.

They cited In re Joplin Brewery Co. (Limited); In re The Spiral Globe (Limited), ante, p. 187, [1902] 1 Ch. 396; *In re S. Neville, K.C., and J. G. Pease, contra.

Haldane, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R., stated the facts, and continued: It is not disputed here that the case does come within the 15th section and that the judge has properly exercised his discretion in enlarging the time for registration, but the point that does arise is as to a qualification which has been inserted in the last words of the order, "The court being satisfied that the omission to register" and so forth "was accidental doth, pursuant to the 15th section of the Act, order that the time for registration of the said debentures be extended unto the 18th of April, 1902, inclusive." Then came the words that are objected to, "But this order is to be without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when such debentures shall be actually registered." Now, it is said by Mr. Haldane for the appellants that these words are capable of being interpreted, and, in fact, primâ facie do involve this, that that proportion of the debenture-holders whose debentures do not require registration will take priority over those as to which this order permitting registration is made, and he says that such a result is one that this court ought not to permit because as regards the contract under which these debentures were created the most fundamental provision provides that all debenture-holders are to rank pari passu, and that if the mere omission, under circumstances excused by the judge, is to be held to have the effect of giving different rights between themselves, and giving those who accidentally did not require registration, priority and putting these two sets of debenture-holders upon an inequality, then that is really to defeat the fundamental provision of the contract under which they were issued, and that is a consequence which certainly ought to be avoided if the statute does not compel us to accept it. I assume that the words in the order are capable of and, indeed, primâ facie do bear the construction which the appellants object to, and dealing with it on that footing the question is whether or not, construed in that way, it is properly within the section as interpreted by some decisions which have already been made upon it. Now, the decision of Buckley, J., in Joplin's case was the decision upon which Kekewich, J., based his decision in this case. I do not think he gave any opinion on the matter himself, but he simply followed the form which Buckley, J., adopted. Buckley, J., in that case says this: He reads the section and then goes on and says: "The language of the latter section is larger than that of the former, but I do not see that the variance makes any difference to the point with which I have to deal. Under section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, a security if not registered within a given time is void as against the liquidator and any creditor of the company. These applications are made without serving the creditors, and the orders ought to be drawn so as to save the rights of persons who have become creditors of the company before registration is effected just as in the case of bills of sale." He therefore treats the two provisions in the Companies and Bills of Sale Acts as analagous. "I, therefore direct that there be added to the order the words 'But that this order be without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when the debentures shall be actually registered,' and I intimate my opinion that these words ought to be added in every case, unless there is some good ground to the contrary—e.g., in cases in which the order could not prejudice the rights of any creditors." Now, the words in this order are "But that this order be without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when the debentures shall be actually registered." Now, for the purposes of this application, ought there to be any doubt left as to whether the mere fact of a portion of these debentures being issued before registration became necessary, and the second part being issued after it became necessary and requiring the indulgence which is given under the 15th section, ought to make any difference between the rights of the parties inter se? It seems to me that it certainly ought not, that the mere fact of having been issued at a time when registration was not required does not and ought not to put them in any better position than those debenture-holders who have had their bonds issued to them after registration became necessary; even although the latter made a slip and did not come within the proper time. It seems to me that the condition under which these debenture-holders took their securities was that, as between themselves, they were to rank pari passu. That agreement was made in view of the certainty that they would not in point of fact be issued at one and the same time, and it was to meet that possible contention that those who took first should have the first rights that this provision negativing that and indicating that they should take pari passu was introduced.

Therefore, it seems to me that the mere fact of there having been a slip in the matter of registering the second set, and that the first did not require registration at the time they were issued, did not alter the rights of the parties inter se and that words ought to be introduced into this order to make this practically clear. At the same time, while the rights of these parties inter se ought not to be interfered with merely on the facts that I have stated, it is possible that under the section the rights of other outside persons might intervene. It is impossible to say under what circumstances they could intervene. It is not necessary for us in this case to decide whether any creditor who had not actually issued execution is a creditor who ought to be protected and who ought to displace the rights of those who were not registered until after his debt had accrued. It is not necessary to give a decision upon the point, though I am bound to say that Buckley, J.'s, judgment, which purported to apply this Act on the analogy of the clause in the Bills of Sale Act does seem rather to enlarge the area to which the Bills of Sale Act was held to be limited, for instead of dealing with the creditors who have actually issued execution—that had been the subject of discussion under the former Act—he says this: "The orders ought to be drawn so as to save the rights of persons who have become creditors of the company before registration is effected, just as in the case of bills of sale." Now in the case of bills of sale one case has been cited to us which went to the Court of Appeal, and in which Bowen, L.J., gave the judgment in which the late Master of the Rolls agreed. It was the case of Crew v. Cummings, 36 W. R. 908, 21 Q. B. D. 420 In that case an execution had actually been put in between the date of the bill of sale and the time for the application to enlarge the time for registration, and the court held that registration could not be extended under the 14th section so as to defeat the vested right of an execution creditor. But in that case, the execution being actually put in, the court took time to consider, and, having considered, they based their judgment on the fact that a title had been acquired by the creditor who had put in execution. "I do not think that the Act of Parliament," says Bowen, L.J., "in giving the power to extend the time could have intended that such an extension of time should be granted after the title to the goods had actually vested in the execution creditor by reason of the failure of the holder of the bill of sale to comply with the provisions of the Act." Now it seems to me that that judgment is given on the footing that, but for the execution put in, the creditor would have taken no rights which would have been interfered with by giving permission to extend the time necessary for the registration of the bill of sale. However, it seems to me that it is not necessary for this court to decide any point about creditors, whether execution creditors or others, but what we can decide, and what I think the order ought to provide for, is that as between these two sets of debenture-holders this fact of registration and failure to register ought not to make any difference, and that their rights inter se ought to rank pari passu. The order will be considered by counsel and will be framed to meet that view, and we shall have an opportunity of considering it; but it seems to me on these grounds the order as it stands ought to be altered, and that, to that extent, this appeal ought to be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I only just wish to add this, that section 15 indicates or points out various circumstances under which the court may exercise its jurisdiction. One of those is when the registration is not of the nature to prejudice creditors, but if there has been omission, misstatement, or inadvertence, or some other sufficient cause, the court is empowered to allow registration although it will affect the creditors. The analogy of the Bills of Sale Act which Buckley, J., took in Joplin's case seems to me to be very close and precise, but speaking for myself I doubt whether the words which he has inserted—which are a mere transcript of the common form under the Bills of Sale Act—would have any effect in protecting creditors who had not taken some proceeding to get a charge or a security upon the goods. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

[The terms of the variation were subsequently mentioned for the approval of the court; and by the minutes of the order as finally settled it was provided (after extending the time till the 18th of May) as follows: Provided always that this order is without prejudice to any rights (other than rights in respect of debentures of the said series) which may have been or may be acquired against the holders of the said debentures set forth in the schedule to this order prior to the time when the last-mentioned debentures shall be actually registered. And it is hereby declared that, except so far, if at all, as may be necessary for giving effect to the proviso aforesaid, such proviso shall not interfere with the rights of equality among themselves attached to all the debentures of the said series, but so that, in the event of the debentures set forth in the said schedule being avoided as against parties having any such rights as are preserved by the said proviso, none of the holders of the debentures of the said series, other than the holders of the debentures set forth in the said schedule, shall by reason of such avoidance be required to accept any less share of the assets comprised in his security than he would have taken if there had been no such avoidance.]

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. (reported [1901] 2 Ch. 338, 49 W. R. Dig. 198).

By his will, dated the 30th of December, 1889, Francis Schnadhurst, after giving certain legacies, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to his trustees on trust for conversion and investment, and after directing certain investments to be held on certain trusts for the benefit of his wife, children, and sisters, he directed the trustees to pay the income of the residue of the trust fund to his wife during her life or widowhood and to pay her an annuity if she remarried.

The will then proceeded as follows: "And subject to the provision aforesaid upon trust after the decease or second marriage of my wife to apply the income of the trust fund in or towards the maintenance, education, and advancement of my children until the youngest who shall be living shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter shall attain that age or marry. Subject to the trusts and powers herein before contained I direct that the trust fund and the income thereof and all accumulations of income or so much thereof as shall not have become vested or been applied pursuant to this my will shall be held in trust for all my children who, being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry, to whom I give and bequeath my residuary real and personal estate in equal shares. I direct that if any of my children shall die leaving issue such issue shall take his or her deceased parent's share equally as tenants in common."

The testator died on the 2nd of January, 1900, leaving him surviving his widow and three children, the plaintiff May Frances Sandkuhl (wife of Hans Sandkuhl), the defendant Ernest Edward Schnadhorst, and Frank Gladstone Schnadhorst, all of whom were now living, and of whom F. G. Schnadhorst alone was an infant at the date of the testator's death. He had since attained the age of twenty-one years. The defendant E. E. Schnadhorst was married, and had two infant sons, who were also defendants. The executors and trustees having renounced probate of the will and disclaimed the trusts, letters of administration with the will annexed were granted to the defendant E. E. Schnadhorst; the summons was taken out by Hans Sandkuhl and May Frances, his wife, for the determination of the questions whether upon the true construction of the will the children who survived the testator and being sons had attained the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters had attained that age or married, took vested indefeasible interests in the residue subject to the widow's interest, or whether they could only take such interest on surviving the widow, or only if and when they should die without leaving issue.

Joyce, J., held that they took vested indefeasible interests only if and when they should die without leaving issue.

Hans Sandkuhl and his wife appealed.

Younger, K.C., and Peterson, for the appellants.—The testator gave the capital and income of his residuary estate to his children. He could not have meant that the trustees were to hold the fund after the youngest child attained twenty-one, and pay the income to the children for the rest of their lives. There are two separate gifts—(1) of the income till the youngest child attains twenty-one, (2) of the capital and income to those who have attained twenty-one. The testator only meant that there was to be no distribution till the youngest child attained twenty-one. He meant the shares to vest at twenty-one or marriage. "Die" must mean die under twenty-one, or in the widow's life, or before the youngest child attains twenty-one. The trustees are clearly intended to pay the shares over. Home v. Pillans, 2 My. & K. 15, is not inconsistent with O'Mahony v. Burdett, 23 W. R. 361, L. R. 7 H. L. 388, and Lord Cairns expressly approved of it in that case. We have here a context excluding the supposition that death at any time is contemplated, therefore this case is outside O'Mahony v. Burdett. Bowers v. Bowers, 18 W. R. 301, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 244, can be distinguished.

They also referred to Monteith v. Nicholson, 2 Keen 719.

Micklem, K.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for E. Schnadhorst, supported the appeal.—The gifts are alternative, or if not the period of defeasance is limited to the period of distribution, which is to be on the death of the widow or on the youngest child attaining twenty-one, which shall last happen.

They cited Da Costa v. Keir, 3 Russ. 360.

Dibdin, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the infants, were not called on.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case has been very ably and clearly argued by Mr. Younger, who has put his contention in a very captivating light; and if it were not governed by authority I might be disposed to agree with him as to the testator's intentions. But we have to see what, on the fair and grammatical construction of his will, the testator must be taken to have meant, having in view the authorities by which the case is governed. [His lordship stated the facts and the provisions of the will, and continued:] Mr. Younger has put before us the four possible constructions of the words "die without issue"—(1) that it means "die under twenty-one," (2) "die during the lifetime of the widow," (3) "before the youngest child attains twenty-one," (4) "die at any time." He presses us to adopt one of the first three constructions, and to reject the last.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In support of the first construction he relies on Home v. Pillans, but he has to meet the difficulty that there there was a gift to two ladies if they should attain twenty-one, while here the gift is to daughters at twenty one or marriage. Therefore Home v. Pillans is not to be relied on as regards the daughter; and though Mr. Younger says at all events it applies as regards the sons, it would be difficult, I think, to apply different rules in the cases of the sons and of the daughters. And with regard to Home v. Pillans it is enough to quote the words of Lord Cairns in O'Mahony v. Burdett: "Home v. Pillans was a case of an entirely different kind. There was there a bequest to the testator's nieces when and if they should attain twenty-one, and in case of the death of either niece leaving children or a child the testator gave the share of the niece so dying to her children or child. This was not the case of an absolute gift with a gift over in a certain event. There was no gift over and no gift at all till a niece attained twenty-one and the child of a niece marrying and dying under twenty-one would have been wholly unprovided for if the court had not held that the words 'in case of the death of my said nieces or either of them leaving children or a child,' pointed to a death under twenty-one." This is enough to dispose of Home v. Pillans as regards this case, and Mr. Younger relied more on constructions (2) and (3). Mr. Micklem, too, pressed on us that as Lord Cairns said there was no defeasance or gift over in Home v. Pillans, so there was none here, but the gifts were alternative. But this contention is really disposed of by Lord Cairns' words which I have just quoted. Here we have clearly an absolute gift to the children who attain twenty-one or marry, with a clause of defeasance in the case of any dying without issue. I will now refer to the head-note in O'Mahony v. Burdett: "A bequest to A., and if she shall die unmarried or without children, to B., is an absolute gift to A. defeasible by an executory gift over in the event of A. dying, at any time, unmarried or without children. This construction can only be affected by a context which renders a different meaning necessary. A gift to X. for life with remainder to A., and if A. dies unmarried or without children to B., is an executory gift over, which will defeat the absolute interest of A. in the event of A. dying, at any time, unmarried or without children. There is no rule of construction arising from possible delay in the vesting of a gift which evades the natural meaning of the terms of the bequest." This is a clear authority for the proposition that death in the will before us means death at any time. It is true that here the defeasance is in the event of death with issue, and in O'Mahony v. Burdett it was in the event of death without issue; but this is immaterial, and no argument was in fact addressed to us on this distinction. Further, it is worthy of note that in Ingram v. Soutten, 23 W. R. 363, L. R. 7 H. L. 408, the report of which immediately follows that of O'Mahony v. Burdett, the principle laid down in O'Mahony v. Burdett is reiterated. Authority clearly lays down that without some special words limiting the meaning, death means death at any time. Is there any such excluding context here? Mr. Younger has pressed on us that it is to be found in the testator's evident wish that the beneficiaries should take their shares at some time or other, but there is no direction to pay over the shares at a particular time. I will refer to Lord Hatherley's words in O'Mahony v. Burdett: "I apprehend in another class of cases, many of which were cited before us, which have been decided since Edwards v. Edwards, 15 Beav. 357, one of them having been before myself, in those cases when the court has found upon the face of the will a positive direction to pay over the personalty to the legatee, or to make a distribution among several legatees at a given time, the period of distribution being fixed at which, as it appears from the face of the will, the whole estate was intended to be entirely disposed of and divided, and to pass from the hands of the executors, the courts have laid hold of that circumstance to say, 'We hold this defeasance to be before that period of distribution arrives,' holding it to be an unreasonable construction of the testator's will to say that he directed on the one hand that the money shall be absolutely paid and divided and distributed, and put into the hands of those who, having it in their hands, will, of course, spend it without any further trust, and, on the other hand, that a subsequent event—namely, a certain person dying childless after that distribution has taken place—should divest the property—that is to say, make it necessary for the executor to take steps to get back again and recall that money which he has paid in order to hand it over to those who would take under the executory devise." Mr. Younger gets such a direction out of the words "to whom I give and bequeath my residuary estate." But this would be to put a very large interpretation on those words. There is, in my opinion, no context here narrowing or defining the period of vesting fixed by authority, and the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I should be content to say no more were it not out of respect to the learned arguments which have been addressed to us. Mr. Younger and Mr. Micklem have satisfied me that on the construction which Joyce, J., put on this will the testator has framed a distribution of his property which is very inconvenient to his children, and that if his attention had been called to the matter he would have done differently; but we cannot speculate as to this, and must construe this will according to the natural and proper meaning of the words used, in the absence of any context requiring a different meaning to be given to them. As to the meaning of a gift over if any child die leaving issue, I adopt the statement of Lord Cairns that the words indicate death at any time, unless there be some inconsistent context. What sort of context is this? In O'Mahony v. Burdett Lord Selborne pointed out two classes of cases in which such a context can be found; the first, cases where an express period for distribution is fixed; the second where there is an indication on the face of the will that the legatee is in some event to take an absolute interest. Is there any such indication here? The testator, after providing for his widow's life interest and for the maintenance, &c., of the children, directs that the fund shall be held in trust for all the children at twenty-one or marriage. Two points were dwelt on—(1) that the direction for the application of the income lasts only till the youngest attains twenty-one, and it is not to be supposed that the trustees are to go on paying interest to the children for the rest of their lives; (2) that we have an absolute gift in the words "to whom I give and bequeath my residuary estate." But I can see no expression of the testator's intention that there was to be a distribution at the death of the widow or when the youngest child attained twenty-one; indeed, the will points the other way, since it says that the property is to be held in trust, and so remain in the hands of the trustees. But, further, the testator has given the trustees full discretionary power to apply the whole income in maintenance and education, and no express direction to distribute the property after that; and the words "I give and bequeath" do not amount to a direction to divide at any particular period, or imply an intention that on any particular event the objects of the testator's bounty were to take an absolute interest. Lord Selborne clearly meant an event in which the property was to be at the legatee's own disposal, and the present case does not fall within either of his two classes. No doubt there may be others, but the present case has been argued as falling within one of these two. There only remains the contention that the language here closely resembles that used in the will in Home v. Pillans; but this is not well-founded, since in O'Mahony v. Burdett Lord Cairns treated Home v. Pillans as a case of alternative gifts, not a gift taking effect by defeasance, and so Home v. Pillans does not apply here. The testator here must have contemplated that his daughter would survive him, and we must treat the clause in the same way as regards all the children. And I should have come to the same conclusion if all the children had been under twenty-one. I agree with Joyce, J.'s, reason for holding that Home v. Pillans does not apply, and I think the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I cannot find any context excluding the natural meaning of the words, or any direction for a particular period of distribution.

Practice—Compromise—Authority of counsel—Limitation of authority by client—Reference of action—Interlocutory order.

Where a limitation has been placed by a client on the authority of his counsel with regard to the reference of an action, which is not communicated to the other side, and counsel agrees to a reference in disregard of that limitation, the agreement to refer is binding on the client, whether it results in an interlocutory or a final order.

In this case an application was made to Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., to rescind an order made by him referring the action which was brought to recover damages for slander. When the case came on for trial, the learned judge, having looked at the pleadings, intimated that it was undesirable that the details should be discussed in open court, and that the best course would be that there should be an inquiry by some independent person. Counsel for both parties thereupon agreed that the case should be referred.

Prior to the consent given by counsel the plaintiff signed the following document: "Defendant stating by her counsel that she never imputed or meant to impute anything against the moral character of the plaintiff, and is satisfied that there is no ground for any such imputation; case referred to —— to say what should be done between the parties in satisfaction of all matters in difference between them; case referred to —— to say what sum, if any, should be paid by the defendant in compensation for the matters complained of in this action. I consent to either alternative Sir E. Clarke adopts. 12/2/02."

From an affidavit made by the plaintiff it appeared that after consultation with her counsel she consented to the reference on the understanding that the defendant admitted in court by her counsel that the plaintiff's character was exonerated and that no imputation was to rest on it; and further, from other affidavits, that immediately after it was announced in court that the action was referred, the plaintiff communicated with her solicitor, and instructed him to see her counsel with reference to the case having been referred without such statement having been made.

Application was therefore made to the learned judge that the case might be restored to the list on the ground that the plaintiff had not authorised the arrangement arrived at and that counsel had exceeded his authority, and the learned judge, in view of the question being an important one, decided that the matter should be argued before him.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C. (R. J. Drake with him), for the plaintiff.

Isaacs, K.C. (Norman Craig with him), for the defendant.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the following judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following written judgment: This is an application to rescind the order of reference of the action to Mr. Dickens to which the parties consented through their counsel on the 12th of February, and which consent was subsequently embodied in an order of the 17th of February. I need not repeat the statement of facts as to the case which I made when I dealt with this matter on the 19th of February, but that statement should be taken as part of my present judgment. The only additional facts I need add are those which appear in the affidavits which have now been produced and the documents which have been handed to me by Sir Edward Clarke. From these it appears that prior to the consent given by counsel the plaintiff had signed a document which had been drawn up by Sir Edward Clarke, and which was in the following terms: "Defendant stating by her counsel that she never imputed or meant to impute anything against the moral character of the plaintiff, and is satisfied that there is no ground for any such imputation, case referred to —— to say what should be done between the parties in satisfaction of all matters in difference between them. Case referred to —— to say what sum, if any, should be paid by the defendant in compensation for the matters complained of in this action. I consent to either alternative Sir E. Clarke adopts. 12/2/02. (Signed) DORA BEATRICE NEALE." If the matter had rested there it would, in my opinion, have been impossible to hold that any restraint was actually put upon Sir Edward Clarke's discretion in dealing with the case; but the plaintiff swears in her affidavit, made upon the 17th of February, that after consultation with her counsel, whom I understand to have been Sir E. Clarke's junior, she consented to the reference on the understanding that the defendant admitted in court by her counsel that the plaintiff's character was exonerated and that no imputation was to rest upon it. I must take it that this statement in the affidavit was true. It further appears from the affidavits that immediately after it was announced in court that the action was referred the plaintiff communicated with her solicitor and instructed him to see Sir E. Clarke with reference to the case being referred without such statement having been made, and that on the 14th the plaintiff had a consultation with Sir E. Clarke, which led to the application being made to me upon Monday, the 17th. In these circumstances I come to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that the plaintiff had only consented to the action being referred upon the condition that the statement was made, and did, before the order was drawn up, communicate with her counsel and solicitor with a view to the arrangement being set aside and the case being restored to the list. The case was argued before me on Saturday last by Sir E. Clarke for the plaintiff and Mr. Rufus Isaacs for the defendant, and a great many authorities bearing upon the question were cited and discussed before me. I do not propose to go through all these cases, as my so doing would serve no useful purpose; but I will state what, in my opinion, are the propositions of law to be derived from them, and then consider their bearing upon the present case.

I think it is now clearly established that counsel appearing for a party in an action was held out as having authority, and has full authority, as to all matters which relate to the conduct of the action and its settlement; and further, that, notwithstanding a limit may have been placed upon the authority of counsel, the party for whom he appears is bound by such settlement unless the fact that the counsel's apparent authority had been limited was communicated to the other side. These propositions are, I think, established by the cases of Wright v. Soresby, 2 Cr. & M. 671; Prestwich v. Poley, 13 W. R. 753, 18 C. B. N. S. 806; Strauss v. Francis, 14 W. R. 634, L. R. 1 Q. B. 379; and Matthews v. Munster, 36 W. R. 178, 20 Q. B. D. 141; and were stated to be clear law by Coleridge, L.C.J., in Harvey v. Croydon Union, 32 W. R 389, 26 Ch. D. 249, at p. 256. It is equally well established that the authority of counsel does not extend to matters collateral to the action: see Furnival v. Bogle, 4 Russ. 142; the various reports in Swinfen v. Swinfen, 5 W. R. 203, 1 C. B. N. S. 364, and 6 W. R. 480, 2 De G. & J. 381; Matthews v. Munster; and Kempshall v. Holland, 14 R. 336. Whether agreeing to a reference is part of the conduct of a case and not collateral has not, as far as I know, been decided by authority. Crowder, J., clearly thought it was not within the authority of counsel: see his judgment in Swinfen v. Swinfen, 1 C. B. N. S., at p. 403, but I doubt whether this opinion is consistent with the view expressed by Pollock, C.B., in Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford, 8 W. R. 545, 5 H. & N. 890, or with the judgments in Strauss v. Francis, where withdrawing a juror—or Rumsey v. King, 33 L. T. Rep. 728, 24 W. R. Dig. 81, where entering a stet processus—was held to be within the authority of counsel. Sir Edward Clarke said he could not argue that agreeing to a reference was collateral to the action; and for myself I should hold that having regard to the existing rules and the power of judges thereunder to refer actions or send them to referees for trial, it was within the authority of counsel to consent to a reference. It is further clearly established that, if the counsel consenting to a compromise is mistaken as to the facts, the client may have the right to set aside the arrangement on the ground of mistake: see Holt v. Jesse, 24 W. R. 879, 3 Ch. D. 177; Hickman v. Berens, [1895] 2 Ch. 638, 44 W. R. Dig. 41; Wilding v. Sanderson, 45 W. R. 452 and 675, [1897] 2 Ch. 534.

There is, however, as far as I know, no case which has decided that the compromise will be set aside merely on the ground that the counsel has exceeded his authority; and, as I have already indicated, such a view would, in my opinion, be inconsistent with the first proposition which I have formulated and the cases therein referred to. If, therefore, the arrangement come to by Sir E. Clarke had been a final settlement of the action, I am of opinion that it would be binding upon the plaintiff, even assuming that she had limited Sir E. Clarke's authority at the time when he entered in the arrangement. None, however, of the authorities to which I have referred, in which the compromise or arrangement has been held binding upon the client, were cases of interlocutory orders; and in my judgment, in considering the principles which have been and ought to be applied, there is a broad distinction between interlocutory and final orders. This distinction has often been pointed out: see the judgment of Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Mullins v. Howell, 11 Ch. D. 763, 27 W. R. Dig. 148, and also the judgment of Romer, J., in Ainsworth v. Wilding, 44 W. R. 540, [1896] 1 Ch. 673, at p. 677. There is, in my opinion, a fundamental difference between interlocutory and final orders as well as between interlocutory and final judgments. Interlocutory orders and judgments are only intended to affect the rights of the parties in the litigation. They are always subject to review when fresh facts are brought to the consideration of the court. Judgments passed and entered stand in a very different position. In the case of an interlocutory order it is generally possible to restore parties to their original position by payment of costs or otherwise; final orders are intended to, and do, as a rule, determine the rights of the parties. Perhaps I should add in deference to an argument of Mr. Isaacs that I am clearly of opinion that an order to refer an action is an interlocutory and not a final order: see the authorities collected at p. 842, vol. 1, and p. 507, vol. 2, of the Annual Practice. I cannot help feeling regret that the plaintiff has thought fit to make the present application. The arrangement which was made proceeded, as I pointed out in my previous judgment, from a suggestion made in the first instance by me, and I believe greatly to her advantage. Sir Edward Clarke, in my opinion, had ample reason to think that he was not exceeding his authority at the time his consent was given, and has, with the chivalry which he has always shown in every act of his professional and public life, taken too large a responsibility for the mistake, if mistake there has been. But holding, as I do, that this was an interlocutory order, that it was in fact made without the plaintiff's authority, and that she took steps to set aside the arrangements before the order was drawn up, I am of opinion that I must reverse the order and restore the case to the jury list. The plaintiff must pay the costs of and occasioned by the postponement of the case, including these applications, in any event.

Leave to appeal.

April 8.—The defendant appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., and R. J. Drake, for the plaintiff.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Lord Chief Justice by which he has undone an agreement to refer an action, and has ordered the case to be restored to the list for trial. The appeal is brought by the defendant, who insists that the terms of the compromise by which the action was referred should be observed. The question is whether the defendant is entitled to insist on the terms of the agreement for reference which was made at the trial. The point is that Sir Edward Clarke, who appeared for the plaintiff at the trial, acted in making the compromise without the instructions, or contrary to the instructions of his client. With characteristic chivalry, Sir Edward Clarke has taken upon himself the whole responsibility for what has been done. He says that he did not act under any mistake, he admits that a limitation had been placed on his authority by his client, who instructed him not to consent to a reference except on terms that all imputations against her were withdrawn, but he says that, notwithstanding those instructions, he made a compromise outside the authority given to him by his client. The question we have to decide is whether, in these circumstances, the defendant is entitled to insist on the compromise as binding. The matter was argued before the Lord Chief Justice, and the authorities bearing on the question were discussed. In his judgment the learned Chief Justice formulated the principles which govern the determination of the case, and after reading that judgment I am unable to find anything to qualify, still less to impugn, the statement of principles there laid down. He summarized the decisions thus: "I think it is now clearly established that counsel appearing for a party in an action is held out as having authority, and has full authority, as to all matters which relate to the conduct of the action and its settlement; and, further, that, notwithstanding a limit may have been placed upon the authority of counsel, the party for whom he appears is bound by such settlement, unless the fact that the counsel's authority had been limited was communicated to the other side." He referred to the authorities, which clearly support that proposition.

I think that the starting-point of the discussion in this case is this, that counsel for the plaintiff had full authority primâ facie to refer the case either on terms that all imputations should be withdrawn or without any such terms. The right to agree to a reference of an action is within the general ambit of counsel's authority. The cases show that both counsel and attorney have authority to consent to a reference. It was held in Smith v. Troup, 7 C. B. 757, that, although the client had not assented to a reference, the attorney had authority to consent. Further, the case of Matthews v. Munster, shows that the right to make a compromise on terms of withdrawing all imputations is within the authority of counsel. There in an action for malicious prosecution the defendant's counsel, without the express authority of the defendant, assented to a verdict on the understanding that all imputations against the defendant were withdrawn; and it was held that the settlement was binding on the defendant. Those are two points as to which possibly controversy might have been raised, but as to which it is now perfectly clear that they are within the general primâ facie authority of counsel.

Now, what is the effect of a limitation of that authority not communicated to the opposing counsel? That question was dealt with in Strauss v. Francis, L. R. 1 Q. B. 379, at p. 383. There Blackburn, J., said: "All we decide is that, when a counsel acting within his apparent authority consents to withdraw a juror, the other side, acting fairly, may safely rely on the compromise being binding; and that, in order to invalidate the arrangement, not only must it be shown that the counsel's authority was limited, but that the limitation was known to the other side at the time." This has been affirmed in other cases. Here we have a general authority coupled with a secret limitation not communicated to the other side, and a compromise made in those circumstances that the case should be referred. It seems that Sir Edward Clarke's general authority was limited by instructions that he was to consent to a reference only on the terms of there being a complete withdrawal of all imputations. If there was such a limitation (and Sir Edward Clarke dealt with the case on that footing), it was a secret limitation unknown to the other side. The cases establish that a compromise made under those circumstances cannot be undone. There was no element of mistake or inadvertence in the matter. Sir Edward Clarke disclaimed the idea that there was any misapprehension on his part. Therefore the doctrine that mistake constitutes an exception to the general rule has no application to this case.

It is strange that the Lord Chief Justice, having up to this point dealt with the case on these principles, should have decided the case as he did in setting aside the compromise. He said: "If, therefore, the arrangement come to by Sir Edward Clarke had been a final settlement of the action, I am of opinion that it would be binding upon the plaintiff, even assuming that she had limited Sir Edward Clarke's authority at the time when he entered into the arrangement." But the Lord Chief Justice held that this was an interlocutory matter in contradistinction to being a final settlement of the action, and for that reason he appeared to think that the case became subject to a different set of principles. But in my opinion there is no authority for saying that the fact of this being an interlocutory order lets in a different set of principles from those which would have been applicable in the case of a final order. It is true that an interlocutory order may be undone by another interlocutory order, whereas to get rid of a final order may require the bringing of an action. But I think that with regard to the question now in dispute the supposed distinction between a final and an interlocutory order cannot be maintained. In my opinion, therefore, the order appealed from must be reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not disputed that the power to make a compromise such as was made in this case is within the general authority of counsel. But it is said that here the authority of counsel was expressly limited by the client. I am not myself satisfied that counsel's authority was limited in this case; but, assuming that it was so, it is clear that that limitation of authority was not communicated or known to the other side. The general rule is that a compromise is binding; and that rule can only be departed from on certain definite and recognized grounds. There are grounds on which a compromise can be set aside where counsel has disregarded a limitation which has been put on his authority—e.g., mistake or misunderstanding. But it cannot be set aside except on some substantial ground. I am not able to see on what precise ground it is suggested that this compromise could be set aside. There was no mistake in this case. The limitation was not forgotten. It seems to come to this, that counsel made a compromise which he thought was beneficial to his client, and afterwards he found out that his client objected to it, and then he regretted what he had done. But that does not entitle him to come and ask to have the compromise set aside, if the other side insists on its being carried out. I cannot see that the fact of the order which embodies the compromise being an interlocutory order makes any difference. In order to set aside a compromise, whether it is made on an interlocutory application, and results in an interlocutory order, or whether it is made at the trial and effects a final settlement of an action, some definite and substantial ground must be shown. In my opinion no such ground exists here.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (ON THE RELATION OF THE BROMLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL) AND THE BROMLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. COPELAND. (a.)

Highway—Drain—Power of highway authority to keep open drain—Pipe conveying water from highway on to adjoining land—Proper outlet—Long user—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 67.

The defendant was the owner of land adjoining a highway at a place where the highway had an upward gradient in each direction. At the lowest point of the road there had been for many years a catch-pit, into which the rain-water which fell on the road found its way, and from which it passed through a pipe about six feet long, from whence it flowed, not in any defined channel, over the surface of the defendant's land. The defendant having stopped up the pipe, the rural district council, as the highway authority, brought an action for an injunction to restrain him from continuing the obstruction.

Held, that the pipe was such a drain as was contemplated by section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835, and that after user for many years the court ought to presume that it had been made under the power given by that section; and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction.

Judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (49 W. R. 489, [1901] 2 K. B. 101), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., at the trial of an action without a jury, 49 W. R. 489, [1901] 2 K. B. 101.

The action was brought for an injunction to restrain the defendant from stopping up or obstructing an ancient watercourse.

The plaintiffs, the Bromley Rural District Council, were the highway authority for the parish of West Wickham, in the county of Kent.

About two years prior to the date of the action the defendant had become by purchase the owner of certain land in the parish, adjoining a highway under the jurisdiction of the plaintiff council, and separated from the highway by a bank. At that part of the highway which the defendant's land adjoined there was a rising gradient in each direction, and at the lowest point there had been prior to the year 1868 two catch-pits, one on each side of the highway, connected by a culvert running under the road, the catch-pit on the defendant's side being at the lower level, and from the lower catch-pit there was an old cut or pipe through the aforesaid bank. The rainwater which fell upon the road found its way to the lower catch-pit and thence through the said cut or pipe, from whence it flowed, not in any defined channel, over the surface of the defendant's land.

In the year 1868 the upper catch-pit was enlarged, and the lower catch-pit was replaced by a new one, and the catch-pits were connected by an iron pipe, and from the new lower catch-pit a stone pipe of twelve inches diameter and five six feet in length was put through the bank.

The defendant, who was a builder, having erected some houses and laid out some gardens on his land, blocked up the end of the stone pipe so as to prevent the rainwater from flowing on to his land. The plaintiffs claimed that there was always an ancient watercourse and natural outlet for the rainwater from the highway over the defendant's land.

The plaintiffs' case was—first, that the pipe through the bank was a drain or watercourse within the meaning of section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835, and and that the plaintiff council, as the successors of the surveyor of highways, were entitled by virtue of that section to keep it open; and, secondly, that the public, as occupiers of the highway, had acquired a prescriptive right to have the rainwater from the road discharged through the pipe.

Section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835, provides as follows: "And be it further enacted that the said surveyor . . . shall have power to make, scour, cleanse, and keep open all ditches, gutters, drains, or watercourses, and also to make and lay such trunks, tunnels, plats, or bridges as he shall deem necessary in and through any lands or grounds adjoining or lying near to any highway, upon paying the owner or occupier of such lands or grounds, provided they are not waste or common, for the damages which he shall sustain thereby."

Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., held, first, that the pipe through the bank was not a drain such as was contemplated by section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835—viz., a drain for the conveyance of water to some proper outlet; and, secondly, that the plaintiffs could not base their case on a prescriptive right in the public to an easement, because there was no dominant tenement to which an easement could be attached. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bray, K.C., and Clarke Williams, for the plaintiffs.

Dickens, K.C., and Rashleigh, for the defendant.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs, a local authority, complain that the defendant has stopped up a pipe through which water from a highway was discharged over his land. The Lord Chief Justice has held that the local authority could not rightly complain of the defendant's stopping up the pipe, because it was not a drain in respect of which the local authority could acquire the rights given by section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835. That section gives power to the surveyor of highways to make and keep open all ditches, gutters, drains, or watercourses in and through any lands adjoining any highway on payment of compensation to the landowner. By recent legislation the local authority have taken over the powers and duties of the surveyor of highways. It is proved that this drain—if I may for the moment use the word in a neutral sense—or some other drain for which it was substituted, has existed from a time beyond living memory. When there has been a well-established user like this for many years, the court ought, if possible, to find a legal origin to explain the existing facts. Can a legal origin be found for this user? Under the section the local authority have power to make and keep open such drains as are there mentioned. But it is contended, and the Lord Chief Justice has held, that this is not a drain within the meaning of that section, because it has not got a proper outlet. The road at this point slopes upwards in both directions, and it is therefore necessary that there should be some arrangement for carrying off the water from the surface of the road. There are two catch-pits, one on each side of the road, with a connection between them, and from the lower catch-pit the water is taken by the pipe in question through a hedge or bank and discharged on the defendant's land. That arrangement for carrying off the water, or some equivalent for it, has been in existence from time immemorial. What is there to take the case out of the section? It is compatible with the evidence that there was at one time a ditch on the defendant's land which carried away the water from the point where it entered the land. If so, this contrivance for carrying the water off the road would clearly be a drain within the section. In the circumstances I am of opinion that the user which has been proved may have been perfectly legitimate, and that we ought to presume a legal origin for it. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed. I should add that in my opinion the decision in Croft v. Rickmansworth Highway Board, 39 Ch. D. 272, 37 W. R. Dig. 84, does not apply to this case.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There seem to me to be three alternatives in this case. First, there may have originally been on the defendant's land a natural drain to take the water where it entered his land. In that case the defendant would not be entitled to stop up a pipe put down to assist the natural flow of the water. Secondly, the acts done by the surveyor of highways in 1868 may have been done in pursuance of some legal right outside the rights given by the statute of 1835. If, thirdly, there was no such right outside the statute, the question arises whether a legal origin can be presumed for the right now claimed under the statute. This drain, although it is a short one, seems to me to be an important part of a system of drainage, and I think it ought to be presumed to have been made under the powers given by the statute either with the consent of the owner of the land or on payment of compensation to him. It is said that it has no proper outlet. I do not exactly know what is meant by a proper outlet, but after this lapse of time I think the defendant ought not to be heard to say that there was not a proper outlet when the drain was made. I therefore think the appeal succeeds.

PEPPERELL v. HIRD. (a.)

Practice—Summons for directions—Interlocutory order to dismiss action—R. S. C., ord. 30, rr. 1, 2, 4, 5.

An order may be made in chambers on an application under the summons for directions to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action and as frivolous.

An application so made to strike out a statement of claim is an interlocutory matter within the meaning of ord. 30, r. 5.

Motion.

This was a motion to set aside an order made in chambers to dismiss an action on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts of the case were as follows: A writ was on the 19th of June, 1901, issued by the plaintiff against the defendant Mr. Hird and certain other defendants alleging wrongful dealing on their part with the funds of a settlement.

A summons for directions was taken out by the plaintiff.

A statement of claim, having been directed, was delivered on the 24th of July by the plaintiff claiming the setting aside of certain deeds, replacement of trust funds, an injunction, and other relief.

Hird on application under rule 5 of order 30 obtained an order in chambers staying all proceedings until certain costs ordered to be paid by the plaintiff to him in respect of certain other proceedings similar in their nature to the present had been paid.

On the 5th of December an order was made on the application of another defendant, Mr. Evans, dismissing the action with costs, on the ground that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action and was frivolous, unless the plaintiff delivered an amended statement of claim within fourteen days.

On the 19th of December the plaintiff delivered an amended statement of claim.

Evans's solicitor subsequently served a notice for further directions in the action on the plaintiff to the effect that the amended statement of claim disclosed no cause of action and was frivolous.

On the 9th of January Evans's solicitor applied in chambers to dismiss the plaintiff's action with costs, and an order was made to that effect.

The plaintiff did not appear on the application.

Plaintiff in person.

E. Clayton, for the defendant Evans.—There was jurisdiction to make the order, the order being an interlocutory matter within ord. 30, r. 5: Horton v. Bosson, 80 L. T. Rep. 435, 47 W. R. Dig. 155; Daniel's Chancery Practice (7th ed.), p. 314; Annual Practice, 1902, p. 374.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—There is no doubt at all in my mind that the court has implied jurisdiction to make this order, and the only question is whether it was rightly made under a summons for directions rather than by means of an ordinary summons under ord. 30, r. 4. It is a mere technicality; but if I thought that there was any substance in the plaintiff's case beyond it, I might look at the matter in a different light from that in which I now regard it. The plaintiff is an undischarged bankrupt; he has, prior to this action, taken proceedings against the defendant Hird by originating summons. That summons, which related to some of the matters here referred to, has been dismissed with costs, and an order was made in October last staying all proceedings against the defendant Hird quite independently of the order now in question. In the present case I have been carefully through the amended statement of claim with the assistance of the defendants' counsel, and I am of opinion that there are no merits behind the action. With reference to the plaintiff's other objections, I am of opinion that the notice under rule 5 was duly served, and that the defendants were not in default, nor out of time, for delivering pleadings when the notice was served, and I am of opinion that the application was regularly made and the matter regularly disposed of. I come now to the only question of substance, whether the court has jurisdiction upon an application of this kind to make the order? Had the plaintiff attended before the master in chambers I should have had no doubt at all upon the question, as a matter of this kind might, and probably would, have been taken and dealt with, or the matter might have been adjourned to the judge, because an objection of this kind, if it is taken at all, ought to be taken at the time the matter is heard, and it is too late to take it after the order has been made. As a matter of fact, the plaintiff did not think fit to attend in chambers, and he now moves to discharge the order then made on the ground of irregularity and want of jurisdiction. Rule 2 of order 30 provides that a court or a judge shall so far as practicable make such order as may be just with respect to all interlocutory proceedings and as to the costs thereof, and particularly mentions the following matters—pleading, particulars, admission, discovery, interrogatories, inspection of documents, inspection of real and personal property, commissions, examination of witnesses, place and mode of trial; and rule 5 provides, "Any application subsequently to the original summons for any directions as to any interlocutory matter or thing by any party shall be made under the summons by two clear days' notice to the other party stating the grounds of the application." But for the fact that a regular practice has been established, there might have been considerable difficulty in discovering how far rule 5 was meant to be confined to the special things mentioned in rule 2 which are clearly interlocutory proceedings. In the present case an order has been made under these rules, which in a similar case, Horton v. Bosson, the Court of Appeal held to be an interlocutory order. I do not mean that the particular order made in this case has been held to be interlocutory; but an order of a similar nature. It is true that no reported case has been produced to me in which the exact point has been decided; but I have the statement in the latest book of practice—Daniell's Chancery Practice (7th ed.). On p. 314 it is stated "that it is the practice in both divisions to make almost any order which is not a final judgment. Thus, orders to stay proceedings, orders for accounts and inquiries, foreclosure and sale are so made, and sometimes even orders to dismiss for want of prosecution." And in the Annual Practice, p. 374, it is stated that in both the Chancery and King's Bench Divisions orders to stay and dismiss are made on summons for directions, and in the Chancery Division orders for accounts under order 15 are so made. I have myself made orders under these rules staying all further proceedings on default of the delivery of further and better particulars, or for non-compliance with some other special directions therein given within a fixed time.

Being, as I am, of opinion that there are neither merits nor substance in the plaintiff's case beyond this application, and finding as I do that there is a well-established practice in both divisions, under which orders similar to the present one have been made on an application for further directions under the summons for directions, I hold that the present application fails, and I dismiss the motion with costs.

LORD LURGAN'S CASE. (a.)

Company — Shares — Memorandum of association — Subscription obtained by misrepresentation — Winding up — Contributory — Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 6, 18, 23.

A signatory to a company's memorandum cannot claim rescission of his contract to take shares on the ground that he became a signatory in consequence of misrepresentations made to him by a third party.

L. having subscribed the memorandum of a company on the faith of misrepresentations made to him by S., a promoter of the company, held liable on the shares for which he had subscribed the memorandum, because (1) a company cannot appoint an agent before it comes into existence itself; and (2) L. on registration became bound, not only as between himself and the company, but also as between himself and all future members.

Karberg's case, [1892] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 41, distinguished.

Metal Constituents (Limited) was registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, on the 10th of May, 1901. Lord Lurgan signed the memorandum of association for 250 shares, but upon the secretary applying to him for payment in August, 1901, he denied that he was a shareholder and refused payment on the ground that he was induced to apply for shares as a signatory by misrepresentations of one Sims, a promoter of the company. Immediately afterwards Lord Lurgan took out an originating summons for rectification of the register in respect of these 250 shares, but nothing was done with the summons before the 23rd of October, 1901, on which date the company passed an extraordinary resolution for a voluntary winding up and appointed a liquidator.

Lord Lurgan now applied in the winding up to vary the list of contributories by excluding his name.

A. Houston, for Lord Lurgan.

Eve, K.C., and Manning, for the liquidator.

BUCKLEY, J.—Even assuming that before the company was incorporated Sims made an untrue representation to Lord Lurgan on the faith of which he became a signatory for 250 shares, Lord Lurgan is not entitled to rescission of his contract to take shares. Prior to incorporation there was no company in existence. Sims cannot have been the company's agent, and Lord Lurgan cannot have been induced to become a signatory by the company or its agent. There is no contract in existence down to the moment when the memorandum and articles were taken to Somerset House to be registered; on registration two things occur by virtue of the Companies Act, 1862—first, the company springs into existence; and secondly, the subscribers to the memorandum become by virtue of section 23 of that Act members of the company. In this case the contract came into existence at the same moment as the company and its members, and therefore under the circumstances there can have been no misrepresentation by an agent of the company.

There is the further point raised by Lord Lurgan that he is entitled to rescission of this contract with the company because he entered into it on the faith of misrepresentations of fact made by a third party from which the company has derived a benefit, and he relies on Karberg's case, [1892] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 41, as an authority in his favour. This contention does not seem to me to assist him. Under the scheme of the Act of 1862 the company owes its existence under section 6 to the signatures of seven persons to the memorandum, and by virtue of section 23 on registration a contract is created not merely as between the subscriber to the memorandum and the company, but as between the subscribers and the company on the one hand and all other members on the other. By section 18 on incorporation the subscribers of the memorandum, together with all such other persons as might from time to time become members, became a body corporate. Lord Lurgan's signature to the memorandum made him on registration a member of the company, and he was placed in a contractual relation not only with the company but with every other person who became a member. He cannot, in my opinion, claim rescission on the ground that he entered into a contract with the company in consequence of a misrepresentation.

His lordship added that on the facts also Lord Lurgan's application must fail, and dismissed the summons with costs.

EDELSTEIN v. SCHULER & CO. (a.)

Bond—Bearer bonds—Negotiability by custom—Holders for value—Liability of stockbroker for conversion.

Certain "bearer bonds," consisting partly of bonds of foreign corporations and partly of bonds of an English company, were stolen from the plaintiff by his clerk, who employed M., a provincial stockbroker, to sell them. M. instructed the defendants, who were London stockbrokers, to sell the bonds on the London Stock Exchange. The defendants bonâ fide and without notice of any defect in the vendor's title effected the sale and remitted the proceeds to M. The plaintiff sued the defendants for conversion of the bonds. Evidence was given of a custom to treat the bonds in question as negotiable in the same way as the bonds of foreign governments.

Held, that the bonds were negotiable instruments; that the defendants were holders of them for value, and therefore that the action was not maintainable.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: This was an action in trover to recover the value of certain bearer bonds alleged to have been converted by the defendants to their own use. The bonds in question were those of the De Beers Mining Co., the Denver Railway Co., the Mexican Railway Co., and the Union Pacific Railway Co. All these were bonds of foreign corporations. There were also some bonds of the Bechuanaland Railway Co., which is an English company registered under the Companies Acts. The bonds are in the ordinary form of such securities. It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff, to whom these bonds belonged, kept them in a safe in his office. They were stolen from the safe by one of the plaintiff's clerks. This clerk then from time to time employed a broker named Megson, who traded on the Stock Exchange at Bradford, to sell the bonds. Megson, in the ordinary way of business, sold them through the defendants, who are stockbrokers carrying on their business on the London Stock Exchange. The bonds were sold to jobbers either for cash or for the account, and when sold they were sent to the defendants so that they might hand them to the jobbers in exchange for the price. When the defendants received the money they remitted the amount to Megson, either in cash or in account current, and he in his turn paid the money to the clerk. It was admitted that the defendants had no notice of any infirmity in the vendor's title and that they acted throughout with perfect bona fides. On discovering the theft, the plaintiff brought this action. Neither the thief nor Megson was worth suing, and probably the plaintiff doubted whether he could make out a cause of action against the jobbers; but, whatever the reason, he selected the London brokers as the persons whom he would sue, and I have to determine whether they are liable.

A body of evidence was called at the trial to show that all these bonds pass from hand to hand among the people who deal in them, and that they are treated as negotiable in the same way as the bonds of foreign governments. No serious attempt was made to refute this evidence, and it quite satisfied me that all the bonds in question belong to a class which bankers, stockbrokers, and others whose business it is to deal in such securities treat, rightly or wrongly, as negotiable and as passing from hand to hand by mere delivery. It is in these circumstances that the plaintiff seeks to fix the defendants with liability. He says that, though such bonds may in fact be treated commercially as negotiable, they are not in law negotiable; and he further says that even if lawfully negotiable, yet, as the defendants were never holders of them for value, they are liable in trover, having handled them with the intention of vesting the property and possession in the jobbers who bought them. In support of the first of these two contentions Mr. Danckwerts argued that the attribute of negotiability could not be attached to a contract except by the law merchant; and that these bonds are of such recent creation that their negotiability under that branch of the law cannot be justified. It is no doubt true that negotiability can only be attached to a contract by the law merchant or by a statute; and it is also true that in determining whether a usage has become so well established as to be binding on the courts of law the length of time during which the usage has existed is an important circumstance to take into consideration; but it is to be remembered that in these days usage is established much more quickly than it was in days gone by; more depends on the number of the transactions which help to create it than on the time over which the transactions are spread; and it is probably no exaggeration to say that nowadays there are more business transactions in an hour than there were in a week a century ago. Therefore the comparatively recent origin of this class of securities in my view creates no difficulty in the way of holding that they are negotiable by virtue of the law merchant; they are dealt in as negotiable instruments in every minute of a working day, and to the extent of many thousands of pounds. It is also to be remembered that the law merchant is not fixed and stereotyped; it has not yet been arrested in its growth by being moulded into a code; it is, to use the words of Cockburn, C.J., in Goodwin v. Robarts, 23 W. R. 915, L. R. 10 Ex. 337, at p. 346, capable of being expanded and enlarged so as to meet the wants and requirements of trade in the varying circumstances of commerce, the effect of which is that it approves and adopts from time to time those usages of merchants which are found necessary for the convenience of of trade; our common law, of which the law merchant is but a branch, has in the hands of the judges the same facility for adapting itself to the changing needs of the general public; principles do not alter, but old rules of applying them change, and new rules spring into existence. Thus it has been found convenient to treat securities like those in question in this action as negotiable, and the courts of law recognizing the wisdom of usage have incorporated it in what is called the law merchant, and have made it part of the common law of the country. In my opinion the time has passed when the negotiability of bearer bonds, whether Government bonds or trading bonds, foreign or English, can be called in question in our courts. The existence of the usage has been so often proved and its convenience is so obvious that it must be taken now to be part of the law; the very expression "bearer bond" connotes the idea of negotiability, so that the moment such bonds are issued to the public they rank themselves among the class of negotiable securities. It would be a great misfortune if it were otherwise, for it is well known that such bonds are treated in all foreign markets as deliverable from hand to hand; the attribute not only enhances their value by making them easy of transfer, but it qualifies them to serve as a kind of international currency; and it would be very odd and a great injury to our trade if these advantages were not accorded to them in this country. But I am not to be guided alone by evidence and by questions of expediency. The point is entirely covered by authority. The arguments in support of the contention that these bonds are not negotiable were all adduced before and carefully examined by Kennedy, J., in the case of The Bechuanaland Exploration Co. v. London Trading Bank, [1898] 2 Q. B. 658, 47 W. R. Dig. 27, and were dismissed by him as unsound. I have read the judgment in that case, and I desire to say that I entirely agree with the conclusion and with the reasons which leads up to them. I go, perhaps, further than Kennedy, J., intended to go, for I think that it is no longer necessary to tender evidence in support of the fact that such bonds are negotiable, and that the courts of law ought to take judicial notice of it.

The negotiability of the bonds being established, it is clear that the jobbers who bought them, having given value and having acquired them without any notice of infirmity in the vendor's title, could not be sued in trover by the plaintiff. But can the defendants, the brokers who assisted in perfecting the good title acquired by the jobbers, be sued? It is said they can. A broker who merely negotiates the sale of chattels without the authority of the true owner commits no tort at all. The sale is a mere void act. It divests the true owner of no right, and it does not physically interfere with his control or possession of the goods. But if in addition to negotiating a sale the broker meddles with the goods themselves and hands them to the buyer with the object and intention of transferring to the buyer the property and possession in pursuance of the unauthorized sale, then he makes himself liable in trover to the true owner, for he is guilty of an act in relation to the goods themselves which is inconsistent with the rights of the true owner. It is argued that the defendants by what they did in handing the bonds to the jobbers have brought themselves within this rule of law. But, in my opinion, before the defendants had possession of the bonds at all or physically dealt with them in any way they had become entitled to them for a valuable consideration just as effectually as the jobbers subsequently became entitled to them by paying the purchase price. When in the ordinary course of business the defendants negotiated the sale of the bonds to the jobbers they came under a personal liability to the jobbers to deliver them. This liability they undertook at the request of the Megson, who was acting for the thief, and in consideration of their undertaking the liability, Megson or the thief promised that he would deliver to them the bonds; these circumstances, in my view, made the defendants holders for value, and, as the bonds were negotiable, gave them power to deal with the bonds.

Or it may be put in another way. Megson in the ordinary course of business would look to the defendants (so long as they were solvent), and not to the jobbers for the price of the bonds; it is the defendants whom he would treat as the buyers, and to whom he would look, and, in fact, did look, for his money; this is the way in which the transactions would be carried through, and although this course of business does not make the defendants the buyers of the bonds, it makes them, in my opinion, holders for value as soon as they get possession of them and hand over the money in exchange for them. I think for these reasons that the defendants became as much holders of the bonds for value as the jobbers, and that they are entitled to the same protection.

But even if they were not holders for value, I doubt whether they could be sued in trover, or sued at all. There appears to me to be an essential difference between meddling with goods with the intention of transferring a title which will be bad as against the true owner and the case of assisting in perfecting a title which will be good as against the true owner. It would be very odd that an action should lie against the broker for assisting the jobber to get his title when no action lies against the jobber who gets the title; and to so hold would go far to destroy the advantages of the negotiability of the bonds. It is not, however, necessary for me to decide this point. It is sufficient for me to say that, in my opinion, these bonds were negotiable instruments, and that the defendants were holders of them for value.

Alfred William Lightbody, the plaintiff as attorney for Rachel Ann West, of Santa Fé, Argentina, claimed letters of administration to the estate of Benjamin West, whose widow Rachel Ann West alleged she was. The deceased was the eldest son of George Thomas West, of Wilby, Northamptonshire, and was born on the 25th of May, 1853, and died on the 19th of September, 1890, at Alexandra Colony, Santa Fé.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants were the brother and sister and next-of-kin of the deceased, and they alleged that the deceased died a bachelor without parents, and intestate. They alleged that the marriage between Benjamin West and Rachel Ann West was not a valid marriage.

In reply to this, the plaintiff alleged that in July, 1897, the Court of First Instance, Civil and Commercial, of the Second Nomination of Santa Fé, had declared that the deceased's only and universal heirs were his surviving widow and his legitimate and only son Benjamin West the younger. To this the defendants rejoined that Benjamin West the elder was never domiciled in the Argentine Republic, and that according to Argentine law the ceremony of the marriage of persons marrying in Argentina, if those persons were not Roman Catholics, must be celebrated in accordance with the rites of the church to which the parties belonged, and that inasmuch as Benjamin West was a member of the Anglican Church and the pretended marriage was celebrated in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Rosario de Santa Fé, and not in the presence of an ordained minister of the Church of England, the marriage was therefore not celebrated according to the rights of the Church of England, which was the church to which the parties belonged, and the defendants therefore claimed a grant of administration.

It appeared from the evidence that about 1879 Benjamin West left this country for Argentina, being sent abroad by his father, who in his will dated the 16th of August, 1879, left him £100 "so long as he remained out of England."

On his father's death Benjamin West returned to this country to see after his father's affairs and arrived back again in the Argentine Republic in January, 1883, where he remained until his death.

On the voyage out from this country Benjamin West fell in with a Mr. Fergusson and his wife, who were lay missionaries working near Rosario, and in 1884 Benjamin West having met Rachel Ann West, a widow, requested Fergusson to marry them. At that time, however, Fergusson was not ordained, and there being no such thing as civil marriage then recognized, the parties lived together as man and wife until on the 14th of April, 1885, their marriage was celebrated by a Mr. Joseph Woods, who was a Methodist Episcopal minister.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and A. B. Cane, for the plaintiff, contended that the marriage was valid according to the law of the Argentine Republic.

They cited the code published in 1889 by the Argentine Republic, and 1894 Blue Book, Part II., Arts. 96, 101, 167, 181, 183.

Inderwick, K.C., and Dudley Grazebrook, for the defendants.—The deceased, being a member of the Church of England, ought to have been married by a member of the Church of England. The question of domicil was immaterial on the question of the validity of the marriage.

They cited the case of Reg. v. Millis, 10 Cl. v. Fin. 534; and Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. Cas. 274, 3 W. R. H. L. Dig. 3.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said: This is an action brought by Mrs. Rachel Ann West, on behalf of herself and her sons, to obtain administration of the estate of her alleged husband, Benjamin West, who died in Argentina in 1890. The main question in the case is whether the marriage celebrated on the 14th of April, 1885, between the plaintiff and Benjamin West in the Alexandra colony, Santa Fé, was a valid marriage, as having been solemnized according to a form sanctioned by Argentine law. The validity of this marriage does not depend on the domicil of the parties; but, as certain other questions do depend on that fact, I think it well in the first instance to deal with it. Mr. Benjamin West's domicil of origin was clearly English, as his family lived in Northamptonshire. He went to Argentina during his father's lifetime. It was suggested that this happened in consequence of some misconduct on Mr. Benjamin West's part, and there was ground for such a supposition in the fact that the allowance bequeathed to him by his father was to continue only as long as he remained abroad. The evidence, however, of his sister negatived this supposition, and it is not material, as I do not think that the visit to Argentina in 1879 effected any change of domicil. But Mr. West's father died in September, 1879; he then came to this country, probably to see after the distribution of his father's property. In 1882 he returned to Argentina, reaching that country in January, 1883. From that time to his death he lived in Alexandra colony. He seems to have taken out a mill, to have purchased land and established himself in a ranch, which he stocked with cattle, and on which he built a house. In 1884 he made the acquaintance of the plaintiff, and, after no doubt living with her, married her as above-mentioned in 1885. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that after 1882 he did effect a change of domicil. His acquisition of land and building a house point in this direction, and evidence has been given that he expressed his preference for a life in Argentina to one in England. His marriage, I think, confirms this view, though from its circumstances it is not perhaps so weighty an incident as marriage often is in questions of this nature. It was strongly pressed on me that he kept certain funds in England, and had them sent to Argentina only when he needed them for a special purpose. But I do not from this fact draw the inference of an intended return to this country. Having regard to the unsettled condition of the Alexandra colony at that time—we hear of raids by Indians—and the political vicissitudes of South American States, I think that keeping some funds in safety in this country quite as consistent with an intention to remain in Argentina, as to return to England. One fact, however, has great weight with me. Mr. West appears to have carried on a constant correspondence with his sister in England, and it is clear that in that correspondence he never on any single occasion referred to any intention to return. It seems to me impossible to suppose that a man who retained any intention of returning home should not in a long and intimate correspondence with a sister in England ever refer to the probability of his coming home or of his seeing her again. Mr. West appears not to have mentioned his marriage to any of his relatives in England. This is remarkable; but it appears to me to point rather to his intention not to return with her to this country than to an intention to bring her home and introduce her to his family. The strongest facts in the defendants' favour on this question of domicil were, I think, that in 1882 before Mr. B. West left England he gave written directions relating to the collection of certain dividends, in which he spoke of himself "as I am going abroad for a time"; that he expressed to his sister an intention to return, and also that he caused himself about the same time to be put on the register of Parliamentary voters for Northamptonshire. I do not think, however, that any of these facts point very strongly to an intention to return to England on Mr.

West's part; but they do seem to indicate that his mind was not fully made up. But they are quite consistent with a conclusion in which all the facts seem to me to agree, that when he got out to Argentina in 1883 a half-formed intention to remain then hardened into a final decision.

I now come to the main question. Was the marriage of the 14th of April, 1885, a valid marriage? Mr. West was a member of the Church of England, the plaintiff was an Episcopalian Methodist. Mr. West appears to have made several unsuccessful attempts to get the marriage properly performed. He asked a friend, Mr. Fergusson, who gave evidence before me, to marry them. Mr. Fergusson was lay reader and was preparing for ordination, but was not yet a clergyman, and he accordingly refused. He then requested the civil judge to perform the ceremony, but at that time civil marriage had not been rendered legal in Argentina. Eventually Mr. Wood, an Episcopal Methodist minister, came to the Alexandra colony, and he performed the ceremony of marriage according to rites identical with those of the Church of England; and a marriage act was drawn up in which both parties are described as Protestants, signed by them and by Mr. Wood, and by Mr. and Mrs. Fergusson as witnesses. A record of the marriage was also made in a book kept by Mr. Wood. The son was born in September, 1885. The question thus arises, was a marriage between a member of the Church of England and an Episcopalian Methodist good according to the law of Argentina if celebrated by an Episcopalian Methodist minister? I have to determine this question as a question of fact primarily depending on evidence of Argentine lawyers, reference being also had to the language of the Argentine Code and to some other facts which go to show what the Argentine law at that time was. Several articles of the code deal with the question of forms according to which marriages can be legally solemnized. By article 167 of the code in force in 1885 marriage between Roman Catholics (the code, of course, always speaks of "Catholics") must be solemnized in accordance with the canons and solemnities prescribed by the Roman Catholic Church. By article 180, marriages between a Roman Catholic and a Christian not a Roman Catholic, sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Church, are to be solemnized in accordance with the practice existing in the church of the communions of which the party not a Roman Catholic may belong, it being added by article 181 that marriage solemnized by dissenting (that is to say, non-Roman Catholic) ministers is null, when one of the parties is a Roman Catholic, unless it be immediately solemnized by the Roman Catholic parish priest. Then comes article 183 in these terms: "Marriage solemnized without the sanction of the (Roman) Catholic Church is that contracted between Christians not Catholic, or between persons who do not profess Christianity. It produces in the Republic all the civil effects of a valid marriage if solemnized in accordance with the laws of this code, and in accordance with the laws and rites of the church to which the contracting parties belong." The reference to "the law of this code," is, I think, to article 179, which requires marriage to be proved by the inscription in the registers of the parish, or of the communions to which the parties belong. I have already said that a record was made in the book of the Episcopalian Methodist Church. But the question is whether a marriage by an Episcopalian Methodist minister was in accordance with the laws and rites of the church to which Mr. and Mrs. West belonged. I had before me the evidence of Argentine lawyers on both sides. For the plaintiff, Dr. Agode, a doctor of laws in the Argentine Republic, who had practised there for twelve years, informed me that in his opinion if both parties were Catholics, article 167 required one Roman Catholic ceremony, if one only was a Roman Catholic, article 181 required two ceremonies; but that article 183 did not prescribe two ceremonies as necessary, and would have done so if two had been necessary. His view, clearly, is that the code recognized only Roman Catholic and non-Roman Catholic religious communities, and did not discriminate between the various churches of non-Roman Catholics. His evidence was supported by that of Mr. Mallet, who, as I gather, practised rather as a solicitor than what we should understand as a barrister in Argentina, but who certainly received a legal education and passed legal examinations, and carried on important legal business. He said that he had taken many legal opinions about such marriages as the one in this case, and that in his opinion they were clearly valid, the ground being that the Argentine law makes no distinction between non-Catholic sects. In addition to this evidence it was proved before me that, though marriages like the present had often been solemnized, and in one instance at least under circumstances of great publicity, such marriages had never been questioned and certainly had never been declared illegal by any court of law. The circumstances of the present case are also not without significance in this connection. The plaintiffs appear to have obtained by application to the Argentine court a decree recognizing their right of succession. It is true that the defendants had no legal notice of this and were not represented. I do not say, therefore, that they are bound by this decision. But it is at least remarkable that Mr. George West, one of the defendants, afterwards went out to Argentina, and, though he endeavoured to intervene in this suit by a method clearly destined to fail, as it did, never took the legal step which I am assured might have been taken to get the marriage declared invalid. I much regret that the matter was not properly brought before the Argentine court and decided by them. But what I am at the moment concerned to observe is that Mr. George West's omission to take proper proceedings, after, no doubt, obtaining the best advice in Argentina, points to the inference that the advice he received supported the validity of the marriage, an inference which Mr. George West, though present in court, and though challenged to give evidence, did not go into the witness-box to refute. It was shown also that an eminent Argentine lawyer was consulted by the defendants in this country, but he was not called to give evidence before me. I may add that the defendants also by the conduct of their defence prevented a commission going to Argentina to take the evidence of lawyers in that country. If such commission had gone the case would probably have been made quite clear. The defendants, however, called one gentleman as an expert in Argentine law. He was a M. Daveaux, an Argentine barrister of twenty-three years' standing, but who, as I understand, had in recent years resided and practised as a French advocate in Paris. His view was that, according to article 183, if the parties belonged to different non-Roman Catholic Churches, there must be two ceremonies—one according to the law of each such church. This gentleman evidently based his view on the construction he placed on the language of article 183; but he did not say that any decision of the Argentine court supported his view, nor in a work published by himself on Argentine law did he state any such proposition as he advanced before me. On the whole I come to the conclusion that the view of Argentine law advanced by the plaintiffs is that which I ought to accept. The code, article 183, is no doubt ambiguous on the subject. I do not feel pressed by the argument very strongly urged before me that the view of the plaintiffs would lead to the conclusion that the marriage of persons belonging to two sects of infidels by a minister of one such sect—for example, a marriage by a Jew Rabbi of a Jew and a Mussulman—would be legal. If the parties to such a marriage were willing so to be married, and the minister of one such sect was willing to marry them, it does not seem to me at all unreasonable or unlikely that the law of a Roman Catholic country such as Argentina would recognize a marriage according to rites in which both parties to the marriage were willing to participate. It might have been said in such a case, and indeed in the present case, that if both parties treated the rites as those of the law of the church to which they belonged the Argentine law would not concern itself to nullify their act by discriminating between the laws of their respective churches. But I do not desire to deal with the case as if I had to construe article 183. I need only say that, as the expert evidence of the plaintiff and the defendants differs, I prefer that of the plaintiff as being the more probable, and as being supported by the strong fact that, though marriages like the present have been common and notorious, the Argentine courts have never decided them to be invalid, though questions of property must often have depended on their validity. At the close of the argument before me, and therefore at a time when it could not be fully discussed, there was raised before me a point which, were it not that I am able to decide this case upon the grounds which I have just stated, I should have considered worthy of most careful consideration. The 183rd article of the Argentine Code refers to "the laws and rites of the church to which the contracting parties belong." If, therefore, this was a good marriage, under its circumstances, according to the laws and rites of the Church of England, it would be a valid marriage according to Argentine law. I am, of course, in this court bound by the decision of Reg. v. Millis, in which case it was held that a marriage in 1829 in Ireland by a Presbyterian minister between a man belonging to the Established Church of Ireland and a woman who was a Presbyterian was invalid on the ground that by the common law the presence, before the Reformation, of a priest, or since the Reformation of a priest or deacon, was essential. It was suggested in argument before me that, although this must be taken to be the common or municipal law, it is clear that by the common and civil law of Western Europe a marriage per verba de præsenti was valid without the presence of a minister of religion, and that, therefore, such a marriage might be considered valid according to the laws and rites of the Church of England, although the municipal law superadded the presence of a minister as a witness; and the judgments in the case of Beamish v. Beamish, were referred to as supporting this proposition and showing that the presence of a witness in the person of a minister was due to a requirement of the state and not of the church. I do not think it necessary to enter into the difficult question thus raised. I would only say that, as far as I am concerned, it must be considered open; and I would add that it is, further, highly doubtful whether the decision in Reg. v. Millis applies where, as in the present case, the presence of an ordained minister of the Church of England cannot be procured: see on this point the language of Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Millis, 10 Cl. & Fin., at p. 786, and that of Willes, J., in Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. Cas. 274, at p. 332, and the cases there referred to, and of Lord Cranworth at p. 353. There are also several other articles of the Argentine Code which, if the domicil of Mr. B. West was, as I have held, in Argentina, would be of importance, even if the marriage was invalid under article 183. By article 224 it is provided that a marriage cannot be annulled except in the life of both spouses; and, though the present proceeding before me is not in terms, it is in substance a proceeding to get the marriage in question annulled. By article 230 it is provided that, if a marriage be contracted in good faith on the part of both spouses, it has, till annulled, all the effects of a valid marriage; but on this article a question may arise having regard to article 233 as to what the Argentine law considers to be the necessary conditions of good faith in such a matter. Finally, it is provided by article 3,577 that, if a man dies leaving no legitimate representatives in an ascending or descending line, and no widow, his illegitimate children take his property—a provision which will apply in the present case if the marriage in question was invalid and the domicil of Mr. West in Argentina. I do not, however, think it necessary to go further into any of these questions. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND OTHERS. (a.)

*Local Government—London County Council—Authority created by statute—Statutory powers—Tramways—Ancillary business—Ultra vires—Attorney-General—Local Government Act,* 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 2. 68, and 79.

The London County Council, being a statutory body only, has no powers other than those conferred by statute. Therefore, where it has the power of acquiring and working tramways, it is not entitled to run a service of omnibuses in connection therewith.

The powers and duties of the Attorney-General observed upon.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1901] 1 Ch. 781, 49 W. R. Dig. 97) affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (reported [1901] 1 Ch. 781, 49 W. R. Dig. 97).

The appellants, the London County Council, had acquired under statutory powers a number of tramways within the County of London and in connection with them had been running omnibuses.

The respondents, the plaintiffs in the action, were the Attorney-General at the relation of a number of proprietors of London omnibuses, and the proprietors, who were also ratepayers.

They claimed a declaration that the London County Council were not entitled to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors within the county, and an injunction against their doing so.

Section 2 of the London County Tramways Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. li.), is as follows: "It shall be lawful for the council to exercise with respect to any tramways authorized by the local Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act which have been or shall be purchased or acquired by them under their statutory powers the same powers of working such tramways respectively as were possessed by the company or companies respectively owning such tramways, and the council may provide, place, and run carriages thereon and provide such horses, cars, fixed and movable plant, harness, and apparatus as may be requisite or convenient for enabling the council to exercise such powers, and they may employ such persons as may be requisite or convenient for working the tramways for the time being worked by them; and the several provisions relating to the working of the tramways and the taking of tolls, rates and charges therefor contained in any Act relating to any such tramway shall extend and apply mutatis mutandis to and in relation to such tramway for the time being worked by the council and to the council instead of to the company."

The Court of Appeal held that the council's powers were limited to the terms of the statute.

Asquith, K.C., Macnaghten, K.C., and Blaiklock, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—It appears to me that, as far as any question of general law is involved in this case, the whole ambit of the considerations that arise has been completely traversed by the two cases of Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, L. R. 7 H. L. 653, and Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway, 27 W. R. 759, 11 Ch. D. 449, at p. 483, and I do not think that much would be gained by going through each individual topic of it, because I think it cannot now be doubted that those two cases, if we look at them, do constitute the law upon this subject. It is impossible to go behind those two cases; they are now part of the law of this country, and we must acquiesce in them, whether we like it or not.

So far as the particular questions before us here are concerned, depending as they do upon the statute itself, with the utmost respect for the learned counsel I think the contentions hardly admit of plausible statement. The power which is expressly given to the London County Council excludes from them, and to my mind is intended to exclude from them, that which did exist as a separate business under the earlier statute, and which was not intended, obviously, to be conferred upon the London County Council. It appears to me to be, as I say, hardly susceptible of plausible statement to suggest that those words can possibly include this separate business. The only argument which, as it appears to me, is capable of plausible statement in the matter is the argument derived from the somewhat clumsy phrase used in the statute with reference to their being in the same position as the council of a borough divided into wards. At first sight that looks as if they were intended to be identified in all particulars; but when one looks at the context of that section and sees what it refers to, I think it is manifest, to use Vaughan Williams, L.J's, expression, that it is a section for the machinery governing and arranging the powers and the order of their exercise inside the corporation, when you have got the corporation, but not in the smallest degree intended to enlarge the original objects of it, or to give them any power other than those previously conferred upon them by statute. That seems to me to dispose of that point, which was, to my mind, the only thing that caused me to consider whether this question was capable of plausible argument or not.

One question has been raised, though I think not raised here—it appears to have emerged in the court below—which I confess I do not understand. I mean the suggestion that the courts have any power over the jurisdiction of the Attorney-General when he is suing on behalf of a relator in a matter in which he is the only person who has to decide those questions. It may well be that it is true that the Attorney-General ought not to put into operation the whole machinery of the first law officer of the Crown in order to bring into court some trifling matter. But if he did, it would not go to his jurisdiction; it would go, I think, to the conduct of his office, and it might be made, perhaps in Parliament, the subject of adverse comment; but what right has a court of law to intervene? If there is excess of power claimed by a particular public body, and it is a matter that concerns the public, it seems to me that it is for the Attorney-General, and not for the courts, to determine whether he ought to initiate litigation in that respect or not. Considering the profound respect with which I regard all the observations made by the late James, L.J., I cannot help thinking that he did not himself suppose that he was laying down any absolute rule of law in Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway. I think he was only giving, in response to the Attorney-General himself, some sort of pious opinion as to the mode in which the discretion of the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General alone, should be exercised in a case in which he thought it his duty to intervene. In a case where as a part of his public duty he has a right to intervene, that which the courts can decide is whether there is the excess of power which he, the Attorney-General, alleges. Those are the functions of the court; but the initiation of the litigation, and the determination of the question whether it is a proper case for the Attorney-General to proceed in, is a matter entirely beyond the jurisdiction of this or any other court. It is a question which the law of this country has made to reside exclusively in the Attorney-General. I make this observation upon it, though the thing has not been urged here at all, because it seems to me to be very undesirable to throw any doubt upon the jurisdiction, or the independent exercise of it, by the first law officer of the Crown.

I do not think it necessary to go through this case, because the very elaborate and careful judgments delivered both by Cozens-Hardy, J., and the three learned Lord Justices in the Court of Appeal appear to me to exhaust the whole question; and, as I have said before, I think in a great measure the whole question has been already determined by the two cases which have been referred to. Under those circumstances I think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I must say it seems to me to be a very clear case. The London County Council are carrying on two businesses—the business of a tramway company and the business of omnibus proprietors. For the one they have the express authority of Parliament; for the other, so far as I can see, they have no authority at all. It is quite true that the two businesses can be worked conveniently together; they may be worked into each other, and, no doubt, that is an advantageous mode of working them; but the one is not incidental to the other. The business of an omnibus proprietor is no more incidental to the business of a tramway company than the business of a line of steamers in connection with it is incidental to the undertaking of a railway company which has its business at a seaport.

I think it is a perfectly clear case. The only thing further I should like to say is that I regret most sincerely that the rates and the money of the public should have been spent in defending up to the last tribunal a case as plain as this.

As regards the argument that the county council have all the powers of a common law corporation, I think that is disposed of at once if you look to the Act of Parliament, because the sentence on which the learned counsel for the appellant relies is contained in the first chapter as to the constitution of the council, and there is a separate chapter which deals entirely with the powers of the county council, and in that chapter I can find nothing to warrant the contention of the appellants.

With regard to the position and duties of the Attorney-General, I only want to say that I entirely concur with what has fallen from the Lord Chancellor. I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord BRAMPTON.—After hearing the judgments of Cozens-Hardy, J., and of the Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal, I can entertain no doubt at all that this appeal cannot be maintained. I therefore concur in the motion that the appeal be dismissed.

KAYE v. KAYE. (a.)

Divorce — Wife's petition — Variation of settlement — Settled property wholly brought in by husband — Extinction of husband's life interest — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 5.

After a divorce on the wife's petition the court extinguished the husband's life interest in the property included in the marriage settlement, the income of which amounted to £45 a year, and the whole of which had been brought into settlement by him. There was one child of the marriage, who had not attained a vested interest.

Held, that this was a proper exercise of the discretion of the court in the interests of the wife and child.

This was an appeal from an order of Barnes, J., ordering a variation of the settlement made on the marriage of Captain and Mrs. Kaye in 1887.

The whole of the settled property (the income of which amounted to £45 per annum) was brought into settlement by the husband.

Under the provisions of the settlement the first life interest in the whole fund was given to the husband, who was an officer in the Indian Army.

The wife was given a life interest on his death, and on the death of the survivor the fund was settled on the children or remoter issue of the marriage, as the husband and wife or the survivor should appoint.

In default of appointment the fund was settled on the children at twenty-one or marriage.

In default of any issue of the marriage attaining a vested interest there was an ultimate trust in favour of the husband.

There was one child of the marriage, a girl, born in August, 1891.

Early in 1900 the wife petitioned for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty and adultery, and a decree nisi was granted by the President on the 24th of April, 1900, the decree absolute being pronounced on the 5th of November, 1900.

On the 26th of November, 1900, the wife filed her petition for maintenance, and on the 17th of December she filed her petition for variation of the marriage settlement by the extinction of all the powers and interest of the husband in the trust fund as if he were already dead, save and except the ultimate trust for him.

The husband, being in India, was allowed by the registrar four months in which to put in his answer to the petitions, and from this order the wife appealed to the President in chambers, who gave her leave to accept unsworn answers or in the alternative confirmed the allowance of four months. The wife elected to accept unsworn answers, which were accordingly filed, and after hearing the petitions the registrar reported that the wife ought to receive £100 per annum for the maintenance of herself and the child of the marriage, made up as to £45 by the income of the settled fund, the remaining £55 to be paid by the husband.

On the 8th of August, 1901, Barnes, J., confirmed the registrar's report and ordered the life interest of the husband in the settled fund to be extinguished.

The husband appealed.

It appeared that he owed debts and was in arrears with his contributions to the Indian Army Pension Fund, which he had been allowed to make up by monthly payments.

Micklem, K.C., and Gordon Dill, for the appellant. —No other case can be found in which a husband's interest in a fund wholly contributed by himself has been extinguished. No doubt the court has jurisdiction to do this; but in every other case where his interest has been extinguished it has been in the wife's fund. Justice would be done by giving the husband a life interest on the death of the wife, which would effect all that is necessary in her interest. As to the child, she will have a right to demand maintenance from her father if she is under age on the wife's death. As the order stands, when she attains twenty-one she and her mother can dispose of the fund though it was entirely the husband's. This cannot be right

They referred to March v. March, 15 W. R. 799, L. R. 1 P. & D. 440, and Wigney v. Wigney, 30 W. R. 722, 7 P. D. 177.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and Barnard, for the wife. —In view of the husband's circumstances, the child, if her mother dies while she is under age, may have to compete for her maintenance with creditors. Barnes, J., has exercised his discretion for the benefit of both wife and child in the only way possible in the circumstances of the case. The reason why no similar reported case can be found is that in most cases property is brought into settlement on both sides. In any case an order for maintenance would end when the child attained twenty-one.

They referred to Thomas v. Thomas, 8 W. R. 504, 2 Sw. & Tr. 89.

Micklem, in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think this order was not only legitimate, but the best one possible for the wife and child. The husband was the guilty party, court had to consider the child as well as the wife. The jurisdiction of the court is not disputed, and as to the suggestion that the husband should have been given a life interest before the child's interest took effect, I think this was a result which the court was bound to guard against. The child would have had to seek her maintenance from the Chancery Division, in competition possibly with creditors, while this order gives it to her direct. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

In re ALDAM'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Mining lease—Varying minimum rent—Way-leave—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 6, 7, 9, 53.

The object of the Settled Land Acts is to remove restrictions in dealing with settled land, and though the interests of the remaindermen are to be considered, a possible disadvantage to the remaindermen ought not to be allowed to put a stop to the development of the estate. There is nothing in the Settled Land Acts which makes it necessary that the minimum rent reserved in a mining lease should be uniform or that it should be reserved from the commencement of the term, consequently a mining lease may be granted reserving a minimum rent which does not commence in the first year of the term, and which gradually increases year by year.

A mining lease may also contain a grant of a way-leave, for which no separate rent is reserved, and which is to continue after the rent has ceased on the working out of the coal.

Decision of Byrne, J. (reported ante, p. 199), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported ante, p. 199).

The facts were as follows: William Aldam, by his will, dated the 18th of December, 1884, devised his real estate to the use of his son, William Wright Warde Aldam, for life, with remainder to the use of such one or more of the sons or daughters of William W. W. Aldam, for such estates in tail or any lesser estates as William W. W. Aldam should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of the testator's grandson, William St. Auden Warde Aldam, the son of William W. W. Aldam, for life, with remainders over. And the testator declared that every estate for life under the limitations aforesaid should be without impeachment of waste, and also that under a mining lease, whether the mines or minerals leased were already opened or in work or not, there should be from time to time set aside as capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882, two third parts of the rent, and the residue of the rent should go as rents and profit.

The testator died on the 27th of July, 1890.

William W. W. Aldam is the present tenant for life in possession under the testator's will. His son, the tenant for life in remainder, is an infant. William W. Warde Aldam entered into an agreement dated the 13th of February, 1900, with the Dalton Main Collieries (Limited), whereby he agreed, as the tenant for life under the settlement created by his father's will, to lease the Barnsley thick seam of coal under the settled estate for a term of sixty years from the 1st of January, 1898.

The material clauses of the agreement were as follows:

"(3) The royalty or acreage rent shall be at the rate of thirty pounds per foot per acre, but due allowances shall be made for bad, faulty, or unworkable coal or coal so thin or so cut off by faults of such magnitude that it cannot be worked without loss. The lessees shall also pay a similar royalty rent for all coal and slack other than the Barnsley thick seam got in the drifting and sold off. (4) The minimum or certain rent is to be for the first year nil; for the second year 2s. 6d. per acre; for the third year 5s. per acre; for the fourth year 10s. per acre; and for the fifth and each succeeding year £1 per acre. The minimum rent shall begin to be paid as from the 1st of January, 1899. (6) Undergettings may be made up at at any time during the term. (7) When all saleable coal except such parts (if any) as are not to be worked or paid for shall have been worked or paid for, a nominal rent of 10s. shall be paid for the remainder of the term in substitution for the royalty and minimum rents (9) No way-leave rent is to be paid for any other part of the Barnsley thick seam of coal under any other land in the parish of Wickersley. (13) The lessees are to commence working the coal with all reasonable speed and to work the seam during the lease with all reasonable diligence and bring to the surface as much coal as can reasonably be got with proper diligence."

The property the subject of the agreement consisted of a large number of detached pieces of land intermixed with the lands of other owners, and could only be profitably worked from a pit situated like that of the lessees on property not forming part of the settled estate.

In consequence of doubt raised by the trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, a summons was taken out by W. W. Warde Aldam for the determination of the following questions: (1) Whether a yearly minimum rent not commencing until the second year of the said term and increasing year by year until the fifth year of the said term could be legally reserved; (2) whether a lease could be granted containing a proviso for the cesser of the said minimum rent after all the demised minerals had been worked and paid for; (3) whether a way-leave for foreign coal could be reserved free of rent.

On this summons Byrne, J., made an order declaring:

(1) That the applicant as such tenant for life as aforesaid has no power to grant a lease as aforesaid reserving a minimum yearly rent not commencing until the second year of the said term, and increasing year by year until the fifth year of the said term as proposed.

(2) Assuming there is no other objection to the proposed lease, the applicant has power to insert in such lease a proviso for the cesser of the minimum rent when all the coal demised by the lease, except such parts thereof, if any, as in accordance with the provisions of lease are not to be worked or paid for, shall have been worked or paid for under the terms of the lease, and a proviso permitting undergettings to be made up notwithstanding the determination of the term, but so that the term shall determine at the period of the cesser of the minimum rent.

(3) That if the way-leave for foreign coal continues after the cesser of the minimum rent a substantial and proper rent must be paid for such way-leave after such cesser.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From this order the applicant, W. W. Warde Aldam, appealed.

By section 2, sub-section 10 (11), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, "Rent includes yearly or other rent, a toll, duty, royalty, or other reservation by the acre, or the ton, or otherwise."

By section 6 "a tenant for life may lease the settled land, or any part thereof, or any easement, right, or privilege of any kind, over or in relation to the same, for any purpose whatever, whether involving waste or not, for any term not exceeding . . . in case of a mining lease, 60 years"; by section 7, sub-section 2: "Every lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to any fine taken, and to any money laid out or to be laid out for the benefit of the settled land, and generally to the circumstances of the case."

By section 8 (2) in the case of building leases: "A peppercorn or a nominal or other rent less than the rent ultimately payable may be made payable for the first five years or any less part of the term."

By section 9, in a mining lease (1) "the rent may be made to be ascertainable (inter alia) by or to vary according to the acreage worked"; (2) "a fixed or minimum rent may be made payable."

By section 17 (1): "A sale, exchange, partition, or mining lease may be made either of land, with or without an exception or reservation of all or any of the mines or minerals therein, or of any mines or minerals, and in any such case with or without a grant or reservation of powers of working, way-leaves or rights of way, rights of water and drainage, and other powers, easements, rights, and privileges for and incident to or connected with mining purposes in relation to the settled land, or any part thereof, or any other land."

By section 53: "A tenant for life shall, in exercising any power under this Act, have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties."

Neville, K.C., and Dixon, for the appellant.—The learned judge was influenced by the fact that under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, there is a provision for the reservation of the best rent that can be reasonably obtained, to be made payable half yearly or oftener without stating any fine or other benefit in the nature of a fine, "provided always that" in the case of (amongst others) a mining lease "a peppercorn rent or any smaller rent than the rent to be ultimately payable may, if the court shall think fit so to direct, be made payable during all or any part of the term of the lease," while the Settled Land Acts contain no such provision as to mining leases. But in the Settled Estates Act building and mining leases are dealt with together, and it is with reference to building leases that the power to reserve a peppercorn rent is peculiarly appropriate. In any case the Settled Estates Act is not a guide to the interpretation of the Settled Land Acts. The latter Acts were framed for different objects and were intended to enable the settled land to be dealt with more freely. To restrict them by a comparison with the Settled Estates Act would be contrary to the intentions of the Legislature. Best rent in section 7 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, does not mean "best rent" as between tenant for life and remainderman, but the best rent that can actually be obtained. As to the way-leave there is nothing in section 17 which makes it necessary to reserve a separate rent for the way-leave. The effect of sections 9 and 17 taken together is that a tenant for life may grant a mining lease coupled with a way-leave at a rent ascertainable by acreage of coal worked.

Bristowe, contra.—A tenant for life in granting a lease which may take effect out of the property of the remainderman can only do so on terms which are fair as between himself and the remainderman. There is nothing in the Settled Land Acts which justifies the reservation of a minimum varying rent. It must therefore be uniform as in the case of surface leases: Doe dem. Sutton v. Harvey, 1 B. & C. 426. As to the way-leave the effect of only reserving a nominal rent after the coal is worked out is that the tenant for life will probably get the benefit of the rent while the burden will fall on the reversioner without any compensation.

Neville, K.C., replied.

The following cases were also referred to: In re Lowther, see MacSwinney on Mines (2nd ed.), p. 178; Mountjoy's case, Moore 174; Hallett to Martin, 32 W. R. 112, 24 Ch. D. 624; and Montgomery v. Charteris, 5 Dow, 293.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 5.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Byrne, J., upon certain questions as to the validity under the Settled Land Acts of certain provisions in an agreement for a mining lease entered into by the tenant for life under a settlement made by the will of William Aldam, deceased. The first question is whether the tenant for life has power under the Act to grant a mining lease for sixty years, reserving a minimum yearly rent not commencing until the second year of the term, and increasing year by year until the fifth year of the term. This question the learned judge has answered in the negative. [His lordship then referred to the Act, and continued:] The affidavits filed in support of the summons, which are uncontradicted, show that it is usual in the district to charge no minimum rent in the first year, and also to charge a gradually increasing rent in the first few succeeding years, till a certain limit is reached, which is always below the value of the probable annual get of coal, and that this is reasonable, having regard to the great initial outlay and time required for the opening out and development of a new mine. They also assert that the rent reserved under this agreement is the best that could be got, and beneficial to all persons entitled. Byrne, J., was of opinion that the fact that no minimum rent was reserved in the first year was fatal, though he would have been satisfied had it been fixed at a nominal amount only, and saw no objection to the graduated scale, provided the maximum rent was made to begin in the fifth year, or on the death of the tenant for life if he died before that date. He based his view on this latter point on the ground that by the will a second tenant for life might possibly succeed before the remainderman. I cannot agree with the learned judge in his answer to the first question. The Settled Land Acts, as the learned judge admits, contain no provision making a minimum rent obligatory in the first year. There need not be any minimum rent at all, though there is power to reserve one. And, while there need be no minimum rent, there may be an acreage rent according to the quantities gotten, which might, and probably would, be nothing in the first year. Whence then comes the obligation to reserve a minimum rent in the first year if one is reserved at all? The epithet "fixed" does not create it. It is, I think, used only in contradistinction to an acreage rent fluctuating according to the amount gotten, and a rent would be "fixed" for any year in which a sum defined beforehand was reserved as rent. The learned judge founded his view upon the fact that section 4 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, permitted a peppercorn, or any rent smaller than that ultimately made payable, to be reserved during the first five years of mining and building leases, whereas in the Settled Land Act, 1882, though there is such a provision as to building leases (section 8), it is not extended to mining leases in section 9. But in the earlier legislation building and mining leases were dealt with together in one section; in the present Act they are dealt with separately; and, as Mr. Neville pointed out, a peppercorn may well have been treated as strictly applicable to a building lease creating the true relation of landlord and tenant, but inapt in the case of a mining lease, which is really in its essence rather a sale at a price payable by instalments than a demise properly so-called. But, however this may be, I think the provisions of the Settled Estates Act have very little bearing on the construction of the Settled Land Act, which, as was explained in Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury 41 W. R. 318, [1892] A. C. 356, rests on a very different principle. In that case Lord Macnaghten, speaking of the Settled Land Act, said: "The problem was how to relieve settled land from the mischief which strict settlements undoubtedly did in some cases produce without doing away altogether with the power of bringing land into settlement. That was something very different from the task to which Parliament addressed itself in framing the Settled Estates Acts. In those Acts the Legislature did not look beyond the interests of the persons entitled under the settlement. In the Settled Land Act the paramount object of the Legislature was the well-being of settled land. The interests of the persons entitled under the settlement are protected by the Act, as far as it was possible to protect them. They must be duly considered by the trustees or by the court whenever the trustees or the court may be called upon to act. But it is evident, I think, that the Legislature did not intend that the main purpose of the Act should be frustrated by too nice a regard for those interests." A similar observation was made by Lord Lindley in In re Gladstone, 48 W. R. 531, [1900] 2 Ch. 101, at p. 105, where he said: "The Settled Land Act was intended to get rid of a number of old authorities, and to enable a tenant for life to do that which he could not have done before the Act. I do not think that any case decided before the Act can have any application to the present case." Here, on the evidence, the stipulation in question is, from a business standpoint, reasonable and proper, if the best price for the coal is to be realized, and can clearly be no disadvantage to the remainderman, even if that were the paramount consideration, which it is not. It is, I think, clear on the evidence that this agreement was made honestly in the interest of all parties, and the possible difference to a tenant for life succeeding before the fifth year must not be allowed to defeat an arrangement which is the best that can be made for the development of the estate. Questions 2 and 3 are as follows: (2) Whether the tenant for life has power to insert in the lease a power for the cesser of the minimum rent when all the coal demised by the lease, except such parts thereof, if any, as, in accordance with the lease, are not to be worked or paid for, shall have been paid for at the acreage rent reserved by the lease; (3) whether the lease may contain a way-leave for foreign coal, to continue after cesser of the minimum rent at a nominal rent, or whether a substantial rent must be reserved for such way-leave. The learned judge has treated these together. As to the first of them, he holds that it can only be permitted provided the term be made to determine at the period of the cesser of the minimum rent, and, as to the second, that a substantial rent must be paid for the way-leave after such cesser. He points out that no separate rent is reserved for the way-leave, and that, though this is permissible under section 17, yet the effect of the provisions referred to in these questions would be that, if all the coal were worked out, there would practically be a free way-leave for the rest of the term, payment having been already made for it in the rent, and that, if the tenant for life were to live till all the coal were got out, the remainderman would be subject to the burden of the way-leave for the rest of the term, without getting anything but a nominal payment for what might have been granted by them for a very substantial rent. I think the same considerations dispose of these difficulties. On the evidence it would seem to be a practical impossibility to deal with the way-leave in any other way. The coal under the land of the lessor (which consists of scattered plots) is only a small part of a seam lying under the land of several different owners, and to be properly developed under modern conditions it must be worked as part of a larger whole. The provisions in the lease are those which have been found to be the most workable in practice, and are those which are in general use in the district. Every special or unusual clause, such as those suggested by the learned judge, would mean a fetter put on the development of the estate, and would involve a diminution in the rent which the lessee would be prepared to give for the coal. The consideration given by the lessee and the rights he gets in return are all part of one bargain, and the fact that the coal under the lands of many different owners has to be worked as part of one enterprize, as to which it is impossible to say beforehand how and in what directions it is to be most economically carried out, makes it essential that the way-leave for foreign coal should be co-extensive with the term. By a provision in the will in this case, two-thirds of the rent is to be set aside as capital moneys, instead of one-fourth, which is all that the statute (section 11) exacts in the case of a tenant for life not impeachable for waste, and the remaindermen will, therefore, suffer no injustice. It is, of course, impossible in every case to put them in precisely the same position, at whatever period during a lease the tenant for life may die, but primâ facie, where a substantial proportion is set aside when received for the benefit of the remaindermen, it is best for all parties that the highest obtainable price should be secured for the coal and the way-leave, even though in certain contingencies the rent should drop to a nominal figure before the end of the term. It seems to me that there is nothing in the statutes to vitiate the provisions in question, and that this appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: In dealing with the questions raised in this case, it has, I think, to be borne in mind that the Legislature has on grounds of public policy considerably increased the rights tenants for life of real estate have at law. The alterations are very striking in the case of mining leases. A tenant for life impeachable for waste, and consequently unable at common law to work unopened mines, is now authorized to grant a mining lease of such mines, and to receive for his own use one-fourth of the rent reserved by the lease. It is also to be borne in mind that the object of a mining lease is to enable the lessee to remove for his own benefit the minerals demised and widely differs from that of a lease of a portion of the surface where the lessee is expected after enjoying the use and occupation of the demised property for a term of years to deliver it up to the lessor in the same state and condition as at the commencement of the lease. The rent received by the mining lease rather resembles an instalment of the purchase-money for the demised minerals than what is understood by rent reserved on an ordinary demise of the surface.

Section 7, sub-section 2, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, applies to all leases granted under the Act, whether of the surface or of minerals. Its provisions are imperative and require the best rent to be reserved that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case. The word "rent" in the clause includes such rents or royalties as are authorized by the Act to be reserved in mining leases: see section 2, sub-section 10 (ii.). In determining whether the best rent has been reserved, the court, on a question arising between the tenant for life on the one hand and the trustees of the settlement and beneficiaries on the other, must consider not only whether it is the best rent which could be obtained as between an absolute owner and the lessee, but also whether it is such regard being had to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement: see Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 53.

Section 9 of the Act (which deals with mining leases) is not imperative, but merely permissive. Sub-section 1 (i.) authorizes the reservation of a rent varying according to the acreage worked or the quantities of mineral gotten. Sub-section 1 (ii.) authorizes the reservation of a fixed or minimum rent either with or without power for the lessees to make up deficiencies in working in case the rent, according to acreage or quantity, falls short of the fixed or minimum rent. It is not disputed that under these sub-sections a varying rent may be reserved without the addition of a fixed or minimum rent, but it is said that if a fixed or minimum rent be reserved it must be a uniform rent. This does not appear to me to be expressed by the language of the sub-section, on which (regard being had to the provisions of the Act) I do not think that a narrow construction ought to be placed. In support of his contention the learned counsel for the respondents referred to Mountjoy's case and Doe dem Sutton v. Harvey. Both were cases of surface leases granted under powers very much more limited on their terms than those conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1882. I shall assume, however, that these cases do apply to surface leases granted under the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1882, except where varying rents are expressly authorized; but no case has been cited in which they have been applied to fixed or minimum rents under mining leases where a varying rent was authorized. It was also pointed out that in section 8, sub-section 2, it is expressly provided that nominal or other rent less than the rent ultimately payable under a building lease might be reserved for the first five years of the term, while section 9 contains no such provision. The answer appears to be that such express provision was unnecessary, for sub-section 1 (i.) of section 9 authorizes the reservation of a rent varying with the actual working, and sub-section 1 (ii.) does not make the reservation of a fixed or minimum rent imperative.

Having regard to the difference already pointed out between surface and mining leases, I am unable to see good ground for holding that as a matter of law the fixed or minimum rent referred to in section 9, sub-section 1 (ii.), must be a uniform rent, and Byrne, J., was also of this opinion; but he held that the provision that no rent should be paid during the first year was unauthorized, and he appears to have considered the proposed arrangement open to objection, as I understand, in the interests of the remainderman and particularly of the infant son of the tenant for life, who is also tenant for life in remainder. The object of a fixed or minimum rent is twofold. First, to provide a specified income on which the tenant for life may rely; and secondly, and this is the more important reason, as a security that the mine will be worked and worked with reasonable rapidity: see the remarks of Erle, C.J., in Jegon v. Vivian, 14 W. R. 227, L. R. 1 C. P. 9 at p. 34. In the present case it is proposed that the lessee shall pay no rent during the first year, and shall pay rents less than that ultimately payable, during the second, third, fourth, and fifth years. If the fixed or minimum rent may vary, as I think it can, I do not see why in a particular year it may not be nil. The scheme is framed as it is on the view that during the first five years the lessee will in all probability be under the necessity of expending large sums for the purpose of developing the coal field, and the arrangement is both reasonable and usual as between lessor and lessee. Primâ facie as between tenant for life and remainderman it is for the benefit of the remainderman; for the less the dead rent paid before he comes into possession the smaller will be the differences in working to be made up during the period of his possession. It is also proposed that the fixed minimum rent shall cease when all the coal has been worked or paid for. This operates as an inducement to the lessee to work rapidly. The consequences may be that the workable coal will be exhausted during the tenure of the tenant for life, and thus the provision may operate to the disadvantage of the remainderman. In the present case, two special circumstances are to be regarded: first, the large proportion—viz., two-thirds—of rent which the settlor has directed to be capitalized, of which the remainderman will have the benefit; secondly, the peculiar nature of the property which is not continuous, but is made up of a large number of small pieces of land situate amidst the properties of other owners. Such a property cannot be advantageously worked for coal by itself; it must almost of necessity be worked along with the lands of other owners as is in fact proposed to be done. If the working of such a mineral property be too long delayed it may get entirely isolated and become workable (if at all) at a great disadvantage. It seems to me that these circumstances may well justify the proposed arrangement as between tenant for life and remainderman, and I confess I cannot see that the circumstances that the next remainderman is an infant tenant for life necessarily requires the court to hold that a substantial rent ought to be reserved during the first year.

A further point to be considered—viz., whether if the way-leave for foreign coal continues after the cesser of the minimum rent a substantial rent must be reserved in respect of it. Now section 17 (i.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, authorizes mining leases to be made with a grant of (inter alia) powers of working way-leaves and rights of way. There is nothing in the section which requires a separate rent to be reserved in respect of any such grant. The propriety of the reservation of a separate rent must depend upon the particular circumstances of the case under consideration. Here again the nature of the property must be considered, and with it this further fact (which is of great importance), that no way-leave rent is to be paid to the owners of the land through which the coal demised must be carried in order to reach the surface, so that the lessees are enabled to give a larger acreage rent they otherwise would. I think that such a state of things may well justify the reservation of a nominal way-leave rent after the cesser of the minimum rent. In the result, therefore, I think that there is nothing in the proposed lease which can as a matter of law be held to violate the requirements of the Settled Land Act, 1882, that there should be reserved the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case, and that due regard should be had to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement. Whether in fact any particular case satisfies those requirements must depend on the evidence. In cases of this sort I think the court ought not to rely on mere general statements couched in the language of the Act—as, for example, a statement to the effect that the rent agreed to be paid is the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to the circumstances of the case, but should require the material circumstances to be set out and the grounds for the conclusions arrived at stated. In the present case I think this has been sufficiently done. For these reasons, and also for those given by Collins, M.R., I think the appeal should be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This appeal raises questions of great importance as to the power of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act to grant a mining lease. In considering the case I think I am entitled, and indeed bound, to have regard to the policy of the Act as explained by the House of Lords in Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, and not to narrow or cut down the language used in the Act so as to make it conform to decisions given prior to the Act upon powers of leasing conferred by other instruments. A tenant for life may now grant such a mining lease as is authorized by sections 6, 7, 9, and 17 of the Act, even though the lease may to some extent prejudice the remainderman, provided only that the tenant for life does not fail to comply with the provisions of section 53 of the Act.

The estate in question comprises about 340 acres of land lying in scattered plots, the coal under which cannot be worked except in conjunction with the coal under the adjoining and intermixed land. It is proved that the terms of the agreement to which I must refer more particularly are such as are usually or indeed universally adopted in the particular mining district, and that the rent is the best rent within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 2. But it is said that the lease is not authorized because it reserves a minimum or certain rent varying from nothing in the first year to £1 per acre in the fifth and succeeding years, and because no special way-leave rent is reserved, although the way-leave may be exercised for many years after the whole of the coal has been won. Byrne, J., has held these objections to be valid, but I am unable to accept this view. It is no doubt true that the rent must be the best rent; but section 9, sub-section 1 (i.), plainly shows that the rent need not be uniform throughout the term. It may vary according to the quantity of the coal got, and cease when all the coal has been got. Section 9, sub-section 1 (ii.), contemplates that there may be, or may not be, a fixed or minimum rent, and when once it is established that the rent is the best rent as between lessor and lessee, I can see no reason why the minimum rent, which need not be reserved at all, should not begin at the second year of the term, or why the minimum rent should necessarily be constant when once it has begun. The use of the word "rent" in the case of a mining lease is somewhat misleading. It is really purchase-money for coal worked, and section 11 provides that a certain proportion of the rent shall be set aside as capital money. In the present case the proportion is two-thirds. There is no objection to the clause providing that what are called "under-gettings" may be made up at any time. Section 9, clause (ii.), contemplates this. The minimum rent is not fixed on a descending scale, the effect of which might perhaps be that the tenant for life would get an advantage over the remainderman; on the contrary, there is an ascending scale from the second year to the fifth year. A minimum rent is reserved in order that the lessee may have a strong pecuniary inducement to get the coal with reasonable speed and regularity. It is really a part payment in advance of the purchase-money, and it is not easy to see how the remainder-men can be damnified, inasmuch as their proportion of all money, so paid in advance is secured. Mr. Bristowe, who argued the case with great ability, relied upon the fact that by section 4 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, a peppercorn rent or any smaller rent than the rent ultimately payable may be made payable during any part of the first five years in the case of either a building lease or a mining lease, and that this provision is repealed in section 8, sub-section 2, of the Settled Land Act in the case of a building lease, but that no similar provision is found in section 9 with reference to a mining lease. I am not impressed by this difficulty. I decline to cut down the Settled Land Act by reference to the Settled Estates Act which is still in force. I think the Legislature has used language which rendered it unnecessary in the case of a mining lease to insert any such provision. With reference to the way-leave, it seems to me that section 17 expressly authorizes the grant on a mining lease of a way-leave during the whole of the term of the sixty years, and I find nothing requiring a separate rent to be reserved in respect of that way-leave. In short, the mining lease must be looked upon as a whole. The rent, or purchase-money, is payable for everything comprised in the lease—i.e., for the coal plus the way-leave. This rent or purchase-money may vary according to the acreage worked. The rent will cease when all the coal is won, or, in other words, the whole purchase-money will then have been paid. But the lessee will still be entitled during the continuance of the term to enjoy the property demised. In my opinion the order of Byrne, J., except so far as it provides for costs, should be discharged, and an order made substantially in accordance with the notice of appeal. The costs of all parties of the appeal should be paid out of capital money.

ELLIOTT v. GARRETT. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Slander—Privilege—Question as to information inducing belief—Question as to steps taken to ascertain truth.

Where in an action for slander imputing to the plaintiff that he had received a bribe in respect of a vote given by him as a vestryman, the defendant pleaded privilege, an interrogatory proposed to be administered by the plaintiff, asking the defendant what information, if any, he had that induced him to believe that the words were true, and what steps, if any, he had taken before speaking the words to ascertain whether they were true or not, was allowed.

Appeal from an order of Bucknill, J., at chambers, directing that an interrogatory which was proposed to be administered by the plaintiff to the defendant should be struck out.

The action was brought to recover damages for slander.

The statement of claim alleged as follows: The plaintiff and the defendant were on and prior to the 3rd of November, 1901, and still were, members of the borough council of Islington. In February, 1900, certain gentlemen, including Mr. William John Crump (afterwards Mayor of Islington), being desirous that the Alexandra Palace and Park should be acquired for public purposes, entered into a provisional agreement for the purchase of the said palace and grounds for the sum of £150,000, and paid £5,000 as a deposit. Subsequently the vestry of Islington (now the borough council) resolved to contribute towards the said purchase the sum of £14,000, subject to the necessary legal sanction being obtained by Act of Parliament. The plaintiff, then a member of the said vestry, at first opposed, but subsequently voted for, the resolution authorizing the said expenditure. On the 6th of August, 1900, the Alexandra Park and Palace (Public Purposes) Act, 1900, received the Royal Assent, the firm of Messrs. William A. Crump & Son (of which the said William John Crump was a member) being solicitors for the promotion of the Bill. By section 33 of the Act the costs, charges, and expenses preliminary to and of and incidental to preparing, obtaining, and passing the said Act were to be paid out of moneys contributed under and for the purposes of the Act, and the said William John Crump as a member of the said firm was interested in the passing of the said resolution by the said vestry. On or about the 3rd of November, 1901, the plaintiff was a candidate for the office of mayor of the said borough, and on Councillor Harvey, a member of the said council, on the said date at the Great Northern Hospital asking the said defendant to vote for the plaintiff as mayor of the said borough, the said defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff—"What! Vote for Elliott" (meaning thereby the plaintiff) "after what I have been told?" In response to further questions the said defendant further said—"What? Haven't you heard? Why it is going all round. Why, Elliott has received a bribe of a £50 note in connection with the Alexandra Park affair" (meaning thereby his said vote in favour of the resolution above mentioned). On the same day subsequently, in the presence of Councillors Harvey and Bryett, the said defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff the following words: "I have just been telling Harvey that it is not my intention to vote for Elliott; decidedly not, I do not think that a man like him would do any good as mayor, owing to his having received a certain bank-note from the Alexandra Palace to get their matter pushed through." And on the said Councillor Bryett saying, "That is a serious accusation," the said defendant replied, "Mr. Crump is the man to explain" (meaning thereby that the said William John Crump was able to give all the information proving the truth of the said charge). The said slanders imputed to the plaintiff meant that he had committed an offence under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act, 1889, in that he had received a bribe of £50 and had rendered himself liable to the pains and penalties prescribed by the said Act, and further that he had been guilty of gross misconduct in his office of vestryman, and was not a fit and proper person to be mayor of the said borough or to hold any office as a member of any public body. By reason of the premises the plaintiff had been injured in his credit and reputation and had suffered damages.

The defendant, by his defence, said that if he spoke and published the words complained of, which he denied, he spoke and published them only to Councillor Harvey, and in answer to inquiries made by him, or only to Councillors Harvey and Bryett, and in answer to inquiries made by them, and that the said councillors had a common interest with him in the matters referred to; and that it was the defendant's duty to speak and publish the words complained of; and that the defendant spoke and published the said words, if at all, bonâ fide and without malice towards the plaintiff, and in the honest discharge of his duty as a councillor, and with the honest desire to protect, as was his duty, the interests of the councillors and the ratepayers of the said borough; and that the occasion was privileged.

The plaintiff proposed to administer certain interrogatories for the examination of the defendant. The fourth interrogatory was as follows: "What information, if any, had you that induced you to believe that the said words were true, or what steps, if any, had you taken before speaking the said words to ascertain whether they were true or not?"

On the plaintiff's application at chambers for leave to administer the interrogatories, Bucknill, J., was of opinion that the fourth interrogatory ought not to be allowed, and directed that it should be struck out.

The plaintiff appealed.

Witt, K.C. (Poley with him), for the plaintiff.—This interrogatory ought to be allowed, as it does not merely go to damages, but is relevant to an issue distinctly raised by the pleadings: Martin v. Trustees of the British Museum, 10 Times L. R. 215.

Hugh Fraser, for the defendant.—The interrogatory ought not to be allowed, as it is a fishing interrogatory, if not irrelevant. The principle governing this case is laid down in Hennessy v. Wright, (No. 2), 36 W. R. 879, 24 Q. B. D. 445*n*; Parnell v. Walter, 38 W. R. 270, 24 Q. B. D. 441; and Ridgway v. Smith & Son, 6 Times L. R. 275.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion this is a clear case, and the appeal ought to be allowed, and our decision does not seem to me to be in conflict with any of the previous cases. The objection taken to the allowing of this interrogatory cannot rightly be based on an allegation that the interrogatory is not relevant. It is obviously relevant to a distinct issue raised in this case. The defendant by his defence has pleaded privilege. He has alleged that the words complained of, if spoken by him at all, were spoken by him in good faith and without malice, and in the honest discharge of his duty, and were therefore privileged. This interrogatory is aimed at enabling the plaintiff to prove that which is an answer to that plea of privilege—viz., that the words were spoken maliciously. It is obvious that if this interrogatory is answered in one way, the answer will support the plaintiff's case. However, it is said that this is a fishing interrogatory. But in my opinion it is not anything of the sort. The plaintiff seeks by it to obtain evidence, which must necessarily be within the knowledge of the defendant, in support of his own case. I think that counsel for the plaintiff was right in saying that Martin v. Trustees of the British Museum covered this case, and the other cases which were cited do not conflict with that decision. In those cases the interrogatories merely went to damages. I therefore think this interrogatory ought to be allowed.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

SKENE v. COOK. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of — Land tax — Redemption — Yearly sum paid by way of interest—Charge on premises—Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 116), ss. 123, 125—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 1—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), ss. 1, 8.

By section 123 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, it is provided that where any person having any estate or interest (other than an estate of inheritance) in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall redeem the land tax charged thereon, such lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall be chargeable for his benefit with the amount of the moneys paid as the consideration for the redemption of such land tax, and with the payment of a yearly sum of money by way of interest thereon, equal in amount to the land tax redeemed. Such "yearly sum" is either "rent," within the meaning of section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, or the principal sum is a "sum of money charged upon or payable out of land," within the meaning of section 8 of that Act, and, therefore, an action to recover such yearly sum is barred by the said sections unless brought within the time thereby limited.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.), dismissing an appeal by the plaintiff, [1901] 2 K B. 7, 49 W. R. Dig. 94, from Judge Lumley Smith, sitting at Westminster County Court.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £9 as being the amount of a certain land tax payable by the defendant to the plaintiff.

The particulars of the plaintiff's claim were as follows:

The plaintiff claimed the sum of £9, being one year's land tax payable by the defendant to the plaintiff on or before the 1st of January, 1900, charged upon Nos. 61 and 61A, High-street, St. Giles, in the county of Middlesex, to which the plaintiff is entitled as assignee of the benefits arising under the certificate of the contract for the redemption of such land tax, dated the 19th of February, 1874.

These particulars were taken to be amended so as to include an alternative claim for a commuted payment in lieu of land tax.

The defendant filed in the county court as a special defence: "That the claim for which the defendant is summoned is barred by a Statute of Limitations."

The facts, which were not in dispute, were as follows:

In 1873 Sir Theodore Brinckman was the owner in fee simple of three houses, No. 61, No. 61A (which was a yard behind No. 61), and No. 62, High-street, St. Giles.

On the 4th of November, 1873, Sir T. Brinckman, the owner of the fee, demised Nos. 61 and 61A to one W. T. Purkis under a lease for forty-two years, which would expire in the year 1915; and, at the same time, by another lease he also demised No. 62 to the same lessee (Purkis) for the same term of forty-two years.

Under the covenants in these leases Purkis, the lessee, covenanted to pay the land tax, which amounted to £11 14s. per annum.

On the 19th of February, 1874, Purkis, the lessee, contracted with the commissioners acting under the Acts for the redemption of the land tax, for the redemption of the land tax, which for the year 1873 was assessed as follows: No. 61, High-street, £4 10s.; No. 61A, High-street, £4 10s.; No. 62, High-street, £2 14s.; total, £11 14s.

In September, 1874, Purkis paid to the Land Tax Commissioners £327 16s. 6d., the amount of the redemption money, and the land tax was redeemed on the three houses as from the 24th of June, 1874, and this was duly registered on the 10th of October, 1874.

Purkis thereupon became entitled to an annual payment of £4 10s. in respect of No. 61, £4 10s. in respect of No. 61A, and £2 14s. in respect of No. 62.

On the 23rd of June, 1874, Purkis, the lessee, assigned the lease of Nos. 61 and 61A (which were subject to a payment of £9 in lieu of land tax) to one Plumb, and by several mesne assignments and ultimately by an indenture of the 27th of August, 1885, the lease of Nos. 61 and 61A became vested in the defendant, who by mistake had every year paid the land tax to the commissioners until the year 1900, when the mistake was discovered, and notwithstanding the redemption, the revenue authorities had by some mistake been collecting annually the land tax from Cook (the defendant) and his predecessors in title.

On the 30th of June, 1879, Purkis assigned the lease of No. 62 to Skene, the plaintiff, and at the same time Purkis handed the certificate of the redemption of the land tax to the plaintiff, with the intention of transferring the benefit of such certificate to him.

A formal assignment of the benefit of such certificate had since (on the 9th of October, 1899) been made by Purkis to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff on receiving the certificate of redemption of the land tax in 1879 put it away with his title deeds and forgot all about it until the year 1900.

The lease of No. 62 was now vested in the plaintiff, who held, by assignment from Purkis, the certificate of redemption on all three houses.

The lease of Nos. 61 and 61A since 1885 were vested in the defendant, who was bound to make an annual payment of £9 in respect of the land tax redeemed on those two houses, and this payment ought to have been made to the plaintiff as the holder of the certificate of redemption.

The present action was brought to recover one such annual payment of £9, due on the 1st of January, 1900, being one year's land tax payable by the defendant to the plaintiff.

In 1899 the defendant surrendered the lease of Nos. 61 and 61A to the freeholder, and on the 27th of September, 1899, the freeholder granted the defendant a new lease of No. 61, with certain rights over the yard No. 61A, and in this new lease the defendant also covenanted to pay all land tax.

The county court judge held that the claim was barred by lapse of time, and he gave judgment for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiff to appeal.

On appeal by the plaintiff the Divisional Court held that the yearly sum payable under section 123 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, by way of interest, on the amount paid as the consideration for the redemption of land tax is a "rent" within the meaning of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 1, and therefore affirmed the judgment of the learned county court judge.

The Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 116), provides:

Section 123. And where any person or persons having any estate or interest (other than an estate of inheritance) in any manors, messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall redeem the land tax charged thereon by or out of his, her, or their own absolute property, such manors, messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall be and become chargeable for the benefit of such person or persons, his, her, or their executors, administrators, or assigns, with the amount of the three pounds per centum bank annuities which shall have been transferred, or with the amount of the moneys paid as the consideration for the redemption of such land tax, as the case may be, and with the payment of a yearly sum or sums of money by way of interest thereon, equal in amount to the land tax redeemed. . . .

Section 125. And in all cases where any bodies, politic or corporate, or companies, or other person or persons redeeming any land tax, shall by virtue of this Act be entitled to have and receive out of any manors, messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, any yearly sums of money by way of interest, or by way of rent or of rentcharge, equal in amount to the land tax redeemed, such yearly sum shall be payable on the same day as such land tax was payable at the time of the redemption thereof (unless where any other days are herein specified for that purpose), and shall be recoverable by action, suit, distress, or any other means whereby rents reserved on leases are recovered by law.

Section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27)—which section is not repealed by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874—provides that

The words and expressions hereinafter mentioned, which in their ordinary signification have a more confined or a different meaning, shall in this Act, except where the nature of the provision or the context of the Act shall exclude such construction, be interpreted as follows: . . . The word "rent" shall extend to all heriots, and to all services and suits for which a distress may be made, and to all annuities and periodical sums of money charged upon or payable out of any land (except moduses or compositions belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole).

The Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), provides:

Section 1. After the commencement of this Act no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action or suit, to recover any land or rent, but within twelve years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action or suit, shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twelve years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action or suit, shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same.

Section 8. No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent, to the person entitled thereto, or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought but within twelve years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments, if more than one, was given.

Martelli, for the appellant.—The decision of the court below was wrong. There is no Statute of Limitations which bars the plaintiff's claim. The question in this case is whether a person who redeems land tax has any right of action in respect of the principal sum or the annual payment to which he is entitled under sections 123 and 125 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802. In Cousins v. Harris, 12 Q. B. 726, it was held that there was no right of action in respect of the principal. If there is no right of action then the case does not come within the provisions of the Real Property Limitation Acts of 1833 or 1874. This is not a sum of money charged upon land within section 8 of the Act of 1874 because there is no right of action to recover the principal sum. The principal sum is really only the price fixed at which the owner of the land can redeem the annual sum. The owner cannot be compelled to redeem, and is not liable to have the land sold to pay off the principal sum. The owner of the charge can only realize the principal sum by selling and assigning his charge. Remedies are expressly given by section 125 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, in respect of the annual sum, but not in respect of the principal sum. Further, the annual sum payable under section 123 of that Act is not a "rent" within the meaning of section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. "Rent" means a separate incorporeal hereditament. In Grant v Ellis, 9 M. & W. 113, it was held that the word rent as used in the corresponding section of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, did not apply to rent service, but only to rents in the nature of realty. Section 1 of that Act excludes from the definition such a periodical sum as the one in question. The annual sum mentioned in section 123 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, is not in the nature of realty.

Warrington, K.C. (Duke with him), for respondent, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—This was an action brought by the assignee of a person who had redeemed the land tax upon certain premises, of which he was lessee, to recover one year's payment of the yearly sum of money payable by way of interest upon the principal sum paid for redemption. The question is whether the plaintiff's claim is barred by any Statute of Limitations. The redemption of the land tax took place in 1874. In 1879 the plaintiff became the assignee of the person who redeemed, and from that time down to the present claim no payment or demand of payment has ever been made in respect of the amount paid for redemption of the land tax. The rights of a person on redeeming land tax are provided by sections 123 and 125 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802. [The learned judge here read the sections.] This yearly sum, therefore, was recoverable by distress or action. The defendant filed the special defence that the claim was barred by a Statute of Limitations. The appellant's contention is that no such statute applies. For the defendant it was contended, on the other hand, that the claim is barred by either section 1 or section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. [The learned judge here read section 1.] There can be no doubt that if this yearly sum can be called "rent" within the meaning of section 1 the claim in respect of it is barred. The Divisional Court has held that it is "rent" within the meaning of that section, and it seems to me that, for the reasons given by Channell, J., in the court below, this yearly sum of money is a rent within the meaning of the section. The learned judge pointed out that by section 1 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 (which is to be read together with the Act of 1874), "the word 'rent' shall extend to all heriots, and to all services and suits for which a distress may be made, and to all annuities and periodical sums of money charged upon or payable out of any land." The word "rent" in that section has, no doubt, in Grant v. Ellis been held not to include rent payable under a lease, but for the reasons given by Channell, J., I think that this annual sum, which is not in the nature of rent service but is an annual sum charged on the land, is not excluded from that definition. Assuming, however, that that is a wrong view and this annual sum is not rent within the meaning of section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, then it seems to me that the case falls within section 8 of that Act. [The learned judge here read section 8.] Is money paid for the redemption of land tax under section 123 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, "charged upon or payable out of any land" within the meaning of section 8? If it is a charge upon land it comes within the express words of that section. It is admitted that it is a charge, but it is contended that it is not within section 8 because no action, suit, or other proceeding could be brought to recover it, in support of which contention Cousins v. Harris is cited, but when that case is properly looked into it will be seen that it does not bear out that contention because it does not deal with equitable rights and remedies at all. It appears to me that the charge on the premises is one which can be enforced in the ordinary way by proceedings in equity like any other charge, and that therefore section 8 applies. Therefore, in either view of the case, the claim is barred by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If a person is the owner of an equitable charge on land, then, although there is no obligation upon anyone to pay the charge, the owner of the charge has a right to bring an action in a court of equity to have the amount of the charge realized by a sale of the land, and it has been so held and is settled law that such a charge is within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that the period of limitation begins to run from the time of the last payment in respect of principal or interest. Turning to the present case we find that under the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, a person having an estate or interest, other than an estate of inheritance, in land charged with land tax may redeem the land tax and then has a charge upon the land. The land is charged with the amount of the moneys paid for the redemption and with the payment of a yearly sum by way of interest thereon. Then is there anything in the statute to take away the rights which would ordinarily follow from a charge of a principal sum and interest thereon on land? I can see nothing! It is true that it was decided in Cousins v. Harris that there is no personal remedy against the owner of the land; but it was also held in that case that the owner of the land would have a right to redeem the charge. I think this case is within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and the plaintiff's case is consequently barred. Suppose, however, that this is not a charge for principal and interest within section 8, then I think the case must be regarded as within section 1 of that Act. Therefore, in any case, the plaintiff's claim is barred and must fail. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this was a charge upon land because the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, s. 123, says in terms that there shall be a charge upon the land in respect of the moneys paid for the redemption of the land tax as well as interest. I agree that the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, applies, and that the plaintiff's claim is barred.

Appeal dismissed.

In re DUKE OF CLEVELAND'S SETTLED ESTATES AND In re THE SETTLED LAND ACTS, 1882-1890. (a.)

Settled land—Capital money—Investment—Powers of a tenant for life—Choice of brokers—Duties of trustees—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 21, sub-sections 1, 10; s. 22, sub-section 2; s. 31 (vi.).

A tenant for life has no power under the Settled Land Acts to direct the trustees to employ a particular broker nominated by him. The choice of a broker lies with the trustees.

After a sale of settled estates a tenant for life entered into negotiations with a firm of brokers for the investment of the proceeds of sale. The trustees refused to employ the broker nominated by the tenant for life, and desired the transaction to be carried through by their bankers, who would employ their own brokers. The tenant for life then asked that the trustees might be directed to apply the capital moneys in their hands in the purchase, through the brokers nominated by the tenant for life, of such investments, authorized by the Act, as the tenant for life might direct.

Held, that the trustees, and not the tenant for life, were the proper persons to select and employ a broker, just as they were the proper persons to select and employ a solicitor or banker.

This was a summons under section 44 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, taken out by Captain Forrester, the tenant for life of certain estates settled by the will of the late Duke of Cleveland, against the trustees of the will, who were also trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, asking that the trustees might be directed to apply certain capital moneys in their hands in the purchase, through the brokers nominated by the tenant for life, or such other brokers of good credit and position as he might select, of such investments, authorized by the Acts, as the tenant for life might direct.

The capital moneys in the hands of the trustees consisted of two sums of £25,000 and £180,000, representing the proceeds of sale of the Battle Abbey estates.

The tenant for life had consulted a firm of brokers as to the investment of the proceeds of such sale and had selected certain investments, for the purchase of which he proposed to enter into a contract with the firm.

The trustees, however, desired that the investment should be made through their own bankers, who in the ordinary course of business would employ their own brokers.

This summons was accordingly taken out to decide whether the tenant for life or the trustees were the proper persons to select the brokers to be employed.

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Younger, K.C., and W. Brinton, for the tenant for life.—The tenant for life has an absolute right to give directions as to the investments to be made (In re Lord Coleridge's Settlement, 44 W. R. 59, [1895] 2 Ch. 704), and he is entitled to have the costs of the exercise of his powers under the Act paid out of capital, under section 21, sub-section 10: In re Llewellin, 36 W. R. 347, 37 Ch. D 317, per Stirling, L.J., at p. 326. In re Hotham, ante, p. 150, [1901] 2 Ch. 790, is distinguishable and only applies to the investment of capital moneys on mortgage. Moreover, an appeal is pending in that case. We submit that the tenant for life is the proper person to control the trust estate, and that he has the right to order the trustees to employ the brokers chosen by him.

Hughes, K.C., and E. Beaumont, for the trustees, were not called upon.

JOYCE, J., said that, generally speaking, if not universally, trustees in the execution of their trusts were entitled to choose the solicitor, broker, or banker with whom they would deal, and there was a well-known case—Foster v. Elsley, 30 W. R. 596, 19 Ch. D. 518—in which Chitty, J., had held that trustees were not bound to regard even the direction of their testator as to the solicitor they should employ. If there were any question of the tenant for life or the trustees sharing in any brokerage to be earned upon an investment, of course neither one nor the other could be allowed, directly or indirectly, to participate in that. It was true that sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Settled Land Act provided that the investment of capital money arising under the Act should be made according to the direction of the tenant for life. That had been considered in various cases, and it has been held in In re Lord Coleridge's Settlement that the tenant for life was entitled to select a particular investment. But it had also been decided in In re Hotham that upon an investment on mortgage under the Settled Land Act, in accordance with a direction by the tenant for life, given under section 22, sub-section 2, it was the duty of the trustees to satisfy themselves as to value, title, and form of the particular mortgage, and that the same principle applied to other investments under the Act. That case was under appeal, but at present his lordship would follow it; and he was of opinion that sub-section 2 of section 22 had not the effect of entitling the tenant for life to select the broker, any more than the solicitor, to be employed by the trustees. His lordship then referred to section 31 of the Act, which, after giving the tenant for life power to enter into various contracts, provided that he might "in any other case enter into a contract to do any act for carrying into effect any of the purposes of this Act" and might vary or rescind the same. The meaning of that was that the tenant for life could contract to do such things as he was entitled by law to do, but he did not think that the tenant for life could contract that the trustees should do any particular act. The trustees were entitled to select their own solicitors and their own brokers. It had been said by Lord Romilly that trustees were liable for the default of their solicitors because they selected them. His lordship agreed with the decision in In re Hotham, and he accordingly refused the application of the tenant for life.

STEPHENS v. THE MYSORE REEFS (KANGUNDY) MINING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Memorandum of association—Main object—Subsidiary objects—Ultra vires—Injunction.

The objects clause of a memorandum of association of a gold mining company consisted of a large number of paragraphs which embraced objects apparently remote from gold mining. One paragraph stated that these objects should in no wise be limited or restricted by reference to or reference from the terms of any other paragraph or the name of the company.

Held, that the paragraphs in the clause were to be construed as giving the company full and ample powers to do a number of things, but in a manner subsidiary and subordinate to the main business, and an injunction was granted restraining the company from carrying out a scheme which clearly did not come within the main business of the company.

This was a motion brought by Thomas Stephens, who was the registered holder of 6,454 preference and 2,788 ordinary shares in the Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) Mining Co., for a declaration that a scheme proposed to be carried out by the company was ultra vires, and that the company could not lawfully proceed to carry out the said scheme or give effect thereto, and for an injunction to restrain the company from carrying out the said scheme.

The Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) Mining Co. was registered as a limited company on the 1st of July, 1899, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1898.

Clause 3 of its memorandum of association set forth at length the objects of the company in a number of separate paragraphs.

The material paragraphs were:

1. To acquire and take over as a going concern the undertaking of the Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) (Limited) (incorporated in 1887), and all or any of the assets and liabilities of that company, and with a view thereto to enter into and carry into effect with or without modification the agreement referred to in clause 3 of the articles of association of this company.

2. To acquire gold mines, mining and other rights, land, auriferous, metalliferous, or otherwise, or any interests in the same respectively in Mysore and elsewhere, and to work, exercise, develop, and turn to account the said mines, rights, and land or interests therein respectively.

8. To purchase or otherwise acquire and undertake all or any part of the business, property, and liabilities of any person or company carrying on any business which the company is authorized to carry on, or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company.

11. To enter into partnership or into any arrangements for sharing profits, union of interest, joint adventure, reciprocal concessions, or co-operation with any person or company carrying on or engaged in, or about to carry on or engage in, any business or transaction which the company is authorized to carry on or engage in, or any business or transaction capable of being conducted, directly or indirectly, to benefit this company, and so take or otherwise acquire and hold shares or stock in or securities of, and to subsidize or otherwise assist any such company, and to sell, hold, re-issue with or without guarantee, or otherwise deal with such shares or securities.

12. Generally to purchase, take on lease or in exchange, hire, or otherwise acquire any real or personal property, and any rights or privileges which the company may think necessary or convenient with reference to any of these objects or capable of being profitably dealt with in connection with any of the company's property or rights for the time being, and in particular any easements, ships, barges, rolling stock, and stock-in-trade.

15. To promote any company or companies for the purpose of acquiring all or any of the property, rights, and liabilities of this company, and for any other purpose which may seem, directly or indirectly, calculated to benefit this company, and to underwrite or subscribe for, or procure to be underwritten or subscribed for, all or any part of the share or debenture capital of any such company.

16. To invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner as may from time to time be determined.

25. To do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects and so that the word "company" in this clause shall be deemed to include any partnership or body of persons whether incorporated or not incorporated, and whether domiciled in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and so that the objects specified in each paragraph shall, except when otherwise expressed in such paragraph, be in no wise limited or restricted by reference to or reference from the terms of any other paragraph or the name of the company.

Paragraphs 2, 8, 11, 12, 15, 16, of clause 3, it was maintained by the plaintiff, referred to objects subsidiary to or outside the main object of the undertaking, which was that of gold mining in or near Mysore.

Soon after its incorporation the company sent mining experts out to India, who reported unfavourably upon the property, and consequently mining operations were abandoned.

On the 23rd of January, 1902, the directors sent out a circular to the shareholders announcing that the directors were negotiating for the acquisition of a property on the British Gold Coast, West Africa.

The circular stated: "I am instructed by my directors to inform you that since the date of the last general meeting they have had before them several offers of mining properties, each of which has been carefully considered, and they have now entered into negotiations with a view to acquiring a property in the British Gold Coast, West Africa, on the following terms: It is proposed to obtain an option during the period of which the mine would be examined and reported on by a mining engineer selected by the board, and in the event of his report being satisfactory the same would be submitted to the shareholders for their approval. A subsidiary company would then be formed with a capital of £75,000; the purchase price to be £25,000 payable entirely in shares, leaving a working capital of £50,000, of which £30,000 would be subscribed by this company and 20,000 shares would be held in reserve.

Micklem, K.C., and Dickinson, for the plaintiff.—The main purpose of the company is stated in the first paragraph. The present proposal to carry on financial operations in West Africa, even if it could be brought within the scope of the other paragraphs, is outside the scope of the main proposal: In re German Date Coffee Co., 30 W. R. 717, 20 Ch. D. 169; In re Crown Bank, 38 W. R. 666, 44 Ch. D. 634; In re Amalgamated Syndicate, 46 W. R. 75, [1897] 2 Ch. 600. Paragraph 25 cannot prevent the application of these cases.

Eve, K.C., and Martelli, for the company.—Here there are a number of independent objects, but no main object. If the scheme is unobjectionable, the memorandum should be so construed: New Zealand Gold Extraction Co. v. Peacock, [1894] 1 Q. B. 622.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In my opinion, on the correct construction of the memorandum of association the proposed scheme is not within the powers of the company. The first object described is, in my view, the principal and governing object—namely, to acquire and carry on the business of the former company. The remaining clauses are to be construed as giving the company full and ample powers to do a number of things, but in a manner subsidiary and subordinate to the main business. I find myself precluded from putting the construction on the memorandum contended for by the company not only on general principle, but by the weight of authority. In the case of In re German Date Coffee Co., in dealing with a similar point, Lindley, L.J., said: "What is the fair construction of the memorandum of association? It is required by the Act of 1862 to state what the objects of the company are. In construing this memorandum of association or any other memorandum of association in which there are general words care must be taken to construe those general words so as not to make them a trap for unwary people. General words, construed literally, may mean anything; but they must be taken in connection with what are shown by the context to be the dominant or main objects. It will not do under general words to turn a company for manufacturing one thing into a company for importing something else, however general the words are." Every line of that is applicable to the present case. Construing the memorandum, as I ought to, fairly and reasonably, I am of opinion that the proposed scheme was not authorized. I have had to take clause 25 into consideration, and it was said that, however the rule might be if that clause were not present, the effect of that clause was to make every preceding clause as if it defined a separate and independent object not governed or cut down by any other object. In my judgment that is not the true construction. Under these circumstances I must grant the injunction claimed by the plaintiff.

MINISTER & CO. v. APPERLEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Appeal—Official referee—Discretion as to costs — Leave to appeal — Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 49—R. S. C., ord. 36, r. 55 (b); ord. 65, r. 1.

Where by an order of court the whole of an action is referred to an official referee, and such order contains no directions as to costs, there is no appeal, without leave, against the official referee's decision as to costs.

This was a motion, by way of appeal, as to costs, from the decision of an official referee in an action to recover damages for negligence.

The action was referred by an order of court to the referee with all the powers of certifying and amending of a judge of the High Court and with power to direct judgment to be entered, and otherwise deal with the whole action.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The referee awarded the plaintiffs damages and directed judgment to be entered for them for the amount awarded with costs up to a certain date after the action had been brought when the defendants had written a letter to the plaintiffs offering them a sum in satisfaction of their claim, and he directed that from and after that date the parties should pay their own costs. He refused to give leave to appeal from such order as to costs.

The plaintiffs now moved to set aside so much of the above order as deprived them of costs from and after the date of the letter on the ground that (1) no good cause was shown for so depriving them of their costs, and (2) that the referee had acted on a wrong principle in so doing.

Macaskie, K.C. (Bremner with him), for the defendants, raised the preliminary objection that no appeal lay against the official referee's decision as to costs, as he had not given leave to appeal. Section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides that "No order made by the High Court or any judge thereof, by the consent of parties, or as to costs only, which by law are left to the discretion of the court, shall be subject to any appeal, except by leave of the court or judge making such order." By ord. 36, r. 55 (b), of the Rules of the Supreme Court it is provided that "Where the whole of any cause or matter is referred to an official referee under an order of court, he may, subject to any directions in the order, exercise the same discretion as to costs as the court or a judge could have exercised." By ord. 65, r. 1, it is provided that " . . . the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or judge . . . provided . . . that where any action, cause, matter, or issue is tried with a jury the costs shall follow the event unless the judge . . . or the court shall for good cause otherwise order": Arbib v. Henry, 99 Law Times, 283; Carr Brothers v. Dougherty, 67 L. J. Q. B. 371, 46 W. R. Dig. 8; Adlington v. Conyngham, [1898] 2 Q. B. 492, 47 W. R. Dig. 152; Bew v. Bew, 48 W. R. 124, [1899] 2 Ch. 467.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C. (Montague Lush with him), for the plaintiffs.—The official referee's decision as to costs was wrong; he had no good cause for depriving the plaintiffs who were successful of any of their costs, and in doing so he had proceeded upon a wrong principle. There is an appeal against such an order on the ground that the official referee did not exercise a judicial discretion. By the Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 15, sub-section 1, it is provided that "In all cases of reference to an official or special referee or arbitrator under an order of the court or a judge in any cause or matter, the official or special referee or arbitrator shall be deemed to be an officer of the court, and shall have such authority, and shall conduct the reference in such manner as may be prescribed by rules of court, and subject thereto as the court or a judge may direct." And sub-section 2 provides that "the report or award of any official or special referee or arbitrator on any such reference shall, unless set aside by the court or a judge, be equivalent to the verdict of a jury." When, after the verdict of a jury, an order as to costs is made, such order can be appealed against on the ground that it was made without good cause.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I do not entertain any doubt upon the question raised by Mr. Macaskie. No doubt, in a case where costs have been given to a person who has no right to them, an appeal lies, but where costs are in the discretion of the person who has to award them, then there is no appeal except by leave. I think that the preliminary objection to this motion must succeed, and the motion be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree.

Motion dismissed.

BAILEY & CO. v. CLARK, SON, & MORLAND (LIMITED). (a.)

Water — Watercourse — Artificial stream — Rights of riparian proprietors.

In determining the rights of riparian proprietors in an artificial watercourse the court will take into consideration, first, the character of the watercourse, whether it is of a temporary or permanent character; secondly, the circumstances under which it was created; thirdly, the methods of user.

The plaintiffs were owners of a mill on an artificial watercourse which had been in existence for more than 400 years. They had the right to regulate the flow of water into the channel, and the burden was cast upon them of keeping the channel clean and unincumbered. The evidence showed that in ancient times there had been another mill on the same channel, and that its water had also been used for the purposes of a tannery, on the site of which the defendants had erected a factory.

Held, that, on the evidence, it could not be inferred that the artificial watercourse in question had been created upon the conditions that the plaintiffs should be entitled to every drop of water flowing through it. Consequently the defendants were entitled to the ordinary rights of riparian owners, and could use the water for any purposes they desired so long as such user inflicted no sensible injury on the plaintiffs.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J.

The plaintiffs, A. Bailey & Co., owned a mill called Beckery Mill, near Glastonbury. The mill is situate on a cut or channel, alleged to be artificial, by which a portion of the water of the River Brue is carried down from a place known as Clyce Hole for a distance of a mile and a-half, ultimately rejoining the river. The water in this channel passes first the defendants' factory known as Northover Factory, in respect of which the claim in the present action was made; then, about 200 yards lower down, a factory of the plaintiffs' called the Beckery Factory, closely adjoining the mill. The inflow of water from the River Brue is regulated by means of an artificial structure with removable boards, which is, and always has been, under the control of the mill-owner, upon whom had fallen also the task of keeping the bed of the cut clean and clear.

The defendants, Clark, Son & Morland (Limited) carried on an extensive business at Northover Factory, which is on the site of an old tannery, as manufacturers of sheepskin and other rugs; for the purposes of this business the[illegible] water coming down the cut.

(a.) Reported by J. I. [illegible] ister-at-

The plaintiffs carried on at Beckery Factory another skin and rug manufacturing business.

The plaintiffs allege that the defendants in the course of their business polluted and fouled the stream flowing down the cut and abstracted water therefrom to such an extent as to seriously interfere with and diminish the flow thereof to the plaintiffs' mill and factory. The pollution was said to be caused by the washing, soaking, and scouring of sheep and other skins in the stream after they had been previously subjected to dyeing processes, and by returning into the stream the effluent liquid which had been used in the various processes of manufacture.

The present action was therefore brought to restrain the defendants from (1) polluting or fouling the stream in the cut; (2) diverting or abstracting the water; (3) obstructing or diminishing the flow of the stream.

The plaintiffs claimed, both as owners of Beckery Mill and of their factory, a right to the whole and unpolluted flow of the water of the stream as it entered the cut, as well for the use of the mill as for the use of their factory.

By reason of an action brought in 1877, and of certain subsequently executed deeds of arrangement, the defendants could not have as mill-owners acquired against the plaintiffs, by prescription or otherwise, any rights other than such, if any, as had been acquired in right of Northover prior to that year. It appeared that no waste from the plaintiffs' factory was returned into the cut above Beckery Mill.

At the trial a great deal of evidence was adduced as to the nature and extent of the alleged pollution and obstruction of water in the cut.

Byrne, J., granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants, their servants, and workmen from wrongfully fouling or polluting, and from diverting and abstracting the water of the mill-stream in question further or otherwise or to any greater extent than such water was formerly fouled or polluted, diverted or abstracted for the same process or processes (if any) as was or were formerly carried on at the old tannery on the site of the defendants' premises, and which had since been carried on by the defendants at Northover Factory and Glastonbury; but the operation of the injunction was suspended so as to give the defendants time to re-arrange their process as far as possible. And the defendants were ordered to pay the costs of the action.

The defendants appealed.

Levett, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the appellants.

Rowden, K.C., and Coldridge, for the respondents.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—With regard to the pollution, I shall presently say what we consider to be the conditions under which this artificial watercourse was constructed. When it appears what those conditions were, it will be seen that, according to our view, there was unjustifiable pollution of this stream. Under those circumstances the injunction, so far as it relates to pollution, either will have to remain in its present form or will have to be renewed in the order that we propose making. But we have already heard from the defendants that they have acquired some five acres of land which will enable them so to treat the effluent as to prevent there being an obnoxious discharge into the stream, and we think it right to extend the time for the injunction coming into force, that is to suspend the injunction for such time as may be necessary to enable the defendants to do this. Then with regard to the prescriptive right, Byrne, J., has affirmed that right so far as the tannery is concerned. We do not think that in that respect there ought to be any alteration in the order, that is to say, we do not think any further prescriptive right has been established.

Then, coming to the main case, I want to say that this case has been argued on both sides upon the basis that the stream in question is an artificial watercourse, and as I propose to deal with it as being an artificial watercourse I wish to safeguard myself in what I say in this respect that it must not be taken as if I had myself decided that upon the evidence it is clear that this stream is within the meaning of the cases an artificial watercourse. I am not sure about that. When there is a stream of this sort that runs out of a river, and, after making a detour, comes back again into the river, it is quite plain qua the riparian proprietors on the river itself lower down than the point where the stream returns that they and the riparian proprietors on the backwater do stand in the relation to each other of upper and lower riparian proprietors; I should have thought that the obligations of the upper riparian proprietors, and to a certain extent their privileges, would as between themselves and the people lower down the river be the same as those in respect of a natural stream, and would be the same independently of any grant or any prescription. I have not, however, to decide this point; I only suggest that I am not sure that this might not be treated as a natural stream, at all events, for some purposes, and I have mentioned one of the purposes for which I think possibly it might be so treated. Really, I am not quite sure that it makes any difference to the conclusion that I have come to in this case whether you regard this watercourse as an artificial stream or a natural stream. That, however, does not matter. I am going to deal with it as being an artificial watercourse. If this were a natural watercourse each riparian proprietor would have had the rights which are so well stated by Lord Kingsdown in the case of Miner v. Gilmour, 12 Moo. P. C., at p. 156. [His lordship read the passage from "By the general law applicable to running" down to "inflicts upon them a sensible injury," and continued:] If, on the other hand, one deals with this as an artificial watercourse, any right to the flow of the water must have its basis on some grant, whether in the nature of an easement or otherwise. The basis of all rights must be really an agreement either expressed or presumed, with the owners of the land through which the artificial watercourse runs. That being so, it is plain that the circumstances might be such as to lead to a proper inference that the artificial watercourse was constructed on the terms that each of the riparian proprietors on the watercourse should have the same rights as the riparian proprietors upon a natural stream, and no more than those rights. As an authority for that proposition one may take the case of Sutcliffe v. Booth. As I said before, I am not sure that it would not be sufficient for the defendants if we were to hold that the rights of the riparian proprietors on this backwater were the rights of riparian proprietors on a natural stream and no more. But it is not necessary to discuss that, because, in my judgment, they are somewhat wider. In my judgment it is perfectly clear—at all events having regard to the evidence of the prior user—that what has been done by the defendants in the way of obstruction of water has not not been a violation of the rights of the plaintiffs as riparian proprietors on this artificial stream. Looking at the evidence, it is quite plain to my mind that there has been a withdrawal of water from the stream in times gone past for purposes other than domestic purposes. It is plain that there was a withdrawal of water for the purpose of the old tannery. Although Byrne, J., has allowed the defendants to claim in respect of the tannery rights of abstracting water as prescriptive rights, it seems to me they may equally be supported as rights arising under the conditions under which it must be presumed that this artificial watercourse was originally constructed. I think also that it should be borne in mind what has been the user by the plaintiffs themselves, which I do not understand it was suggested was unlawful or inconsistent with the original conditions of the creation of the backwater. There is evidence as to the conditions under which this watercourse has been, in fact, used. We have also evidence that in addition to the Beckery Flour Mill there was another mill higher up the stream. Under these circumstances, I come to the conclusion that this backwater was originally constructed under such conditions that the water might be withdrawn for manufacturing purposes equally by all the riparian proprietors, provided the abstraction of water was reasonable. Of course, it is always a difficult thing to say what is the measure of what is reasonable in such a case. But speaking for myself, I think you must take into consideration, amongst other things, the size of the stream—that is the total quantity of water there—and all the other conditions which are present, the other mills and factories there are there, and also causes for waste and necessity for the user of the quantity proved to be used. The result is that in my judgment we ought to find that this artificial watercourse was constructed upon terms giving all the riparian proprietors equally a right personally to withdraw the water for manufacturing purposes, and that there is no evidence that the defendants have withdrawn a larger quantity of water than they were entitled to. I want at this point to mention that if one takes in the strictest way the words of the judgment of Lord Kingsdown in Miner v. Gilmour: "But he has no right to interrupt the regular flow of the stream if he thereby interferes with the lawful use of the water by other proprietors, and inflicts upon them a sensible injury," there is, in my opinion, no evidence upon which we can find that the defendants, by the water they took out of the stream and returned to the stream, less the amount which was naturally evaporated, did anything to interfere with the lawful use of the water by other proprietors or to inflict upon the plaintiffs a sensible injury. The suggested injury here was that the defendants had interfered with the working of the mill. In my judgment there is no evidence of that. There is, it is true, some vague evidence that the working of the mill was interfered with by the shortness of water; but there is nothing in that evidence which is inconsistent with that interference having been caused by the withdrawal of 25,000 gallons a day by the plaintiffs themselves, of which 25,000 gallons none went back into the stream above the mill, but the whole of it was discharged below the mill. Under the circumstances, my view is that the user by the defendants, or the abstraction by the defendants, of the quantity of water which they are proved to have abstracted and to a large extent returned was a reasonable user; and that that user, whether reasonable or otherwise, has not been proved to have caused any interference whatever with the plaintiffs' mill or any sensible injury to the plaintiffs as mill-owners. Now I want to deal with one other matter. It is said that it may be that the circumstances are such that they do give rise to an inference that by grants from or arrangements with the various riparian proprietors this artificial watercourse was originally constructed upon conditions either a little wider than, or, at least, equal to, the conditions under which the riparian proprietors on a natural stream take privileges and incur obligations. But it is said that all that may be subject to some special rights of these plaintiffs as mill-owners. It is suggested that the mill-stream backwater was originally made expressly for them, but, to my mind, the evidence about the fulling mill absolutely disposes of that suggestion. It is suggested that either by some such original grant, or by some prescription arising from user since the original grant, the plaintiffs have gained paramount rights larger than the other riparian proprietors, and that the other riparian proprietors must be taken to have their rights and privileges subject to this paramount right of the plaintiffs as mill-owners. I do not say that such a state of things is impossible, but in my judgment it is a state of things that we ought not to infer from the evidence before us. I do not think that I should be justified in occupying time by going into this question at length or attempting to define what evidence would justify the inference of grant or prescription giving such paramount rights to the owners of this mill, because I am sternly of opinion that no possible inferences from the facts could give the plaintiffs a right to every drop of the water that passed over the weir. I agree that if the plaintiffs could establish that, they would have established their case, but it seems to me impossible to suggest that there are any circumstances here from which we ought to draw such an inference. There is nothing in the facts to suggest that this was the only mill or that the stream was only made for the benefit of this mill, nor is there anything from which we ought to draw that inference. I do not think that we ought to have drawn it if the fact had been established, but the fact has been negatived. Then it is also said that we ought to draw that inference because there is never so much water in this stream as this mill could take and utilise. It seems to me that, assuming that to be true, one ought not to draw this inference. Speaking for myself, I most unhesitatingly say that I am of opinion that there is nothing to justify the inference that the plaintiffs had a grant entitling them to the whole of the water coming over this weir. The entire history of the user seems to me to negative their having any such grant. Then, if they had not the grant, what was the grant that they had? The grant may have been that they had this right to have the water flowing into this backwater course down to their mill without any interference with it by the exercise of the riparian rights of the people up the stream. If that is their right, in my judgment, on this evidence, as I have already stated once before, there is nothing to justify the conclusion that the defendants have in any way caused interference with or sensible injury to the rights of the plaintiffs as mill-owners. Really on the evidence it is tolerably plain that if there has been any material shortness of water at all it is attributable rather to acts of the plaintiffs themselves than to anybody else. Under these circumstances, in my judgment we ought to vary the order of Byrne, J., leaving this injunction against the pollution and negativing any larger prescriptive rights than those recognised by the order, but discharging absolutely so much of the order as relates to the abstraction of water. If that is the proper conclusion to come to the appellants have substantially won on this appeal, and they ought to have the costs of the appeal. As to the costs in the court below, I think that the plaintiffs and the defendants came off about equally as to what they won. Under those circumstances, I think that the order ought to be, as regards the hearing in the court below, that each side pays its own costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question relates to the relative rights of the plaintiffs and the defendants to the user of an artificial watercourse. It is a watercourse which is an ancient one, having been in existence for some 400 years at least. The plaintiffs are the owners of a flour-mill upon it and also owners of an adjoining factory, the mill having existed there for an unknown period, but the factory having been recently erected. Now the watercourse runs from a place called Clyce-Hole on the river Brue, which is a natural stream, and conveys water to the mill and the factory, passing by the land of the defendants, and after passing the plaintiffs' mill it goes on and again empties its water into the stream. Its whole length is about one mile and a half. There is no question that the plaintiffs and their predecessor in title have been entitled so far as can be discovered to the user during that period of the watercourse for the purposes of their flour-mill. It also appears that the miller had had, so far as it has been discovered, from time immemorial the control of the flow of the water. He has been able, therefore, so to deal with the water as to avail himself of it at such times as he pleased and as was beneficial for the purpose of working the mill It seems that he had also cast upon him the obligation of clearing the watercourse and repairing its banks. Now, it cannot be doubted that in that state of things the plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit of the flow of the stream and to a reasonable use of the water, at all events for the purposes of their mill, returning the water of such use to the natural stream in the River Brue. But the plaintiffs are not content with that, and they assert that they are entitled to the exclusive use for the purposes of the mill of the whole flow of water along this artificial watercourse. Now, in dealing with this, we have to enquire first of all on what principles those rights are to be ascertained.

The principle has been laid down in various cases, of which I may mention Wood v. Waud, Sutcliffe v. Booth, and the case in the Privy Council of Rameshur Pershad Narain Singh v. Kooni Beharj Puttuck. From those authorities, as it seems to me, you must take into account first of all the character of the watercourse, whether it is of a temporary or permanent character; secondly, the circumstances under which it was created; and, thirdly, the mode in which it has been actually used and enjoyed as a matter of fact. As regards this watercourse, it is obviously of a permanent character; and there is no question, therefore, that rights and easements may be acquired in it. As regards the circumstances under which it was created we know nothing. It has existed for hundreds of years, but we know nothing as to who, at the time of the creation of this watercourse, were the owners of the various properties which now belong to the plaintiffs and the defendants respectively, or in fact as to the ownership of any portion of land, along the watercourse. I have stated what we know, shortly, as regards the user by the mill-owner for the time being. I have said that he claims the exclusive right for the purposes of the mill to the whole of the water along this watercourse. That right was put as high as this, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the use of every pailful of water in the stream, and further it was said that the stream is of such a nature that every pailful is of importance to the owner of the mill. Let us consider what are the facts with regard to the rights which have been exercised by the other owners of property abutting on this watercourse. First of all, the owners of the properties which adjoin have, it is stated, used the water for the purpose of watering their cattle and the ordinary purposes for which riparian owners use the adjoining steam. Secondly, the defendants and their predecessors in title were owners of a tannery, and they used the water for the purposes of their business. Thirdly, the plaintiffs' predecessors in title sold their property with rights of water for the purposes of the erection of a manufactory, and the plaintiffs used the water for the purposes of a manufactory and not exclusively for the purposes of a mill. If their right be as they claim, that for the purposes of the mill they had the exclusive right to the use of every pailful then they are not entitled to use a single pailful, for the purpose of anything else. What conclusion are we to come to with regard to these acts of the owners? They ought, it seems to me, to be taken primâ facie to have been acts done in the exercise of a legal title rather than as acts which they had no right to do. I think, therefore, that it ought to be inferred that the owners abutting on the watercourse reserved to themselves at the time when the watercourse was created the right to a reasonable use of the water as it passed their lands. The plaintiffs are in like manner entitled to a similar right to the reasonable use of the water for all reasonable purposes, and not merely for the purposes of the mill. In substance, apart from the peculiar use of the water for the purposes of the mill, both the plaintiffs and the other adjoining owners are entitled to such rights as the owners of lands adjoining a natural stream would be entitled to inter se. Then, if this be the nature of the plaintiffs' title, have the plaintiffs' rights been infringed? Byrne, J., came to the conclusion upon the evidence that they had. He says: "I think that the evidence shows the loss of a substantial and material amount of water caused by the defendants' operation, which does sometimes interfere with the working of the mill in the summer and autumn. It must, of course, be borne in mind that the abstraction and return of water is not a constantly equal operation, and it does not give a fair test of result on the working of the mill to treat the matter as though it were. If water is abstracted during working hours, and the effluent returned at night, for instance, at a time when the stream is very low, this may very well have a very appreciable result in the working of the mill which might not be noticeable if the reverse process were adopted." That being so, I have been desirous to see the evidence by which the conclusion is supported, and having heard and paid attention to all the passages that were referred to by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, I am unable to arrive at the same conclusion as Byrne, J. The right of the defendants to use this water is limited by this they must not so use the water as to cause sensible injury to the plaintiffs. Therefore the plaintiffs coming here to complain of a user must prove sensible injury. Now there are two classes of evidence which have been adduced, as there are in all cases which involve questions of nuisance. There is, first of all, what has been termed direct evidence of injury; and secondly, the evidence of experts which is adduced also by persons who have not worked the mill or dealt with it, but have paid a visit to it and drawn conclusions from what they have seen there. To my mind the first is that which we have to regard, at any rate to begin with. I do not say expert evidence is to be excluded, because it is most valuable and useful if once you arrive at the conclusion that what is properly termed direct evidence of injury is satisfactory in tracing the injury to the defendants' operations, and showing that it is due to them. But if the direct evidence of injury is unsatisfactory, then, to say the least, it wants a very strong case of expert evidence to prove a case for an injunction. It then substantially comes to a case of quia timet, and very strong evidence is wanted to induce the court to interfere. Now, the direct evidence is far from satisfying me that any sensible injury whatever is caused by the operation of the defendants' works. If there is any injury caused at all it is much more probably caused by the devotion of a large portion of the stream to the works carried on by the plaintiffs. I will not pass over altogether the expert evidence. Now, on that, as usual, there is great conflict. The defendants' witnesses admitted a certain amount of abstraction of water. They put it down, I think, at 1,500 gallons a day, which they say they do not return. The plaintiffs' witnesses put it much higher, and I will give them the benefit of their calulcation and little more. I will allow them to suppose that 8,000 gallons a day are taken by the defendants—that is to say, about one-third of what is taken for their own works. Now what does it come to? The quantity of 8,000 gallons a day is taken. The minimum flow is three million gallons a day, and that comes as near as may be to about a quarter per cent. of the stream. That is not sufficient abstraction, as it seems to me, to establish a case of quia timet. Again, the learned judge in his judgment suggests that there may be something due to the irregularity of the mode in which the water is abstracted and sent down. I am not prepared to say that to take a larger quantity of water out of the river at one time and to send it down at another would not be such an interference with the flow of the stream as to cause sensible injury to the plaintiffs. But I have not found any evidence of that in the present case. There is no direct evidence on that at all, but it is a mere suggestion of the experts, and they say it may cause injury to the stream. Upon these grounds I think that it is not made out the defendants have caused such a sensible injury to the plaintiffs as to call for the interference of the court. One matter more I should desire to call attention to. It was said frequently in argument by the counsel for the plaintiffs that a right was claimed and it was not necessary for them to prove any damage. I agree that if they claim a right to do a thing which the court thought was an assertion of title to a particular thing it would not be necessary for them to prove damage. There are assertions in the defendants' statement of defence of rights by prescription, but that has not been insisted upon at the bar. There is also a right claimed by the defendants to use the stream reasonably, and an assertion that the acts of the defendants have been consistent with the reasonable user of the stream. I think that when we are varying the judgment of the learned judge in the court below, it ought to be provided by our order that we negative any right by prescription or otherwise beyond holding that the defendants are entitled to use the water in this watercourse in a reasonable way, not causing any sensible injury to the plaintiffs.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree, and it is only out of respect to the learned judge in the court below from whose decision we are differing that I think it right to add a few words. I doubt whether this ought not to be treated as a natural stream having regard to its length, to the great and unknown antiquity of its construction, and to all the other circumstances. But I am content to treat it as an artificial watercourse, and that being so, it becomes necessary to consider and ascertain so far as possible what are the mutual rights which have been created in the artificial watercourse; or, to put the matter in more technical legal phraseology, what are the terms of the lost grant which from the nature of the case must be found to have existed in some shape or other? Now, the plaintiffs here contend that the presumption we ought to make is a grant of all the water coming over what I will call, the "intake" and going thence down to the mill, and that nobody else along the course of this artificial watercourse, which is considerably more than a mile in length, has a right to take a pailful of water out of it. That is the construction which upon the whole I think Byrne, J., has adopted. I cannot follow that. It seems to me to be absolutely inconsistent with all the evidence we have and with all we know about the origin and uses of this artificial cut for many years. On the other hand, the defendants raised a contention which I am equally unable to accept. It was very strenuously and ably argued that the implied grant did not extend to the whole of the water in the artificial channel, but only to so much as was necessary to work the mill. I am quite unable to follow that. It seems to me the subject-matter of the grant must be everything that comes into the artificial cut from the intake, and the only difficulty is to ascertain who were the grantees and what were the mutual rights which were conferred on the adjoining riparian owners and occupiers. Now, we know something, although not very much, but that something is very interesting, about this watercourse and this Beckery Mill. In a matter of this kind one of course is entitled to refer to a county history, and on referring to Collinson's History of Somerset I find there a verbatim extract from the terriers of Richard Bure, the last Abbot of Glastonbury but one. He was the Abbot of Glastonbury from 1497—1524, and I find this statement in the terrier, "There is another mill called Beckery Mill and new fulling mill lately erected by the said Lord Abbot." From that I think it is apparent that this artificial watercourse was used more than 400 years ago, and probably constructed many hundred years before that. It was certainly used more than 400 years ago, not merely for the purpose of the Beckery Mill, which is the plaintiffs' mill, but also for the purpose of a fulling mill on the bank of the cut, affording a clear proof of the user of this cut for manufacturing purposes. That is enough to negative entirely the foundation of the respondents' argument—namely, that the sole grantee, the only person entitled to the benefit of the lost grant, was the miller. In my judgment the true inference from all the facts is that the rights of the riparian owners and occupiers must be regarded in the same way as they would have been had this been a natural watercourse. But I think that the evidence shows that the riparian owners and occupiers are entitled to a reasonable use of the water whether for domestic or manufacturing purposes. That being so, I entirely agree with what my learned brothers have said, that although there is evidence which would have been material and would justify the finding of the learned judge in the court below if we had adopted his view as to the meaning and operation of the lost grant—namely, if it had been a grant of all the water, still I think that there is no evidence whatever to which any court ought to attach the slightest weight that there has been anything more than a reasonable user of the water by the defendants as against the millers and the riparian owners lower down. In saying "reasonable user" it must not be assumed that I am forgetting the pollution. To that extent the user was not reasonable, but I mean that no more than a reasonable quantity has been taken out for manufacturing purposes by the defendants. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below cannot stand, and I entirely adopt the views which have been expressed by my learned brothers.

Order varied.

VAN GRUTTEN v. TREVENEN. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Notice to quit—Tenancy from year to year—Service by registered letter—Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), ss. 28, 33.

Section 28 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, by which a notice under the Act may be served by sending it through the post in a registered letter, applies to a notice to quit in the case of a tenancy from year to year, which by section 33 is required to be a year's instead of a half-year's notice.

Application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Channell, J., and a jury at Bodmin.

The action was brought to recover possession of a farm in Cornwall, of which the defendant was tenant to the plaintiff from year to year. In September, 1900, the plaintiff sent by registered letter addressed to the defendant at his residence on the farm a year's notice to quit on the 29th of September, 1901, the expiration of the year of the tenancy. The postman, who brought the letter, required the defendant to sign for it before delivering it to him, but the defendant refused to sign for it until it was given to him. In consequence the letter was not delivered.

On the 17th of October, 1901, the plaintiff brought this action to recover possession, and the jury found that the defendant knew or suspected, when he refused the letter, that it contained a notice to quit.

Channell, J., entered judgment for the plaintiff.

By section 28 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, "any notice, request, demand, or other instrument under this Act may be served on the person to whom it is to be given, either personally, or by leaving it for him at his last known place of abode in England, or by sending it through the post in a registered letter addressed to him there; and, if so sent by post, it shall be deemed to have been served at the time when the letter containing it would be delivered in ordinary course; and, in order to prove service by letter, it shall be sufficient to prove that the letter was properly addressed and posted, and that it contained the notice, request, demand, or other instrument to be served." By section 33, where a half-year's notice expiring with a year of tenancy is by law necessary and sufficient for determination of a tenancy from year to year, a year's notice so expiring shall be necessary and sufficient for the same.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. A. Foote, K.C., and J. A. Hawke, for the defendant.—A notice to quit is not such a notice as can be served by registered letter under section 28 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883. It is not a notice "under this Act" within the meaning of section 28. The instruments referred to in that section are those which are created by the Act, of which there are many kinds. A notice to quit exists independently of the Act, section 33 merely regulating its length and requiring it to be a year's instead of a half-year's notice. There is a difference of opinion among the text-books upon this point. If this contention is correct, then the notice to quit has not been properly served at common law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We are all agreed that the notice to quit comes within the Act. That being so, there is no use in arguing the second point.

BLACKETT v. BLACKETT AND FRAIL. (a.)

Practice — Divorce — Security for costs — Claim for damages—Bankrupt petitioner—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 33.

The court will not order security for costs to be given by a petitioner in a divorce action merely because he is an undischarged bankrupt, though he claims damages against the co-respondent.

This was an appeal from a decision of Jeune, P.

A petition for divorce was presented by the husband against his wife.

Damages were claimed against the co-respondent Frail.

The co-respondent asked that, as damages were claimed against him, the petitioner should give security for costs.

The registrar made an order directing the petitioner to give security for costs within fourteen days or withdraw his claim for damages against the co-respondent.

The petitioner took out a summons by way of appeal from this order.

Jeune, P., allowed the appeal and reversed the registrar's order.

The co-respondent appealed.

Inderwick, K.C., and Murphy, for the appeal.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and Barnard, for the petitioner.

Inderwick, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Jeune, P., in which, overruling the decision which the registrar had come to, he allowed the petitioner to prosecute his suit without giving security for costs. The petitioner is an undischarged bankrupt, and he claims damages against the co-respondent. Under these circumstances the registrar ordered him to give security for costs, but the learned President has come to the conclusion that these circumstances in point of law afforded no sufficient ground on which security should be exacted. Now, the question before us is whether the President was right in the conclusion at which he has arrived. It is contended that there is a well-known practice of the Probate Court to the contrary, and it is said that this case is governed by a case decided so long ago as 1852, which must be taken to have regulated the practice ever since. I am not sure what would be sufficient to establish a practice with which we would not interfere, even if we were satisfied that it did not rest on a good basis. Cases of this sort, however, are very rare, and it is not as though they occurred every day and had been dealt with on a uniform system of practice. That being so, and it not being clear that the practice in the matter has, as a fact, been uniform, I think we are at liberty to look at the practice and see whether there is any principle which sustains it. First, I come to the foundation of the whole alleged practice, the case of Smith v. Smith, 31 W. R. 124, 7 P. D. 227. That case is very meagrely reported, and the judgment is simply in these terms: "The court granted the application unless the petitioner within a week withdrew the claim for damages." So far as this judgment rests on any statement of law it rests on Mr. Searle's argument, which is given in four lines: "Searle, for the co-respondent, applied for security for costs and a stay of proceedings until the security had been given. The proceedings, so far as damages are claimed, are in the nature of an action for crim. con., to which the practice at common law is applicable." That is the whole argument, and the judgment is nothing more than an application of that argument, and does not give any other reasons. Therefore I venture to criticize the reasons given by Mr. Searle. He says that the effect of a claim for damages was to introduce the practice at common law. Now, what was the practice at common law? The practice at common law certainly was not to order security for costs to be given by a party to an action simply because he was a poor man. Poverty was no ground at common law for ordering security for costs. According to the common law practice, therefore, the petitioner ought to be allowed to bring his action, and the evidence as to the Probate Court practice is not sufficient to justify us in building on so weak a foundation. Then we come to later authorities. The first is the case of Cowell v. Taylor, 34 W. R. 24, 31 Ch. D. 34. The headnote to that case is this: "The court will not require security for costs to be given by a plaintiff who sues as trustee in bankruptcy even when he is in insolvent circumstances," and Bowen, L.J., in his judgment, cites with approval the following passage from the judgment of the late Lord Esher, then (Brett, J.) in Sykes v. Sykes, 17 W. R. 799, L. R. 4 4 C. P. 645, at p. 650: "Insolvency alone is not a ground for compelling security. But an exception has been engrafted on that rule, where the plaintiff is merely lending his name for the benefit of another person, and is therefore not the real plaintiff in the action; as where he has assigned his interest in the debt to another. There is no authority, however, for extending that exception to the case of an executor or assignee of a bankrupt." The next case is Rhodes v. Dawson, 34 W. R. 240, 16 Q. B. D. 548. The second paragraph of the head-note to that case runs as follows: "A receiving order made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, does not divest the debtor of his property, and what he recovers as plaintiff in an action is his property, both legally and equitably, although he must, when he recovers it, hand it over to the official receiver for the benefit of his creditors if he does not pay or compound with them. Therefore a debtor against whom a receiving order has been made ought not merely on that ground to give security for the costs of any action in which he may be the plaintiff." In his judgment in that case Lindley, L.J., says this: "The law upon this subject is well summed up in the last edition of Chitty's Archbold, vol. 1, part 5, c. 33, p. 398: 'The plaintiff will not be compelled to give security for costs merely because he is a pauper, or bankrupt, or insolvent, and this even in a qui tam action. And this rule applies where the plaintiff is trustee of a bankrupt and is suing for the benefit of the estate, or where the plaintiff is suing as executor for the benefit of the testator's estate." There are other passages in the cases I have cited, but I do not think they add anything. But then it is said that there is a special circumstance in this case arising out of section 33 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] It is contended that, since that section gives the court power to direct in what manner such damages shall be applied, the bankrupt is not suing for himself, but is a mere conduit pipe through which the court allows a sum of money to get into the hands of the persons whom the court thinks ought to have it, and he ought, therefore, to be regarded as a person suing for the benefit of another person. I think that argument is met by the passage I have cited from the head-note to Rhodes v. Dawson, because there the receiving order did not divest the debtor of his property, but when he recovered it he was bound to hand it over to the receiver for the benefit of his creditors; but though he was in that position, he was not a person against whom security for costs was ordered. I think, therefore, this argument fails; while, if we are to follow the practice at common law, there can be no doubt that the judgment of the learned President was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

RIMMER v. WEBSTER. (a.)

Trustee—Conflicting equities—Fraud of agent—Negligence—Apparent ownership—Estoppel—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 55.

R. transferred the legal title in a bond of the Tyne Commissioners to H., a stockbroker, for the purpose of enabling him to sell the bond on behalf of R. The transfer stated that H. had paid the consideration to R., but no money was in fact paid. H. executed a mortgage of the bond by deed to W. for £1,000, and W. gave notice of his mortgage to the Tyne Commissioners. H. applied the money to his own use and became a bankrupt.

Held, that whether the case was one of general authority, with no limit brought to the notice of W., the mortgagee, or was to be regarded as a case of estoppel, R. was not entitled to priority or to a vendor's lien as against W.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action by Rimmer against the defendants Hall and Webster, asking to have a bond issued by the Tyne Improvement Commissioners under powers created by private Acts of Parliament, retransferred to him free from a mortgage to the defendant Webster, or in the alternative for redemption.

The facts, as set out in the judgment of Farwell, J., were as follows: On the 17th of July, 1900, the plaintiff was appointed trustee of the will of one Charles Gerrard, who had died in 1893, and part of whose estate consisted of a bond of the Tyne Improvement Commissioners. This bond was duly transferred to the plaintiff on the 15th of August, 1900, and the transfer was duly registered by the commissioners on the 28th of August, 1900.

The defendant Hall was a stock and share broker at Darlington, and in September, 1900, he was instructed by the plaintiff to sell the bond, and on the 11th of September the bond was sent to him at his request, and Hall knew that the plaintiff held this bond as trustee of Charles Gerrard's estate.

On the 13th of December, 1900, Hall wrote to the plaintiff stating that he was arranging for the sale of the bond in two portions of £500 and £1,500, and enclosed two transfer deeds by which the security was transferred to himself, and such transfers were expressed to be made in consideration of £1,500 and £500 respectively paid to the plaintiff by Hall, although, of course, no money was in fact paid; and on the next day the plaintiff executed these transfers and returned them to Hall.

On the 4th of January, 1901, the plaintiff received the usual notice from the secretary of the Tyne Commissioners informing him that these transfers had been lodged for registration; the secretary afterwards pointed out that the transfers were not in proper form and suggested some alterations. The transfers as altered were sent to the plaintiff by Hall, and on the 28th of January, 1901, were returned by the plaintiff to Hall duly altered and initialled, and on the 4th of February, 1901, were duly registered by the Tyne Commissioners.

Unfortunately Hall was a rogue, and on the 17th of December, 1900, he obtained from the late defendant Webster a loan of £1,000 on the security of the bond and the transfers. He told Webster that he was the owner and asked for a temporary loan. Webster's evidence was taken on commission, and he has since died.

In the opinion of the learned judge there was nothing to suggest that Webster's conduct was in any way open to suspicion; he had known Hall for some time and had perfect faith in his honesty.

On the 22nd of December, 1900, Hall executed a mortgage by deed (dated the 17th of December) to Webster of the bond, and on the 28th of December, Webster sent the bond and the transfers to the secretary of the Tyne Commissioners for registration and gave them notice of his mortgage.

On the 18th of January, 1901, the secretary wrote to Webster that the commissioners would not take cognizance of his notice of mortgage, but that if he wished it he could have it registered as an absolute assignment, and on the 28th of January Webster wrote to the commissioners stating that he did not propose to have his mortgage registered at present.

Meanwhile the plaintiff had been pressing Hall to carry out the sale of the bond, and on the 11th of March, Hall went to London and wrote to Webster an account of his financial difficulties.

On the 14th of March the plaintiff's solicitors gave Webster notice of the plaintiff's title, and on the 18th of March, Webster sent his mortgage to the commissioners and requested them to register it, but before this was done the writ in this action was issued.

Hall became bankrupt, and is in prison.

Upjohn, K.C., and G. F. Hart, for the plaintiff.

Jenkins, K.C., and W. Baker, for the defendant.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, said: The question now arises which of the two innocent parties is to suffer for Hall's rascality. Now the question in this case is one of conflicting equities—the legal title is in Hall; Webster never obtained that registration which was essential under the Tyne Commissioners Act to obtain a legal title, nor had he, when he requested the commissioners to register his mortgage on the 18th of March, "a present absolute and unconditional right to registration": see Nanney v. Morgan, 36 W. R. 677, 37 Ch. D. 346; Ireland v. Hart, ante, p. 315, [1902] 1 Ch. 522.

The question for my determination, therefore, is whether the plaintiff has by any act or default of his own displaced the higher equitable right that is given him by the priority of his title in point of date.

It is contended that there is a broad general principle, perhaps most succinctly stated by Ashurst, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 63, that "wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it." But to adopt Lord Selborne's words in Sewell v. Burdick, 33 W. R. 461, 10 App. Cas. 74, at p. 81: "It is often dangerous to infer even from very strong words when used diverso intuitu, conclusions on other subjects which, if they had been present to the minds of the speakers, might perhaps have led to their being more guarded or qualified." It would serve no useful purpose if I were to attempt to go through and discuss the various common law cases that have been cited to me, especially as in the last, Farquharson v. King, 49 W. R. 673, [1901] 2 K. B. 697, there is a remarkable conflict of judicial opinion, but I desire to express my respectful concurrence with the observations of Vaughan Williams, L.J., in that case "that it is impossible in the face of the various authorities to say that in every case in which the act of one of two innocent persons has enabled a third person to occasion loss, the first-mentioned person must bear the loss." It is plain that a man may in many cases entrust another with all the indicia of ownership, including the legal title, and yet not deprive himself of his equitable rights. I am not concerned to consider the case at common law, as the case before me is one of equities only, and it is sufficient to refer to two authorities to illustrate my meaning. A man may transfer his shares in a company to a single trustee and entrust him with the certificate, and yet enforce his equitable title against a purchaser or mortgagee of the trustee who has not obtained the legal title: Shropshire Union Railways and Canals Co. v. Reg., 23 W. R. 709, L. R. 7 H. L. 496. Again, he may cause land purchased by him to be conveyed to a trustee by a deed containing a statement that the trustee has paid the purchase-money, and may hand over the deed to him and yet enforce his equitable title in a similar way: Carritt v. Real and Personal Advance Co., 37 W. R. 677, 42 Ch. D. 263. The principle upon which those cases are founded is stated by Lord Cairns, L. R. 7 H. L., at pp. 507 and 509 of Shropshire Union Railways and Canals Co. v. Reg. so far as relevant to the present case. On the other hand it is equally well settled that if a man hands over the indicia of title to a third person for the purpose of enabling that person to raise money either for his own benefit (Perry Herrick v. Attwood, 6 W. R. 204, 2 De G. & J. 21) or for the benefit of the owner (Brocklesby v. Tem- perance Permanent Building Society, 43 W. R. 606, [1895] A. C. 173), but with a limit on the amount, the lender, being ignorant of the limit, is entitled to a charge for the whole amount advanced although it exceed the limit. It is sufficient to read one passage from Lord Macnaghten's judgment ([1895] A. C., at p. 184): "The principle underlying these cases is that the man possessed of the prior equity cannot be deprived of his title unless he has been guilty of some negligence. But the word negligence imports the neglect of some duty toward the person injured": Swan v. North British Australasian Co., 11 W. R. 862, 2 H. & C. 175. A man is entitled to deposit his deeds with his solicitor or his banker, or to send his certificate to his broker, or to vest his property in the name of another person and hand him the title-deeds without thereby giving rise to any implication inconsistent with his own beneficial title, because his acts are in accordance with the common usage of mankind, and no other member of the community therefore is entitled to allege that such a course of action contains any invitation to him to act, from which a duty to him can be inferred. But the course of action above-mentioned is also consistent with an intention that the person to whom the indicia of title are entrusted should deal with the property. And if it is once proved or admitted that such was the intention, the case then falls to be decided in accordance with the principles governing the cases of authority given to an agent; and the owner comes under a duty to the persons whom he intends to act, on such authority, to give them notice of any limit that he places on the authority which he has by his own act made apparently co-extensive with absolute ownership. This disposes of Mr. Upjohn's contention that the cases of Perry Herrick v. Attwood and Brocklesby v. Temperance, &c., Society are confined to an excess of the limit of borrowing, and do not extend to a mortgage, when the authority is only to sell. The authority which the owner has given can only be limited by the indicia of property which he has given. The particular authority proved or admitted is necessary in order to make the case one to which the principles of agency apply at all. But when that is once proved, and the owner is found to have given the vendor or borrower the means of representing himself as the beneficial owner, the case becomes one of actual authority, apparently equivalent to absolute ownership, and involving the right to deal with the property as owner; and any limitations on this generality must be proved to have been brought to the knowledge of the purchaser or the mortgagee. But then it is urged that Hall became a trustee for sale when the bond was transferred to him, and that a trust for sale does not authorize a mortgage. But it was the unnecessary transfer of the legal title to Hall that enabled him to deal with the bond as owner, and the principles which I have stated are equally applicable whether the dishonest vendor or mortgagor has the legal title as a trustee or not. The gist of the case is that the real owner has invested the dishonest vendor or mortgagor with all the indicia of title as absolute owner for the purpose of enabling him to deal with the property, but in a limited way only; whether the trust was to sell only or to mortgage only is immaterial, if the mortgagee or purchaser had no notice of the existence of any trust at all. Further, there is another class of cases distinct from the case of authority or agency which do fall under the general principle which I have cited from Lickbarrow v. Mason, and which are cases of pure estoppel. If the owner of property clothes a third person with the apparent ownership and right of disposition thereof, by not merely transferring it to him, but also by acknowledging that the transferee has paid the consideration for it to himself, he is estopped from asserting his title as against a person to whom such third party has disposed of the property and who took it in good faith and for value. Rice v. Rice, 2 W. R. 139, 2 Dr. 73, is a good illustration. If a man acknowledges that he has received the whole of the purchase-money from the person to whom he transfers property he voluntarily arms the purchaser with the means of dealing with the estate as the absolute legal and equitable owner free from every shadow of incumbrances or adverse equity (2 Dr., at p. 83), and he cannot be heard to say that he has not in fact received such purchase-money; it makes no difference, in my opinion, whether that acknowledgment is made before the Conveyancing Act, on a conveyance of land by the receipt clause in the body of the deed and the indorsed memorandum; or, since the Act, by the former only; or in a statutory transfer by the statement in the statutory form that the money has been paid. The statutory form is given in the schedule as the effectual mode of transfer, and the Act requires the true consideration to be stated; it would be disastrous now to hold that these forms which have been used for years are not fully effectual, but require to be supplemented by a conveyancer's receipt clause. There is nothing adverse to this in Carritt v. Real and Personal Advance Co. In that case the purchaser on completion took the conveyance of land to a trustee for himself; the purchaser's name did not appear on the conveyance, but the purchase-money was stated to have been paid by the trustee. Chitty, J., held that this statement did not involve any representation that the trustee had paid for the property out of his own money. But his decision does not extend to a case where the owner himself conveys in consideration of the payment of the purchase-money to himself by the transferee. The distinction is obvious; the mere statement that the purchase-money has been paid by the transferee is consistent with such payment having been made out of trust money in his hands belonging to third persons, but it is not consistent with absolute non-payment. There is no contradiction of the deed in saying, "True the purchase-money was paid by him, but out of some third person's money"; there is a direct contradiction in saying that it was never paid at all.

In this case the plaintiff transferred the whole legal title to Hall for the purpose of enabling him to sell, and he executed a transfer which stated that Hall had paid him the consideration; he was fully aware of this, and his letter of the 28th of February appears to point to an intention on his part that Hall should raise money on the bond, but I do not think it fair to lay much stress on that letter, as the plaintiff was not cross-examined.

But whether the case be regarded as one of general authority with no limit brought to the mortgagee's notice, or as one of estoppel, the plaintiff, in my opinion, fails to establish the priority that he claims; and his claim to a vendor's lien is also defeated on similar principles: see Rice v. Rice and White v. Wakefield, 7 Sim. 401.

There will be the usual judgment for redemption.

SWEET v. BISHOP OF ELY. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Vicar—Judicial separation from wife—Persistent cruelty—Vicar deprived of his preferment by bishop—Validity of bishop's declaration—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 4—Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32), s. 1, sub-section 1 (d) (e)—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), s. 12—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 38.

A separation order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, was made against the vicar of C. by justices at petty sessions upon the ground of his persistent cruelty to his wife. Upon the order becoming conclusive, the bishop of the diocese declared the living of C. vacant, purporting to act under section 1 of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892.

Held, that the bishop's declaration was invalid.

A clergyman cannot be deprived of his living by reason only of a separation order, based upon persistent cruelty, being made against him.

Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 38, considered.

Motion by the Vicar of Cowlinge, Suffolk, to restrain the Bishop of Ely and a churchwarden of the parish of Cowlinge from interfering with the plaintiff's enjoyment of the preferment of Cowlinge, and from instituting any other person into the preferment, or from treating as valid, or acting upon, a declaration made by the bishop that the said preferment was vacant. The patrons of the living, the Fellows and Scholars of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, were also joined as defendants, but the plaintiff's claim was substantially against the bishop, who had made a declaration under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, that the living was vacant, and against the churchwarden, who, acting on the bishop's declaration, had given the plaintiff notice to quit the vicarage.

It appeared that the plaintiff was married in the year 1880, and became Vicar of Cowlinge in the month of February, 1891.

On the 28th of January, 1902, a separation order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, was made against the plaintiff by the Newmarket justices at petty sessions upon the application of the plaintiff's wife upon the ground of his persistent cruelty to her.

The plaintiff made no appeal against the order, which had since become "conclusive."

In consequence of these proceedings on the 7th of March, 1902, the Bishop of Ely, acting, or purporting to act, under section 1 of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, declared the living of Cowlinge vacant, and the churchwarden accordingly took possession of the church, and prevented the plaintiff from having access thereto, and gave the plaintiff notice to quit the vicarage. The plaintiff thereupon commenced these proceedings, alleging that the declaration made by the bishop was invalid and unauthorized by statute. The question of the validity of the declaration made by the bishop turned upon the construction of several statutes, which are shortly as follows:

Section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, enacts that "if a husband shall be convicted summarily or otherwise of an aggravated assault, within the meaning of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43, upon his wife, the court or magistrate before whom he shall be so convicted may order that the wife shall be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and such order shall have the force and effect in all respects of a decree for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty.

Section 1 of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, enacts that "if either . . . (d) an order for judicial separation is made against a clergyman in a divorce or matrimonial cause, or (e) a separation order is made under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, then, after the date at which the order becomes conclusive, the preferment (if any) held by him shall within twenty-one days, without further trial, be declared by the bishop to be vacant as from the said date."

By section 12 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, is repealed, but section 4 of the Act of 1895 re-enacts the provisions of the Act of 1878, and further provides that any married woman whose husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty to her, and shall by such cruelty have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him, may apply to a court of summary jurisdiction for an order under the Act; and section 5 provides that the court of summary jurisdiction to which any application under the Act is made may make an order containing (inter alia) a provision that the applicant be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband (which provision while in force shall have the effect in all respects of a decree for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty).

Section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, provides that where any Act repeals and re-enacts with or without modifications any provisions of a former Act, references in any other Act to the provisions so repealed shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as references to the provisions so re-enacted.

E. Clayton, for the plaintiff.—Although section 1, sub-section 1, of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, gives the bishop power to declare a living vacant in certain cases, the bishop can only do so under sub-section 1 (e) (which refers to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878) in cases where the clergyman has been convicted of a crime. Here the plaintiff has not been convicted of any crime. The bishop must state the grounds upon which he makes the declaration (cf. rule 25, and Form 35, Clergy Discipline Act, 1892), and he has stated that he acted under sub-section 1 (e) of section 1. Section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, is not a re-enactment "with or without modification" of section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, because "persistent cruelty" is not mentioned in the latter Act, and therefore section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, does not apply here. The declaration made by the bishop is invalid.

Dibdin, K.C., and G. J. Talbot, for the defendants.—The Act of 1895 is a re-enactment with modifications of the Act of 1878, and the Interpretation Act is therefore applicable, and the declaration is valid. Moreover, it is not necessary to declare the ground on which the bishop acts in making the declaration: cf. rule 25 of Clergy Discipline Act, 1892. A separation order granted under section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, is an order for a judicial separation in a divorce or matrimonial cause. The Act of 1895 merely provides cheaper machinery for getting a separation than proceeding under the Divorce Act: cf. Lane v. Lane, [1896] P. 133, at pp. 135, 137, 44 W. R. Dig. 54. The bishop made the declaration under sub-section 1 (d) of section 1 of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, and the declaration is therefore valid.

Clayton, in reply.—The bishop cannot now change his ground for making the declaration. He purported to act under sub-section 1 (e), and he can not now fall back on sub-section 1 (d) of the Act of 1892. But even if he came within sub-section 1 (d), Form 35 gives a special form of notice, which is not the form of notice used here. The rules and forms embodied in the Act must be used in proceedings under the Act: cf. section 9 and rule 96 of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892. Moreover, this is not a judicial separation made in a divorce or matrimonial cause. If it were so, sub-section 1 (e) would be unnecessary and of no effect. The statute must be construed strictly. A similar point arises under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1 (g), where "a final judgment" is referred to, and it has been held that this phrase must be strictly construed: Ex parte Chinnery, 32 W. R. 469, 12 Q. B. D. 342; In re Binstead, 41 W. R. 452, [1893] 1 Q. B. 199, per Kay, L.J.

JOYCE, J., after stating the facts: It should be observed that the Act of 1878 does not authorize a separation order to be made upon the additional or alternative grounds of persistent cruelty, which was introduced by the Act of 1895, but only upon the ground of a conviction for an aggravated assault. Section 4 of the Act of 1878 was repealed by the Act of 1895, under which the separation order now in question was made. [His lordship then read section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, and continued:] The bishop was accordingly advised that, by virtue of section 38 of the Interpretation Act, the reference in the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, must now be construed and treated as a reference to the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, so as to require the bishop, for the purposes of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, to treat the separation order in the present case just as if it had been a separation order under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878. Accordingly the bishop proceeded to declare the preferment of the plaintiff—that is, the Vicarage of Cowlinge—to be vacant. In my opinion the view of the law which the bishop and his advisers have adopted and acted upon cannot be maintained. Indeed, it was not very strongly supported by the counsel for the defendants.

I cannot regard the provision in the Act of 1895, which authorizes the making of a separation order on the ground of persistent cruelty, as a re-enactment or part of a re-enactment with modifications of the provision in section 4 of the Act of 1878, enabling a separation order to be made upon the ground of conviction for an aggravated assault. The chief contention of the defendant's counsel was that the separation order in this case was an order for judicial separation against a clergyman in a divorce or matrimonial cause, within section 1, sub-section 1 (d), of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892. Now it is quite true that by section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, it is enacted that the provision, in a separation order under that Act, that the applicant be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband shall, while in force, have the effect of a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. Still it is not an order for judicial separation, and at all events such an order by justices—even if a "cause" at all—is not, in my opinion, an order for judicial separation made in a divorce or matrimonial cause, the jurisdiction in which is now vested in one of the Divisions of the High Court. If the separation order here is correctly described as an order for judicial separation, in a matrimonial cause, it is quite clear that a separation order under section 4 of the Act of 1878 must also be an order for judicial separation in a matrimonial cause. But if that were the view of the Legislature, then sub-section 1 (e) of section 1 of the Act of 1892 would be wholly unnecessary. These statutory enactments, which require a bishop to declare the preferment of any clergyman, however disreputable, to be vacant, must be strictly construed, and under the circumstances I find myself compelled to hold that the declaration made by the bishop was unauthorized and invalid. The plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, but I shall stay its operation for three weeks in order that there may be no interference with the services of the church, and in case the defendants shall be advised to appeal. As regards the costs, the bishop made a very pardonable mistake, if it be a mistake, so both parties must pay their own costs.

HORNSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (Appellants) v. HENNELL (Respondent). (a)

Local government—Sewering and paving streets—Apportionment of expenses amongst frontagers—Exemption—Volunteer headquarters—Premises owned and occupied by servants of the Crown for Crown purposes—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 327.

The respondent purchased the fee simple of certain land for the purpose of it being transferred to and used by a volunteer corps, and pursuant to the provisions of the Military Lands Act, 1892, he mortgaged the premises to the Public Works Loan Commissioners for a sum of money which was applied in repaying the respondent the purchase price of the premises and in fitting them up for the use of the corps. The respondent had no use or occupation of the premises otherwise than as commanding officer of the corps.

Held, that there was an ownership and an occupation of the premises on behalf of the Crown for Crown purposes, and, therefore, that the respondent was not liable under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to contribute towards the expense of sewering and paving the street on which the premises fronted.

The principle that Acts of Parliament do not impose pecuniary burdens upon Crown property, unless the Crown is expressly named or unless by necessary implication the Crown has agreed to be bound, was applicable in this case.

Case stated by justices of the peace of the county of Middlesex.

The appellants were the Urban District Council of Hornsey.

The respondent was a colonel in his Majesty's army, and was until March, 1901, the commanding officer of the 1st Volunteer Battalion Middlesex Regiment.

By an indenture made the 15th of June, 1896, between the Suburban Buildings Land Co (Limited) and the respondent certain premises called the "Elms" were granted and conveyed unto and to the use of the respondent, his heirs and assigns, for the sum of £1,910.

The premises were acquired by the respondent for the purpose of transferring them to and in the meantime allowing them to be used by the said volunteer battalion.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In December, 1896, certain portions of the premises, comprising an armoury and a magazine, were duly appointed by the respondent as commanding officer, and approved by the Secretary of State for War, as a storehouse for arms, ammunition, and stores in pursuance of section 26 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, section 6 of the Regulation of the Forces Act, 1871, and an Order in Council made under the last-mentioned section. Since that time these portions of the premises were used solely as such storehouse.

In February, 1897, the Secretary of State for War, on the application of the respondent, in pursuance of section 5, sub-section 1, of the Military Lands Act, 1892, duly approved of the sum of £2,200, repayable in thirty-five years, being borrowed by the battalion for the purpose of acquiring the freehold of the premises.

By an indenture of mortgage, made the 1st of April, 1897, between the respondent and Robert Philpot, the Secretary of the Public Works Loan Commissioners, the respondent granted the premises, and the grants made and to be made to the battalion out of moneys provided by Parliament, unto the said Robert Philpot, as such secretary as aforesaid, and his successors, secretaries as aforesaid, and his and their assigns, by way of mortgage for securing the said sum of £2,200 and interest, and agreed that the premises should, subject to such mortgage, be held by him as such commanding officer and his successors under and by virtue of the terms of the said Volunteer Act, 1863.

The said sum of £2,200 was advanced in pursuance of the mortgage by the Public Works Loan Commissioners through the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and was, together with the sum of about £500 which had been raised by means of voluntary subscriptions, applied by the respondent in repaying himself the purchase-money price of £1,910 of the premises and in altering and fitting up the same for the use of the battalion. The respondent thereupon ceased to have any interest in the premises otherwise than as commanding officer.

The premises since their acquisition by the respondent were used as the headquarters of and for the purposes of the battalion and for no other purpose. No rent or money was ever charged or received by the battalion or its commanding officer for the use of the premises or any part thereof.

The funds of the battalion consisted of grants made and of moneys provided by Parliament, subscriptions from the officers, and some voluntary subscriptions subscribed by other persons for specific purposes. The upkeep of the premises was paid for entirely out of the said Parliamentary grants.

The premises abutted on the east side of a street known as Nightingale-lane. This street was, at the date of the notices hereinafter mentioned, a street (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) within the meaning of section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

In December, 1899, the appellants duly resolved that notices should be served upon the respective owners and occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on the said street, under section 150, requiring them to sewer, level, pave, metal, flag, channel, and make good the street, and on the 24th of January, 1900, notice under the said section was duly served on (amongst others) the respondent.

The notices were not complied with, and the appellants executed the work therein mentioned themselves and completed the same on or before the 15th of October, 1900.

The expenses incurred by the appellants in executing the works were thereupon apportioned by their surveyor, and the sum of £409 10s. 9d. was so apportioned on the respondent in respect of the said premises, and notice of such apportionment was duly served upon him and he did not within the space of three months dispute the same.

On the 20th of February, 1901, notice demanding payment of the said sum of £409 10s. 9d. by the respondent was duly served upon him, but he refused to pay the same, and the appellants commenced summary proceedings for the recovery of the sum, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum, from the 20th of February, 1901, which came before the justices for hearing at Highgate on the 16th of October, 1901.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that the respondent was the owner of the premises at the time when the works were completed, and that he was liable accordingly to pay to the appellants the share apportioned in respect of the frontage of the premises to Nightingale-lane of the expenses of executing such works.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the premises were owned and occupied by servants of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown, and consequently that he was exempt from liability to pay any of the expenses so apportioned.

The justices were of opinion that the respondent was not liable to pay the expenses so apportioned, and dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the respondent was liable to pay the share of the said expenses apportioned upon him as aforesaid in respect of the frontage to Nightingale-lane of the said premises.

Section 327 of the Public Health Act, 1875, enacts that "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize any local authority . . . (2) to disturb or interfere with any lands or other property vested in . . . her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the War Department for the time being . . . without the consent in every case of such . . . Secretary of State . . ."

Bray, K.C. (Alexander Glen with him), for the appellants.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the following judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 15.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment of the court:

This was an appeal by the Hornsey Urban District Council against a decision of the justices of Middlesex sitting at the Highgate Petty Sessions, dismissing a complaint made by the appellants against the respondent to recover the sum of £409 10s. 9d., being the apportioned amount of expenses incurred by the appellants in sewering, levelling, and paving a certain street called Nightingale-lane under the provisions of section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The ground of the decision was that under the circumstances of the case the respondent, who had acquired the premises in question as colonel of a volunteer corps, was not liable to pay the amount of the apportionment. In order to appreciate the point which arises upon this appeal it is, in our opinion, necessary to state accurately the facts upon which the question arises.

The respondent was, up to March, 1901, the commanding officer of the First Battalion Middlesex Rifle Volunteers. In the year 1896 the respondent purchased the fee simple of certain lands at Hornsey for the sum of £1,910. The land was purchased by him for the purpose of it being transferred to and used by the volunteer battalion. In 1899 the premises so acquired were, pursuant to the provisions of the Military Lands Act, 1892, mortgaged to the Public Works Loan Commissioners for the sum of £2 200. The money so received was applied to repay the amount paid by the respondent in purchasing the premises and in fitting them up for the use of the volunteer battalion. The premises abut on Nightingale-lane. In December, 1899, the appellants duly served notices for the sewering, paving, &c., of Nightingale-lane under the provisions of section 150 of the Public Health Act. The work was subsequently executed by them. The amount apportioned, a sum of £409 10s. 9d., is agreed to be the amount due from the respondent as the legal owner of the premises if he is not exempt from payment. The lands in question were acquired under and by virtue of sections 24, 25, and 26 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and the mortgage, as already stated, was under the provisions of the Military Lands Act, 1892

It was contended by Mr. Bray, on behalf of the appellants, that, inasmuch as by virtue of section 3 of the Military Lands Act, 1892. the land could be let in any manner consistent with the use thereof for military purposes, and that it would not vest in the Secretary of State until after the disbandment of the corps, the respondent, as the legal owner, was liable to pay the apportionment, and that the case of the Westminster Vestry v. Hoskins, [1899] 2 Q. B. 474, 48 W. R. Dig. 124, was an authority in his favour binding upon us.

It was contended on behalf of the Attorney-General that the land being in fact purchased, owned, and occupied solely for the purpose of the volunteer corps, it must be taken to be owned and occupied solely for the purpose of the volunteer corps, it must be taken to be owned and occupied for Crown purposes, and that, therefore, the amount of the apportionment could not be recovered, as section 150 was not binding upon the Crown. We are of opinion that the contention of the Crown is right, and that the appeal should be dismissed. The liability to pay the apportionment depends upon the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 150, as has been frequently pointed out, contemplates a notice being given to the owners or occupiers to carry out the work specified, and, upon their failure to carry it out, empowers the authority to execute the works and recover the expense from the various owners. Section 213 provides that the expense may be treated as private improvement expenses and recovered by private improvement rates spread over a series of years. Section 257 provides for the recovery of the apportioned amount either at once or by instalments. Section 327, which was relied on by Mr. Bray, contains certain protective clauses with reference to lands vested in the Admiralty or War Office.

In our opinion, for the reasons given by Lawrance, J., and Collins, L.J., in the case of Pearson v. Assessment Committee of Holborn Union, [1893] 1 Q B. 389, at pp. 395 and 397, 41 W. R. Dig. 165, these lands were being held for military purposes, and the respondent had no use or occupation of the premises otherwise than as colonel commanding the corps, and in discharge of his duties as such, and is in fact a mere trustee for the corps, having no personal beneficial interest. This is, in our opinion, an ownership and an occupation for and on behalf of the Crown, and the appellants must show some words which impose upon the Crown an obligation to do the work or pay the expense of it. The principle that Acts of Parliament do not impose pecuniary burdens upon Crown property unless the Crown is expressly named, or unless by necessary implication the Crown has agreed to be bound, is, in our opinion, still applicable to such a case. No doubt the insertion in many Acts of Parliament of clauses to protect the Crown or save Crown rights has given rise to the impression that this rule has to some extent been trenched upon, and we are far from saying that there may not be provisions in public Acts of Parliament so framed as to bind the Crown, even though the Crown may not be specially named.

But in our opinion the intention that the Crown shall be bound, or has agreed to be bound, must clearly appear either from the language used, or from the nature of the enactments, and there is, in our opinion, nothing of the kind in the provisions of the Public Health Act applicable to this case which gives rise to any such presumption. Nothing would be gained by considering in detail the various authorities which were cited in support of this view, but we would call attention to the judgment of Lord Tenterden in Smithett v. Blythe, 1 B. & Ad. 509, in the year 1830, in which there was an express exemption of King's ships of war from light dues. Other vessels of the Crown were held not to be liable, although they were not mentioned in the express exemption, or, in other words, that the general doctrine of the immunity of the Crown applied notwithstanding the insertion of an express exempting clause as to certain matters. Similarly in the case of the Mayor of Weymouth v. Nugent, 13 W. R. 338, 6 B. & S 22, stone brought for the use of her Majesty's navy was held exempt from wharfage duties created by statute upon the same principle, notwithstanding the insertion of special exemptions in favour of certain Crown property, and it was pointed out by Cockburn, C.J., that these exemptions were merely inserted ex majore cautela, and the case of Coomber v. Justices of Berks in 1883, 32 W. R. 525, 9 App. Cas. 61, which was a case of income tax, is strongly illustrative of the principle. It is, moreover, right to observe that in the case of the Lord Advocate v. Barber, reported in 5 Ct. Sess. Cas. 3rd series, 84, Crown property was held exempt from an exactly similar burden.

Having regard to the above authorities we cannot accept the argument that the limited exemption of certain Government lands in section 327 of the Public Health Act is sufficient to show that all other interests of the Crown were intended to be affected by the provisions of the Act. The limited language of the exceptions in section 327 appears to us to support the view that they were inserted ex abundante cautela, and we believe that if careful search is made there are many similar Acts in which no clauses protecting Crown rights have been inserted. There is, in our opinion, no such general practice as to lead to the view that the original doctrine of Crown exemption has ceased to exist or has been infringed upon, or that the insertion of a particular protecting clause is intended to show that only that class of Crown property was intended to be exempt. With reference to the case of the Vestry of Westminster v. Hoskins, relied upon by Mr. Bray, it is certainly not an authority upon the point now raised before us, but after the argument which was addressed to us in this case we are not prepared to say that we should have come to the same conclusion. The case of Rayner v. Drewitt, 82 L. T. Rep. 718, 48 W. R. Dig. 105, does not apply, as in that case the premises were not used solely for Crown purposes.

For the above reasons we are of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

ELLIOTT v. ZIGGINS. (a.)

Master and servant—Agreement as to compensation—Right to sue for wages while receiving compensation—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37).

Where a workman has by agreement received weekly compensation during incapacity for injuries, he cannot afterwards sue for wages during the period of incapacity, even though he still remains during that period in the employment of his master.

Appeal from Judge Ingham, of the Coventry County Court.

This was an appeal by the defendant Ziggins, the employer of the plaintiff Elliott, against a judgment for £22 15s., being the balance of wages alleged to be due to the plaintiff under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff Elliott had been in the employ of the appellant at a salary of 35s. a week, and was in the course of his employment partially incapacitated by an accident which occurred on the 2nd of July, 1901.

He served the usual statutory notice on the appellant, and on the 13th of August he was awarded (by agreement) 17s. 6d. per week during incapacity.

The plaintiff, however, still remained in the employ of the appellant. Disputes arose between the appellant and the plaintiff over an invention of the latter's, which he alleged was not being properly worked by the appellant, and on the 2nd of November, 1901, he was given a week's notice by the appellant. Elliott (the workman) then sued for (inter alia) £15 3s. 4d., being the balance of wages at the rate of 35s. a week between the 11th of July and the 2nd of November.

The county court judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that he was entitled to his full wages till notice was given.

Parfitt, for the appellant, the defendant—The agreement of the 13th of August was clearly in substitution for the contract of service. It could not be contended that the plaintiff should do no work and yet be able to claim full wages.

Newson, for the plaintiff.—Until notice is given the plaintiff is entitled to his wages, and the fact that he has received compensation under the Act does not take away any of his other rights. In Cuckson v. Stones, 7 W. R. 134, 1 E. & E. 248, it was decided that a workman who is incapacitated by illness is entitled to full wages during illness, even though he has not done any work.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I wish to repeat what I said in a case a few days ago, that the Workmen's Compensation Act was not intended to be a complete code in which you would find provision for every case which might arise. In the present case I doubt whether it would be to the advantage of the workman that his contention should prevail, as it would lead in very many cases to notice of dismissal to the workman being given. Section 1, sub-section 2 (b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act provides that the workman may at his option either claim compensation under this Act or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the Act; and by section 1, sub-section 3 it is provided that employers and workmen may agree as to the compensation to be paid. Then with respect to the amount of compensation, by sub-section (b) of the first schedule it is provided that where partial incapacity results from the injury a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding fifty per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound.

In the present case the workman received by agreement half his wages. This agreement is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the view that he was still entitled to his agreed wages. If they were still to be paid, paragraph 2 of the first schedule—which provides that in fixing the amount to be paid weekly, regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount he is able to earn after the accident, and to any payment, not being wages, which he may receive from the employer in respect of his injury during the period of his incapacity—would be quite useless. If effect is given to the plaintiff's contention you would have to say that the employer must in every case, to get rid of the claim for wages, give a notice of dismissal. In my judgment a workman who has received compensation in respect of an injury, duly assessed under the Act, cannot afterwards turn round and say, I want wages also. This judgment, therefore, cannot stand.

DARLING, J.—I agree. In my opinion a workman who makes a claim under this Act and receives compensation under the Act receives it in lieu of wages. If that be not so he would be entitled to full wages as well as compensation, even though he had not done any work and could not earn them. Mr. Newson admitted that his argument must amount to that. I cannot think that the Legislature intended any such consequence. I do not think that our judgment, even though it goes against this particular workman, is against workmen as a class, for if this judgment were to stand it would lead to employers discharging their workmen directly an accident happened.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think that a workman getting compensation under this Act is estopped from saying that wages are still due to him.

Appeal allowed.

ANDREW v. GROVE. (a.)

County court—Practice—Costs—Power to make successful defendant pay plaintiff's costs—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 113.

A county court judge has no jurisdiction to order a successful defendant to pay the costs of the plaintiff.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of the county court judge of Plymouth and East Stonehouse so far as it related to an order adjudging him to pay the costs of the plaintiff, who was unsuccessful.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action, which was commenced in the High Court and remitted to the county court, was brought against the defendant, a commission agent, to recover £90, being the amount of a debt. The defendant set up the defence (1) that the transaction was a betting transaction within the Gaming Act, 1845, and (2) that the bookmaker did not lay the odds on the ground that it was too late.

At the trial the plaintiff called the defendant as her own witness, and he denied that the bet had been accepted or made. The learned judge said that as she had done so she was bound by his statements, and he gave judgment for the defendant, but ordered him to pay the plaintiff's costs, as he, the learned judge, considered his statements a tissue of lies and thought that he had perpetrated a swindle.

The defendant now appealed against the order as to costs.

Colam, for the appellant.—The county court judge had no power to make this order. A judge even of the High Court has no power to make a successful defendant pay the plaintiff's costs: Dicks v. Yates, 18 Ch. D. 76 29 W. R. Dig. 57; Foster v. Great Western Railway, 30 W. R. 398, 8 Q. B. D. 515; In re Mills, 35 W. R. 65, 34 Ch. D. 24. By section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which provides that "all the costs of any action or matter in the court, not herein otherwise provided for, shall be paid by or apportioned between the parties in such manner as the court shall think just, and in default of any special direction shall abide the event of the action or matter, and execution may issue for the recovery of any such costs in like manner as for any debt adjudged in the said court," power as to costs is given to county court judges; but that power is no wider than the power given by the Judicature Acts and rules to judges of the High Court. The discretion given by section 113 must be a discretion within the Act and rules. By section 116 it is provided that with respect to an action founded on contract brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court, if the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than £20 he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action. In this case, which could have been commenced in the county court, the plaintiff did not recover anything, and she is therefore clearly not entitled to costs: Solomon v. Mulliner, 49 W. R. 364, [1901] 1 K. B. 76; see also County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50A, r. 17.

Ashton Cross, for the respondent.—Section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), which Act was passed subsequent to the date of the first three cases cited on behalf of the appellant, provides that "the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, and the court or judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent such costs are to be paid." Section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, gives to the county court judge the same power as to costs as section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, gives to the judges of the High Court. Section 5 was enacted in order to confer greater power as to costs upon the judges of the High Court: In re Fisher, 42 W. R. 241, [1894] 1 Ch. 53, 450. In the present case the conduct of the defendant was sufficient "good cause" for the learned judge ordering him to pay the plaintiff's costs. The plaintiff was entitled to bring the action, though it was open to the defendant to plead in defence the Gaming Act.

Colam, in reply.—The plaintiff had no right to bring the action, as it was in respect of a betting transaction within the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think the words in that section, "no suit shall be brought or maintained," &c., refer to a right to succeed in an action, not a right to issue a writ.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The proposition put forward on behalf of the respondent is a startling one, because, subject to the Act of 1890, which is not in question here, the High Court had not until then any such power as is now claimed for the judge of a county court. Section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, enables the county court judge to award costs in the exercise of a judicial discretion, but, in order that he should have power to exercise a judicial discretion, a right of action or a right of defence must have been established to enable him to exercise discretion. In Dicks v. Yates the objection was taken that there was no appeal because it was a matter of costs only, but the Court of Appeal expressed the view that, as there was no right to make a successful defendant pay the plaintiff's costs, it was an appeal on the merits and and not as to costs. The same principle was recognized in Foster v. Great Western Railway and in In re Mills. It seems to me that we ought not to put the construction on section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, that the judge has this power in the county court, unless the language of the section forces us to do so. I do not think that section 116 is conclusive against the right of the plaintiff to maintain this order, simply on the ground of the words "which could not have been commenced in the county court," but I come to the conclusion that this power, now claimed for the first time, does not exist in the county court, and that where the defendant is successful there is no jurisdiction in the county court to order him to pay the plaintiff's costs.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CHANNELL, J.—I am also of the same opinion. I may add, however, that the county court judge has, of course, power, where the defendant has been guilty of misconduct, to order him, although successful, to pay such part of the plaintiff's costs as has been caused by his misconduct.

HOLLAND (Appellant) v. HALL (Respondent). (a.)

Hawker—Taking round sewing machines—Offer for sale to persons who had not previously requested agent to call—Hawkers Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 33), ss. 2, 6.

A person who carries about from place to place, or to other men's houses, by means of a horse and cart, unsold goods and offers them on approval for the purpose of sale is a hawker within the meaning of section 2 of the Hawkers Act, 1888, and the fact that the goods had been shown only to persons of whom it had been ascertained by means of a canvasser that they would like to see them, and would probably be purchasers, does not prevent the person showing them from being a hawker within the meaning of the statute.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated.

This was a special case stated by the justices of the peace for the West Riding of the county of York.

At a petty sessions at Otley, on the 16th of August, 1901, an information was preferred by the appellant, Joseph Holland, an Inland Revenue officer, against William Hall and Fred Poppleston, for recovery of the penalty imposed by section 6 of the Hawkers Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 33). The information charged that Hall and Poppleston traded as hawkers on the 19th of April, 1901, in the parish of Ilkley, without having in force a proper licence as required by the statute.

The summons appeared not to have been served upon Poppleston, and the information was heard as against Hall alone.

The facts found by the special case were as follows: The Hawkers Act, 1888, imposes a duty upon an Excise licence to be taken out by every hawker in the United Kingdom, subject to certain exemptions, none of which applied to the present case. Section 2 of the Act defines a hawker as follows: "'Hawker' means any person who travels with a horse or other beast bearing or drawing burden, and goes from place to place or to other men's houses, carrying to sell or exposing for sale any goods, wares, or merchandize, or exposing samples or patterns of any goods, wares, or merchandize to be afterwards delivered, and includes any person who travels by any means of locomotion to any place in which he does not usually reside or carry on business, and there sells or exposes for sale any goods, wares, or merchandize in or at any house, shop, room, booth, stall, or other place whatever hired or used by him for that purpose."

It was proved that on the 19th of April, 1901, the respondent and Poppleston were in the employment of the Singer Manufacturing Co., who are makers of sewing machines. They started from Shipley on that day with a horse drawing a covered van, in which were five sewing machines. They were first seen at Ilkley, and about an hour later at Ben Rhydding. Shipley, Ilkley, and Ben Rhydding are all separate and distinct places. At Ben Rhydding they were seen to go with the van to two houses known as "Redgarth" and "Fieldhurst." At "Redgarth" they saw a servant, and asked her if any order had been given at that house for a sewing machine. Upon receiving a reply in the negative they asked her to buy a machine, and remained for two or three minutes trying to persuade her to do so, and offered to fetch a machine from the van, but she refused to buy one. At "Fieldhurst" they saw two servants. James Bailey, a canvasser employed by the Singer Manufacturing Co., had on the 17th of April called at this house and had seen these two servants, and had asked them to buy a sewing machine. He had no machines with him on that day, and upon offering to send a machine on approval was told he might to do so. Bailey did not mention any particular kind of machine nor any price, and there was no agreement made by either of the two servants with him to purchase a machine. When the respondent and Poppleston went to "Fieldhurst" the two servants refused to buy a machine, and then Poppleston asked if he might leave one there till evening. He left one, and it was called for on the 22nd of April by one of the company's agents.

It was also proved that when the respondent and Poppleston started on their rounds on the 19th of April, with the five machines they had instructions to call at eight different houses to show machines on approval. These houses included "Fieldhurst," but did not include "Redgarth." None of the persons in these eight houses had agreed to buy a machine, but they had previously expressed to a canvasser of the Singer Manufacturing Co. a desire to see a machine in order to decide whether they would make a purchase. The five machines in the van were taken out to show to the people at these eight houses. Three of the machines were taken back to Shipley at the close of the day; one had been left at "Fieldhurst" as above mentioned, but no evidence was given as to what had become of the fifth machine. It was stated by the respondent, in giving evidence on his own behalf, that the machines were shown on approval, and, if satisfactory, they would be sold.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the respondent travelled with a horse drawing a burden, that he went from place to place, and to other men's houses, and that the machines were carried for sale. In support of this contention the case of O'Dea v. Crowhurst, 80 L. T. Rep. 491, 47 W. R. Dig. 66, was cited.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the Act did not apply to a large firm paying rates and taxes, but was intended to be a protection to the public against dishonest persons; that the machines were merely sent out to be taken to houses at which a canvasser had previously called; that they had been previously ordered and were not carried for sale.

The following cases were cited: Rex v. Little, 1 Burr. 609; Rex v. Buckle, 4 East, 346; and Johnson and Others v. Hudson, 11 East, 181.

The justices found as a fact that none of the five sewing machines had been sold when the respondent left Shipley with the van, but upon the evidence given they were of opinion that the machines were not carried for sale within the meaning of the Act inasmuch as it was intended to offer them only to persons already visited by a canvasser, and they accordingly dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts above mentioned the justices were right in point of law in holding as aforesaid that the machines had not been carried for sale.

S. A. T. Rowlatt (Sir E. Carson, S.G., with him), for the appellant.—A hawker is defined in section 2 of the Hawkers Act, 1888. The respondent comes within that definition; he travelled with a horse drawing a burden, and he went from place to place, or other men's houses, carrying the sewing machines to sell them. He is therefore a hawker within the meaning of the Act. O'Dea v. Crowhurst supports this contention.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. (T. J. Bullen with him), for the respondent.—The whole question here is whether in carrying these sewing machines, which were to be shown to persons in houses at which a canvasser of the company had previously called, there was a "carrying to sell" within the meaning of the Act, and the person so carrying becomes a hawker and requires a licence. Upon the evidence before the justices there was no case against the respondent. To leave a machine on approval is not to sell it. This was only a case of goods sent on sale or return. They were being carried about with a view to be shown on approval. That is not a carrying for sale within the meaning of the Act. Even if one of the machines had been sold at a house at which a canvasser had not previously called, still that would not have been a carrying for sale and an offence within the section, as the agent did not start with the intention of so selling. O'Dea v. Crowhurst is quite a different case from the present and is no authority in favour of the contention on behalf of the appellant.

S. A. T. Rowlatt replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case I have felt very great difficulty, and I confess my mind has fluctuated more than once during the argument. If the finding of the magistrates had amounted to a finding that the machines were only taken to be offered for approval, or were only sent on approval in pursuance of a previous request made to the canvasser, I should have thought we could not interfere; but, after carefully considering the finding of the magistrates, it seems to me that they have not found that or intended to find it. Their finding is expressed in these words: "We were of opinion that the machines were not carried for sale within the meaning of the Act, inasmuch as it was intended to offer them only to persons already visited by a canvasser, and we accordingly dismissed the information." I understand that finding to be this: not that they find that they were not offered for sale, but that they were only offered for sale to persons who had been previously canvassed. Now I think, if that is so, the magistrates were wrong in holding that this man was not going about travelling "with a horse or other beast bearing or drawing burden," and going "from place to place"; in fact, wrong in holding that he was not a hawker. I think the line of division may be fairly clearly ascertained. If there is merely the sending of articles in order that people may inspect them and see them that would not make a man who takes them a hawker, even although ultimately at some future time a sale might result. On the other hand, it does not seem to me to be the less an offering for sale because the persons who are likely to be purchasers have been ascertained before the hawker visits the house. Now in this case I think there was abundant evidence on which the magisirates could find, and I think they ought to have found, that these machines were taken about for sale although they were primâ facie intended only to be offered on this occasion to persons whose names had been sent in to the head place of business by the canvasser; and I think certainly with regard to what happened on this occasion that it was quite clear there was evidence that they were offered for sale to persons who names had not been sent in by the canvasser. Possibly that would not be a sufficient ground in one sense, because it is only what I may call an exception, and not the general case that it was supposed was being dealt with by the magistrates. I come to the conclusion that on these facts the magistrates must be taken to have found that the machines were being offered for sale, and that the only reason that they thought the man was not within the section was that they were offered for sale to persons whose names had been previously mentioned. I think that that distinction is not sufficient, and therefore the appeal ought to be allowed.

DARLING, J.—In my view of this case the magistrates have definitely decided that a person who carries about from place to place, by means of a horse and cart, unsold goods, and then leaves them on approval—so that they are by those means sold—does not carry them to sell within the meaning of the Hawkers Act, 1888, s. 2. As a reason for this opinion they rely entirely on the fact that the persons who purchased them had previously expressed to a canvasser a desire to see the goods in order to decide whether to purchase them or not. I cannot see that it makes any difference whether this desire was expressed to the person who carried the goods or to another, his associate. If this did alter the case, then an ordinary pedlar would require no licence if he left his goods at an inn, himself went round and canvassed people and then took his goods to those who had expressed a wish to see them. It appears to me that the fact on which the magistrates rely is really immaterial to the decision of the question. I think that the respondent is shown, on the evidence in this case, to have gone from place to place, from house to house, carrying goods to sell and exposing them for sale; and the fact that the goods were shown only to those of whom it had been ascertained that they would like to see them does not, in my opinion, prevent the exhibitor from being a hawker within the meaning of the statute. Therefore I think the magistrates came to a wrong conclusion.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think there is abundant evidence stated in the case to justify a conviction of the respondent for trading as a hawker. The only difficulty arises as to the finding of the magistrates on that evidence. If the respondent, and the man with him, were taking the sewing machines in the van from place to place in order to sell the goods, they were hawking within the meaning of the statute. If they had been delivering goods in pursuance of previous contracts of sale, of course they would not have been hawking, and equally if they were delivering goods on approval in pursuance of previous orders to send goods on approval they would not be hawking. But if they were taking goods about in order to find customers for them they would not escape being hawkers by having sent a person beforehand, whether an hour or so before, or whether a day or two before, to ascertain what persons would be likely to be customers and be willing to look at their goods, and then only calling with the cart at places ascertained to be favourable for business.

Now we have to see whether the magistrates who have refused to convict have found facts which show that the respondent was not hawking. They have found that "it was intended to offer the machines only to persons already visited by the canvasser." If that means that the goods were only sent out for delivery on approval to particular persons who had requested goods to be delivered to them on approval, it would not be hawking; but that is not expressly found, and the facts as to the number of machines and the number of houses seem to negative that view of the case. It seems to me that the finding of the magistrates only comes to this, that the respondent was carrying the goods from place to place to sell them, but he was only intending to try to sell them at certain houses where it had been ascertained that there were likely customers. I think that is hawking within the statute, and on that view of the facts the case of O'Dea v. Crowhurst appears to cover this case. I think the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed, with costs. Case remitted with direction to convict.

MOFFATT & PAIGE (LIMITED) v. GILL & SONS (LIMITED) AND MARSHALL. (a.)

Copyright—Common sources of information—Infringement—Injunction.

An author may avail himself of common sources of information on a subject, but he is not entitled to save himself pains and labour by adopting a predecessor's work with but colourable variations, even though such predecessor's work is based on materials which are common property. Thus an author is not at liberty to avail himself of the taste and judgment of a predecessor in illustrating his work by quotations, nor can he justify taking such quotations on the ground that he has simply followed the references given by his predecessor and copied the quotations from the original works.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (49 W. R. 438), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 49 W. R. 438).

In the year 1893 the plaintiff company published an annotated edition of Shakespeare's "As You Like It" by Thomas Page.

In 1898 the defendant company published a similar work edited by the defendant Marshall.

An action was brought by the plaintiff company against the defendant company on the ground that the last mentioned work was an infringement of their copyright.

This action was not contested by the defendant company, but on their agreeing to pay a sum by way of damages and to destroy all copies of the book the proceedings were stayed. The defendant Marshall was not a party to these proceedings.

In March, 1900, the defendant company published what purported to be a second edition of their work. This edition the plaintiff company declared to be a colourable imitation of their work and an infringement of their copyright. In particular they claimed that the general arrangement, the sketches of character, the literary notes and glossary, and the illustrative quotations were largely copied from their book, and were not the result of independent research.

They claimed damages, an injunction to restrain the infringement of their copyright, and the delivery up of all copies of the book which were in the defendants' possession.

The claim was restricted to the second edition, two paragraphs which dealt with the first edition having been struck out as tending to prejudice the fair trial of the action.

By his defence the defendant Marshall denied that he had done more than make a legitimate use of the plaintiffs' book in common with the works of other commentators, but admitted that, for the sake of convenience, he had copied out of the plaintiffs' book a quotation from another writer.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Scrutton, K.C., replied.

The arguments used appear sufficiently from the judgments.

COLLINS, M.R., discussed the character and objects of the books in question, and continued: Kekewich, J. after a long hearing, came to the conclusion—upon grounds which I shall have to comment upon in a moment—as the result of the proceedings before him that he could not interfere to restrain the defendants from publishing the incriminated work. But when I say that of Kekewich, J., I think that in all other respects I have his authority for the opinion which I have myself formed in this case, for I am about to show that but for one particular circumstance Kekewich, J., would have been of opinion, and in fact was of opinion, that the present edition of the defendants' work was an infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright. Now in order to show that, I propose to read a passage from Kekewich, J.'s judgment, to show—first, what his real opinion is, and secondly, for what reason he has not given it effect. [His lordship read from the judgment of Kekewich, J., "The history of preparation of the first edition . . . to which such infringement would entitle them in this court," and continued:] Therefore we have a clear opinion by the learned judge that but for a particular reason which he thought insuperable his own opinion was, on the admitted facts of the genesis of the second edition, as demonstrated from the lips of the author himself, that the second edition was just in the same sense as the first an infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright. Now that was his opinion if he had been at liberty to look at all the facts. You have had the first edition, which, as the learned judge says, the defendant himself could hardly deny was nothing short of a copy, and a servile copy in many important parts, of the plaintiffs' work. And you have as the result of cross-examinations the exact process of evolution described—how the defendant used the first in the preparation of the second, and when we come to examine it we have had it stated before us again. It seems to me that the learned judge was perfectly right in that view. The first edition was demonstrably an infringement, and this was admitted by the publisher certainly, though not in the first proceedings by the author because he was not a party to them, but as a result of the examinations in this case we have a practical admission by the author himself that the first edition cannot be defended.

What is the process that the defendant has adopted and by which his second edition has been developed? He has in his possession the proofs of the first edition; he carefully re-reads those proofs and he put marks which, though they do not efface them from his view, do mark the fact that certain particular passages are such that he thinks, having regard to what happened in the first trial, cannot stand. He marks those passages, but they are so marked as to be still obvious to the eye and capable of being read, although they do bear a mark that they are not to appear as they are in the new edition. Having that before his eye—his own work no doubt, but in fact, so far as the matters in this case are concerned, practically the work of the plaintiff, because it is a copy of the plaintiff's garbled to a certain extent, but nothing better than a copy—he makes certain marks indicating what passages cannot stand, and for which, therefore, substitution must be found. Having that before him, we see as the result in the second edition the changes of expression he has made while conveying the same thing in substance—the alteration of the order of quotations while leaving the quotations there themselves, the retention of the string of quotations used and the purpose to which they were applied; and further, the same general system of analogies of character which had been originally in the plaintiffs' work and had been reproduced by the defendant in the first edition of his own. That broadly (I am not pretending to deal with it with exactitude of detail) is the process by which the second edition was reproduced, and as Kekewich, J., says, but for the particular barrier (which I have not endeavoured to deal with), if he were at liberty to take the first and second together he would have had no hesitation in holding that the second edition was an infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright. That being so, what was the reason why he did not give effect to that view and restrain so far as was necessary the publication of the obnoxious parts. This was the reason, and when one examines it (with the greatest possible respect to the learned judge) it seems to me that he must have really misunderstood what actually had happened in the matter. The plaintiff in this action did what plaintiffs are very often disposed to do, he introduced a little colouring into the statement of claim by setting out facts as to the earlier infringement by the first edition. Now this action is not brought for that first infringement; it is brought for the infringement of the second edition, and it was a little ornamental rhetorical character which led him to introduce into the narrative of and genesis of the second edition what was in the first. It did not affect the publication of the second issue, and it may have been thought to prejudice the production of the particular issue, and for that reason, and for that reason only, it was struck out, but that did not alter or wipe out of history the fact that the defendant was the author of a work which pirated the plaintiffs' work. It did not undo that; that remained exactly where it was before, and just as the defendants, the publishers, and indirectly the defendant, had to submit to the destruction of all the copies of the first edition, so he would have been debarred from reissuing again the same work in the same language. He would have been debarred from doing that, and being debarred from doing that he is equally debarred from doing anything that is a mere colourable imitation.

So we are entitled to look at the first edition, and see how far in the process of evolution the first edition is the father of the second, and when we examine it, in the language of the learned judge we find how the second was evolved from the first and how the defendant had practically debarred himself from writing a work which was an original work and was not a mere reflex of examination and memory of the first edition. The defendant himself, as we have heard, has been signally successful in passing this class of examination, and no doubt if that experience develops anything, it develops the memory, and he has shown, if we accept his own explanation of how these things are done, that he does possess a most singularly retentive memory, because demonstrably pages from the work of the plaintiffs have been reproduced practically verbatim in the defendant's work. Of course I give the defendant credit for the most absolute veracity. I do not know whether the learned judge has—it is pressed upon us that he did, but I have looked carefully through the notes and I cannot say that it appears that the learned judge did place the most absolute confidence in him, certainly he did not compliment him on his veracity, and told him frankly without circumvention to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Giving him all credit for telling the truth, it is certainly demonstrated that he had a most remarkable memory, and he does not do himself justice, being gifted with such a memory and being able to reproduce whole passages of the book without looking at it, if he has saturated his mind with that work and then produced another work on the same lines himself. He has handicapped himself by doing that and attempted a thing which is beyond his capacity, because the work is to a very large degree, standing by itself on its own merits, an infringement of the plaintiffs' work.

I do not propose to go into a minute comparison of, or detail the passages of which the one is the author and the original of the other. I think that is proved by some of the passages that have been referred to in detail by the learned counsel. I do not propose to deal in detail with those matters because I am content to take the learned judge's own view from the passages which I have read, and when I have displaced the only reasons, as I think I have done, why the learned judge felt himself fettered in giving full effect to his strong conclusion of fact—when I have removed that, it seems to me I have removed the only bar from differing from the learned judge's actual judgment and giving effect to that which was really his true opinion. Now, how does the matter stand in point of law? The defendant here does not really deny that the plaintiffs' work is the subject-matter of copyright. He has addressed arguments to us as far as is possible for him which, in my view, are only relevant to that issue, but when pressed with that he said, No, he did not go so far as to contend that the plaintiffs' work was not the subject-matter of copyright, though the arguments he addressed to us upon the matter were more relevant to that than to the question whether he was infringing or not. So that I start with the admission that the plaintiffs' work is the subject-matter of copyright, and I have not the slightest doubt that it is. As I have already said, though perhaps it does not rank in the higher scale of literature, it has shown a very considerable amount of skill, and certainly the adaptation of means to ends, but whatever we think of the end, the means seem so admirably adapted to the attempt that it has been paid the highest compliment one man can pay to another — namely, the compliment of imitation. Now, how does it stand in law? The sources from which these works were drawn were common; it was open to anybody to compile an edition of "As You Like It," and open to him to go to all the sources of criticism and to make selections from them. It was open to him to cull quotations from the book and to put them together as he has done, but clearly that was subject-matter of copyright for him. He has shown skill and industry and many higher qualities. I have read the work through, and it seems to me, for a work of its kind, to be a very scholarly work, done in a terse and businesslike manner which leaves something to be admired, or, at all events, something that the defendant did not quite succeed in achieving himself. If I may choose between the two, I prefer the directness and brevity of the plaintiffs' work to that of the defendant. Therefore there is no doubt whatever, as it seems to me, that the plaintiffs' work was one which was subject-matter of copyright, but, as I have said, the materials were open to the world.

Now, there is some authority on this matter. The question has arisen before, and I only propose to refer to one or two passages from authorities which are binding upon the matter. I refer first of all to the case of Jarrold v. Houlston, 3 K. & J. 708, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 19. That is a case where there was a question between two publications, one called The Guide to Science, and the other called The Reason Why. I do not propose to read the whole of the head-note out, there are one or two propositions which are material: "But another person may another work in the same general form provided he does so from his own resources and makes the work he so originates a work of his own by his own labour and industry bestowed upon it. In determining whether an injunction should be ordered, the question, where the matter of the plaintiff's work is not original, is, How far an unfair or undue use has been made of the work. Instances of unfair or undue use and the contrary in works of this description. If, instead of searching into the common sources and obtaining your subject-matter from thence, you avail yourself of the labour of your predecessor, adopt his arrangement and questions, or adopt them with a colourable variation, it is an illegitimate use." And on p. 716 there is this passage: "The question I really have to try is whether the use that in this case has been made of the plaintiff's book has gone beyond a fair use. Now, for trying that question, several tests have been laid down. One which was originally expressed, I think, by a common law judge, and adopted by Lord Langdale in Lewis v. Fullarton, 2 Beav. 6, is, whether you find on the part of the defendant an animus furandi—an intention to take for the purpose of saving himself labour. I take the illegitimate use as opposed to the legitimate use of another man's work on subject-matters of this description to be this: If knowing that a person whose work is protected by copyright has with considerable labour compiled from various sources a work in itself not original, but which he has digested and arranged, you, being minded to compile a work of a like description, instead of taking the pains of searching into all the common sources and obtaining your subject-matter from them, avail yourself of the labour of your predecessor, adopt his arrangements, adopt, moreover, the very questions he has asked, or adopt them with but a slight degree of colourable variation, and thus save yourself pains and labour by availing yourself of the pains and labour which he has employed; that I take to be an illegitimate use." That seems to me to cover substantially what the defendant has done in this case. There are only one or two more passages that I desire to refer to. The next is in the case of Spiers v. Brown, 6 W. R. 352. It is a case of the compiler of Spiers' Dictionary against a man named Brown. What I refer to it for, is a passage in the judgment of Page Wood, V.C., in which he mentions this: "In the instance mentioned by Sir Samuel Romilly a work consisting of a selection from various authors two men perhaps might make the same selection, but that must be by resorting to the original authors, not by taking advantage of the selection already made by another." That anticipates the very question which was put in the course of the argument in this case, as to whether you could have copyright in quotation, selected to emphasise or illustrate some particular idea, and that is evidently an expression of the Vice-Chancellor's opinion that that would the subject-matter of a copyright. He put it as an obvious instance of something that would be the subject-matter of copyright. But it does not stand there because it is a quotation from the judgment of Lord Eldon in which he refers to a passage quoted by Sir Samuel Romilly in argument, and refers to it in a way which shows that he assents to it. It is in the case of Longman v. Winchester, 16 Ves. 269, at p. 271, referring first of all to Paterson's Road Book, Lord Eldon says: "It is certainly competent to any other man to publish a book of roads, and if the same skill, intelligence, and diligence are applied in the second instance, the public would receive nearly the same information from both works; but there is no doubt that this court would interpose to prevent a mere republication of a work which the labour and skill of another person had supplied to the world. So in the instance mentioned by Sir Samuel Romilly a work consisting of a selection, &c."

Then there is also the authority of the gentleman who was well-known in the courts before he went to India, and who afterwards became a distinguished Indian judge, Sir Arthur Wilson, in which the very point is raised and decided in the case of Macmillan v. Suresh Chunder Deb, 17 Ind. Law Rep., Calcutta Series, 951. In that case the matter in question was the well-known series called the Golden Treasury, which is a series of quotations put together by Mr. Palgrave, and the defendant had practically reproduced his work superadding notes of his own, and the learned judge upheld or sustained the claim for infringement. [His lordship read the judgment from "I think it unnecessary to refer in detail" to "he offends against the principle," and continued:] It seems to me that is precisely what Mr. Marshall did in this case, and if we required demonstration of what on a general view was sufficiently obvious before, I think that particular instance which Mr. Scrutton culled for us on the use of the word "inconster," and the verification of the quotation, demonstrates in that particular respect the process that had been suggested he went through in many other cases. That is to say, he took absolutely what is there written down from the work of another person—that is, the plaintiff. I think that is clear to demonstration and we are entitled to look upon it as throwing a light upon the method by which the other matters were arranged. It is said in the second edition that he eliminated some of the most obnoxious passages, which were chiefly the passages descriptive of what the quotation afterwards annexed were going to illustrate, little connecting links printed between the extracts. No doubt those are altered, but it seems to me the substance of them is preserved, although the order of the quotation is altered. It was put to him "How about the quotations themselves?" It is very clear now from the evidence, and I have certainly formed that opinion myself, when one studies the steps by which the second edition came into existence, that he annexed those quotations just as they were. No doubt he says, "I am a very well-informed man; I have given in fact the great part of my attention to these works, and I have no doubt I could have evolved the whole of these quotations from researches which I could have made: I know not only where those quotations come from, but I know the authors who have named them as appropriate to the particular matters, and I could tell you who they are." But unfortunately he did not go through that process himself; he has adopted the work of another man who may or may not have gone through it, but whether he did or did not, the defendant did not. He simply took what another man had done, and it seems to me quite obvious, once admitting that the choice of quotations illustrative of particular traits and particular character and chosen for the purpose, involves high qualities of mind more or less high, according to the area over which those quotations extend, but still none the less existing, even although the area may be a narrow one, that the fact of getting limits from other people, whether he arrived at them by his own reading or not I do not know, but it has been done by the plaintiff in the first instance, and does not confer upon the defendant the right to annex the results of that operation.

I think it is a misconception on the part of the learned counsel—perhaps I ought not to use the expression "misconception," because possibly it was his business to put the argument before the court, and I am not at liberty to form an opinion at all as to his own view of it—but he justified annexing another man's quotations on the ground that you may follow an indication given in another book where you will find authorities that you have the right to consult, and that all the defendant does is that he is directed by a reference to a particular quotation to go and look at the author and see whether the quotation corresponds with the text, and if so, the text being common property, he is at liberty to annex that quotation. I cannot admit that for a moment. He rather suggested that it was justified by the directory cases, which say that, though you cannot where another man has compiled a directory simply take his sheets and reprint them as your own, you are entitled, taking the sheets with you, to go and see whether the existing facts coincide with the description in the sheets, and if you do that you may publish it as your own. Certainly; but are you at liberty to apply the same principle to a series of quotations—to take the references given by one author although he quotes such and such a passage as illustrating a particular matter, and to say: "I will just go and see if that is correctly copied or not, and if it is correctly copied I propose to introduce it with any other which illustrates the particular passage and I propose to adopt that as my own work"? That leaves out the whole merit; the felicity of the quotation: its adaptability to a particular end: its illustration of a particular characteristic—all those things enter into the choice of one quotation as apart from another. If you obey a certain direction to go to a certain place it does not entitle you to annex the skill and judgment and taste which has dictated the selection. It does appear to have been the defendant's view of his rights, as his counsel put it forward for him, that if he once knew where to find the quotation then he had a right to annex it, and that if he once knew where to look and find the quotation, and it corresponded with what the author had written, he had a right to take it. I cannot accede to that for a moment, and it seems to me that the law is clearly such as to entitle the plaintiff to complain if quotations selected and arranged by him are imitated and adopted by the defendant. I think it has been abundantly shown that in the second edition not only have the quotations in substance been taken, but the letterpress connecting them has also been taken in substance in a great many instances, and particularly in the character sketches. That has been done to such an extent as to put it entirely outside those trivial and casual imitations which do not amount to a breach of copyright. There has been a real annexation by the defendant of the work and labour and skill and taste of the plaintiff, and therefore it seems to me that this appeal must be allowed, and I think that in allowing it I am giving effect to what was the true opinion of Kekewich, J., himself.

STIRLING, L J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the question which arises in this case is one of fact—namely, whether or not the defendant, Mr. Marshall, has or has not made an illegitimate use of the plaintiffs' work within the meaning of the definition which has been already read by my lord from Jarrold v. Houlston.

Now it is said that the defendant Marshall is a scholar, is a practised teacher, and has for many years taught this very subject of Shakespeare, one of whose plays forms the subject of this book, that he has a wide knowledge of Shakesperian English, and that he was able to write the book which he has written without reference to the plaintiffs' book at all. I am quite ready to assume all that, but the question is, has he done it? I am not going to go in detail through the passages which have been so much referred to and commen[illegible] two books. I only say that, taking t[illegible] alind alone, it seems to me impos[illegible] plaintiffs' account of her character and compare it with that written in the first edition by the defendant without arriving at the conclusion that the one was borrowed from the other, and that an illegitimate use was made of the plaintiffs' book for that purpose, and that the conclusion which I should arrive at on a mere comparison of the two books appears to me to be amply supported by the admissions which were made by Mr. Marshall in cross-examination before the learned judge. I arrive, therefore, at the conclusion, as I have already said, that in this portion of the book an illegitimate use was made of the plaintiffs' work by the defendant.

Then the question is, Is it altered by what he did with reference to the second edition? I think not. He has told us in his cross-examination what he did; he had the proofs of his first edition before him; he read them and he read the plaintiffs' book and carefully compared them, and he proceeded to strike out from those proofs so much of the plaintiffs' work—such passages as he thought were objectionable, having regard to the book of the plaintiff; and then a fortnight afterwards he proceeded, with these materials before him (that is, with the proofs altered before him as I have said), to rewrite his text, preserving the quotations and also a portion of the text. It seems to me, having regard to the extraordinary memory that this gentleman possesses, that he was not in a position to use in a way that would be free from objection those materials that he had. He availed himself, on his own admission, of a very considerable portion of that which appears to me he did derive from the plaintiffs' book and he turned them to use in the second edition. On those grounds I consider that with regard to the second edition also he has infringed, and I agree with the judgment of my lord.

COZENS-HARDY, L J.—I so entirely agree with all that has fallen from my learned brethren that I do not think it necessary to add anything.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 2.—COLLINS, M.R., read the judgment of the Court as follows: This was an application made by the respondents in a motion set down in the new trial paper for security for the costs of the motion. The case raised no point of any difficulty, and we were all of opinion that in the ordinary discretion of the court security should have been ordered, had it been technically a final appeal; but having regard to the general rule of practice laid down in Heckscher v. Crosley, and since acted upon, not to grant security for costs in the case of new trial motions, we took time to consult the other members of the court as to whether the time has not come when that practice should be altered. It has more than once been treated as anomalous (see In re Harwood & Abrahams); and when analyzed it does not seem to rest on any logical basis. In former days judgment was never given by the judge at Nisi Prius, who has been described as the mere instrument of the court to try the issues (see Wells v. Abrahams, 20 W. R. 659, L. R. 7 Q. B. 554); and when leave to move was reserved the matter was suspended till the rule nisi could be moved for. Nowadays the judge has complete control of the cause and can enter judgment as he thinks right. Hence there is now, unless the learned judge has declined to give judgment, a collateral or alternative application in every motion for a new trial, asking the court to deal with the judgment accordingly. There seems, therefore, no reason in principle why the court should refuse to exercise its discretion in this class of appeals rather than in others, and now that this court has equal jurisdiction in all, it appears undesirable to act upon a hard and fast rule applicable to one class only, and laid down when this jurisdiction was first assumed. The forming of separate lists is a matter of convenience only, and the rights of the parties to security for costs ought not to depend upon the list the case appears in. All the Lords Justices concur in thinking that we ought not any longer to treat ourselves as bound by the rule laid down in Heckscher's case. Security to the extent of £25 must be given within a fortnight.

Application granted.

In re PUCKETT & SMITH'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Land sold for building purposes—Underground culvert for water unknown to both parties—Misdescription—Defect in title.

A builder and contractor entered into a contract with the trustees of a will for the purchase of a property described as possessing an important frontage with a valuable prospective building element. A condition in the contract provided that, the property being open for inspection, the purchaser should be deemed to buy with full knowledge of its actual quantities and condition, and that any error in the particulars should not annul the sale nor be the subject of compensation. The purchaser inspected the property but did not discover then or till after the completion of the contract that there was a culvert for the passage of water under it, the existence of which was not shown on the plans, and was in fact unknown to the vendors.

Held, on the evidence, that the purchaser could not have discovered it by any reasonable care, and that in view of the fact that the land was sold to the knowledge of both parties for building purposes, the existence of the culvert involved such a misdescription affecting the subject-matter of the contract in a material and substantial point as to bring the case within the rule laid down in Flight v. Booth, 1 Bing. N. C. 370, and that a good title had not been shown.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., on a vendor and purchaser summons.

The facts were as follows:

The appellants, who were the trustees and executors of a will, put up for sale by auction, in July, 1899, a freehold property known as The Grange, West Molesey.

It was described in the conditions of sale as possessing "an important frontage to Walton-road, with a valuable prospective building element."

The property was not sold at the auction, but shortly afterwards the respondent, who was a builder and contractor, entered into negotiations to purchase it, and on the 5th of August, 1899, the agent of the appellant wrote him the following letter:

"In reply to your letter of yesterday, the old-fashioned residence of 13½ acres advertised for sale near Hampton Court suitable for development is known as the 'Grange,' West Molesey, one mile from Hampton Court Station. We enclose the small plan for your guidance. The price is £5 000, or we would submit an offer of not less than £4,500. There are no restrictions as to the class of houses to be erected, and it is admirably adapted for the erection of cottages, which are in great demand in the neighbourhood, being quite close to the works of the London water companies, where thousands of mechanics are permanently employed at high wages. We enclose an order to view."

The respondent then went over the property, accompanied by his surveyor, and eventually, on the 30th of October, 1899, entered into a contract to purchase it.

The conditions of sale printed for use at the auction were (with the exception hereinafter mentioned) made to constitute the terms of the contract, which was entered into on the back of them.

Condition 6 was as follows: "Should any question arise as to the identity of the premises described in the particulars with those described in the document abstracted the purchaser thereof shall be furnished at his own expense with a statutory declaration by one of the vendors, or some other person, that the premises have been held in conformity with the title deduced for twenty years last past, and thereon the requisition in respect of identity shall be considered as satisfied. The property is believed and shall be taken to be correctly described, and being open to inspection the purchaser shall be deemed to buy with full knowledge of the actual quantities and condition thereof. If any error shall be found in the particulars, the same shall not annul the sale, nor shall any compensation be allowed in respect thereof."

The following had also been one of the conditions of sale, but was struck out of the contract: "The property is sold subject to such chief, quit, or other rents, rights of way, water drainage, and other easement, restrictions, and liabilities as are mentioned in the particulars, or as may be ascertained to be charged thereon or to affect the same, and to any subsisting liability under covenant or otherwise to repair fences and roads."

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

After the contract had been entered into the purchaser discovered that there was an underground culvert for the passage of water running right across the middle of the property a short distance under the surface.

Two plans had been supplied to him, one accompanying the above-mentioned letter of the 5th of August, 1899, and the other attached to the conditions of sale. The former plan showed no ditch or culvert whatever or any sort of indication of any possible flow of water near the property; the latter plan gave an indication of something which might be a ditch leaving the property at a certain point, and which in fact appeared to be a dry ditch when the purchaser inspected the property.

The existence, however, of the culvert underneath the property, of which the apparent ditch was in truth the continuation, was unknown to both vendors and purchaser till discovered by the purchaser as above stated.

The purchaser then required the vendors either to divert the culvert so as to make the land possible for such building as was contemplated by the parties (which the evidence showed would have cost £500), or to make compensation by an abatement of purchase-money.

The vendors, relying on condition 6, declined to comply with this requisition, and took out the summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874; and on the hearing of the summons Kekewich, J., held that the purchaser's objections to title and requisitions had not been sufficiently answered by the vendors, and that they had not shown a good title in accordance with the contract.

The vendors appealed.

A. T. Murray, for the appellant.—This is no defect of title; it is not an easement or anything relating to one, and the sixth condition precludes the purchaser from taking the objection. The existence of the culvert was unknown to the vendor and was not discovered by the purchaser after every opportunity for investigation and inspection. The principle caveat emptor applies.

He referred to Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, p. 1; Hart v. Windsor, 12 M. & W. 68; Lucas v. James, 7 Hare 410, at p. 418; and In re Brewer & Hankin, 80 L. T. Rep. 127, 47 W. R. Dig. 203.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Davenport, for the purchaser.—The purchaser inspected the property and took all reasonable care. This clearly was a latent, not a patent, defect in title, and he is accordingly entitled to refuse to complete: Ashburner v. Sewell, 40 W. R. 169, [1891] 3 Ch. 405. The property was sold as suited for building purposes and possessing a valuable prospective building element. This culvert makes it unsuited for the purpose, and there was thus a material misdescription. In re Brewer & Hankin was a perfectly different kind of case.

COLLINS, M.R., stated the facts, and held on the evidence that both parties entered into the contract on the basis that the land was reasonably capable of being made fit for building purposes; that the plans gave no fair indication of the existence of the culvert, and that the purchaser could not have found out its existence by any reasonable care. His lordship also regarded the omission from the contract of the condition of sale secondly above mentioned, as significant. He then continued: Now is that such a substantial defect as within the authorities to alter the nature of the thing intended to be bought, and to oblige the purchaser to take, if he does intend to take it, a thing essentially different from that which he agreed to take? Upon that I think the law is clear, and is well stated in Flight v. Booth. There had been there an actual description of the property, and it was suggested that the description in the contract did not accord with the actual facts as ascertained. Here we have not got the actual evidence, but we have the equivalent in the fact that this property was sold for the purpose of being used as a building estate, so that it is as if that was written out in the contract. Tindal, C.J., says, in giving the judgment of the court, that where the misdescription, although not proceeding from fraud, "in a material and substantial point so far affects the subject-matter of the contract as that it may reasonably be supposed that but for such description the purchaser might never have entered into the contract at all, in such case the contract is avoided altogether, and the purchaser is not bound to resort to the clause of compensation." Here the misdescription is in the representation that this land has a valuable prospective building element, coupled with the description given in the vendors' agent's letter. That is the description of the land, but the fact is that under that land lies a covered culvert which might take the flood water from the ditch which was dry when the purchaser saw it, and which, of course, everyone knows may be a most substantial drawback to a building estate. In fact the evidence is that it would cost £500 to deal with this property in such a way as to make the land possible for such building as was contemplated by the parties. Under these circumstances I think Kekewich, J., was perfectly right in holding that the purchaser is not bound to complete, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree. I think that condition 6 does not avail the vendors. It only applies to such matters as might be discovered by an inspection of the property with reasonable care, and the inspection referred to is an inspection of the property itself, and does not impose on the purchaser the duty of going on adjoining properties, or even of walking up neighbouring roads from which the property might be visible. I think, therefore, that the question is not really one of title at all, but whether the case falls within the rule laid down by Tindal, C.J., in Flight v. Booth. Seeing that the property plainly was sold to the present purchaser for building purposes, I think the case does fall within that rule. My own decision, and that of the Court of Appeal, in In re Brewer & Hankin were based on the facts of that case, which did not fall within the rule; one material difference being that there the property clearly was not offered for building purposes at all.

of section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and ought not to be included in his bill of costs

In re Lamb, 37 W. R. 306, 23 Q. B. D 5, overruled.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J., which raised the question whether estate duty paid by a solicitor ought to be included in his bill of costs as a "disbursement" or to be entered as a cash payment.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the court.

Byrne, J., following In re Lamb, 37 W. R. 506, 665, 23 Q. B. D. 5, 477, held that they ought to be entered as disbursements.

The executors of the client appealed.

Levett, K.C., and Hon. T. H. Watson, for the appellants.—There is a distinction between a tax like probate duty or estate duty and disbursements proper such as counsel's fees. The rule is laid down in In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603, that only payments made by the solicitor in pursuance of professional duty can be allowed as disbursements. Byrne, J., considered that he was bound by In re Lamb, but it is submitted that that case is inconsistent with the rule laid down in In re Remnant. But even if that is not so, In re Lamb was a case of probate duty which had to be paid before a will could be proved. Under the Finance Act, 1894, the executor is not under any personal obligation to pay the whole of the estate duty: see sections 6 (2) and 9 (1) of that Act. The payment of estate duty by the solicitor is nothing more than a cash payment by him as agent for his client.

They also referred to In re Bedson, 9 Beav. 5; In re Haigh, 12 Beav. 307; In re Metcalfe, 30 Beav. 406, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 108.

Norton, K.C., and Poley, contra.—Whatever the solicitor has to pay in order to get a document which he is bound to get is a proper disbursement. Payments made by a solicitor for probate duty have always been included in his disbursements, and we submit that the practice is right, because the duty has to be paid by the solicitor in order that he may carry out the instructions given him by his client. The practice ought not to be varied, because this is a case of estate duty and not of probate duty. In re Remnant is really in our favour.

They also referred to In re Taylor, Stileman, & Underwood, 39 W. R. 417, [1891] 1 Ch. 590; and to the Finance Act, 1894, s. 6 (1) (2); Phillimore's Guide to Costs (1879 ed.), p. 558; Scott's Guide to Costs (10th ed.), p. 732.

May 7.—The judgment of the COURT was delivered by

STIRLING, L.J., as follows: The question on this appeal is whether the costs of taxation of a bill of costs under the common statutory order are to be paid by the clients or by the solicitors. That depends on whether one-sixth of the amount of the bill has or has not been taxed off. The bill is for the costs of obtaining the probate of a will on behalf of the executors, who were the clients. In the course of obtaining the probate the solicitors paid the estate duty, amounting to £117, out of a sum of £130 paid by the clients to the solicitors on general account. In the bill as delivered the professional charges, amounting to £101, are first entered; to this is added the estate duty, making a total sum of £218; then there is deducted the £130 paid on account, leaving a balance due to the solicitors of £88. From this bill there has been taxed off an amount of £24 17s. 10d. If the estate duty is properly included in the bill less than one-sixth has been taxed off; but if the estate duty ought (as is contended on behalf of the clients) to have been entered in the solicitors' cash account, and not in the bill, more than one-sixth has been taxed off. Byrne, J., has decided, on the authority of In re Lamb, that the estate duty was properly included in the bill of costs. We think that the learned judge was bound by In re Lamb, which was decided by a Divisional Court, consisting of Baron Pollock and Manisty, J., who affirmed Mathew, J., at chambers. The real question is whether the rule established in that case ought to be upheld in the Court of Appeal, before which it is now brought for the first time. This subject was carefully inquired into by Lord Langdale in In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603, at p. 613, decided in 1849, and the following rule was laid down: "That those payments only which are made in pursuance of the professional duty undertaken by a solicitor, and which he is bound to perform, or which are sanctioned as professional payments by the general and established custom and practice of the profession, ought to be entered or allowed as professional disbursements in the bill of costs." The case of In re Lamb was intended to be decided in accordance with this rule, and it was evidently believed by both the learned judges who constituted the Divisional Court that it was the settled practice to include sums paid for probate duty in bills of costs. It was strongly pressed upon us in argument that, if In re Lamb be upheld, it will be practically impossible in a large number of cases for a client to obtain the costs of the taxation to which a bill may have been justly subjected, and we think that such is the case. We have consulted one of the taxing-masters of Chancery Division, and are informed by him that, from the time of the decision in In re Remnant down to that in In re Lamb it was the settled practice not to include sums paid for probate duty in bills of costs; that the taxing-masters of the Chancery Division consider that the decision in In re Lamb was based on imperfect or inaccurate information; that the effect of it is to discourage the taxation of bills which ought to be taxed; and that the adherence to it has, in their opinion, operated unfairly to clients in the past, and (regard being had to the increased duty now payable) is likely still more so to operate in the future. We are informed that, although the taxing-masters have followed the decision in In re Lamb when the point has been taken before them, yet that many eminent solicitors still adhere to the practice as it existed before the decision in In re Lamb, and do not include payments for probate duty in their bills. We have also consulted one of the registrars of the Probate Division, who is conversant with the taxation of costs in that division, and are informed by him that, although the practice there, so long as he has known it, has been regulated by In re Lamb, he is also of opinion that in many cases it leads to injustice being done. In these circumstances we think that In re Lamb ought to be overruled, and that payments for estate duty ought not to be included in bills of costs. In what precedes it has been assumed that estate duty stands on the same footing as probate duty. It is, however, to be observed that estate duty is not, like the original probate duty, merely a stamp duty, but is one for which the executor is personally accountable: see the Finance Act, 1894, ss. 6 (2), 22 (1) (d). Although we do not base our decision on this distinction, we consider it favourable to the adoption of the course which we regard as the proper one. The appeal will therefore be allowed, with costs here and below, and an order made substantially in accordance with the notice of appeal.

BATH v. BATH. (a.)

Practice—Payment out—Fund in court—Stop order—Agreement vesting "all property" of a bankrupt in trustees—Existence of fund not known at date of agreement—Vesting order.

"All the property" of a bankrupt was by an agreement, confirmed by an order of the court, vested in a company and the bankruptcy annulled. The agreement contained a list of the bankrupt's properties, which did not, however, include a fund in court, to which the bankrupt, unknown to any of the parties to the agreement or their solicitors, was then absolutely entitled. The late bankrupt subsequently obtained an order of the court for payment out to him of the fund upon affidavits that he had not incumbered. No stop order was ever obtained against the fund.

Held, that the agreement operated as a complete cessio bonorum of the bankrupt, and that he was liable to pay the amount of the fund to the company.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 49 W. R. 341, [1901] 1 Ch. 460)

By an agreement dated the 20th of April, 1893, and made between J. S. Bath, then a bankrupt, and the Creditors' Assets Co. (Limited), it was agreed that, in the event of an order of the court being obtained confirming a scheme of arrangement of J. S. Bath's affairs set out in Schedule I. thereto, and as soon as the property of J. S. Bath set out in Schedule II. thereto should have been vested in the company by an order of the court, the company should manage and dispose of the property described in Schedule II. as therein set out.

Schedule I. provided that upon payment into court by the company of a sum sufficient to pay all J. S. Bath's debts in full, together with all costs, an order of the court should be made vesting all his property in the company.

By an order of the court, dated the 11th of July, 1893, the scheme was approved, and it was ordered that the adjudication of bankruptcy against J. S. Bath should be annulled, and that "all the property" of J. S. Bath should thenceforth become vested in the company.

At this time, unknown to any of the parties to the arrangement, there was in court a fund belonging to J. S. Bath, to which he had become absolutely entitled at the time of his bankruptcy. This fund did not appear in Schedule II. of the agreement, and no stop order on it was ever obtained.

J. S. Bath was informed subsequently to the order of the 11th of July of the existence of the fund. Upon application by him, supported by affidavits that he was absolutely entitled to and had not incumbered the fund, an order was made on the 29th of February, 1896, for payment out of the fund to him and it was so paid. The same solicitor acted for J. S. Bath in both the matters. The Creditors' Assets Co. presented a petition to which J. S. Bath, his solicitor, the Paymaster-General, and the Treasury Commissioners were respondents, praying that the order for payment out might be discharged, that the Treasury might be ordered to replace the fund in court, and that the petitioners were entitled to payment out thereof, and for such order as to J. S. Bath and his solicitor as the court might think fit.

Kekewich, J., held that the vesting order and the agreement vested the fund in the company, and declared that J. S. Bath and his solicitor were each liable to pay to the company the amount of the fund paid out to J. S. Bath with interest. He dismissed the petition as against the Paymaster-General and the Treasury Commissioners.

J. S. Bath appealed against so much of the order as concerned him.

There was no appeal against the decision so far as regarded the Paymaster-General and the Treasury Commissioners.

Warrington, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.

Renshaw, K.C., and Pollard, for the Creditors' Assets Co. (Limited).

Harman, for the solicitor.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that the decision of the learned judge was clearly right. The appellant had got into difficulties and was desirous of annulling his bankruptcy. He was entitled to property, and the respondents were willing to take over and realize this property. Accordingly, by the agreement of the 20th of April, 1893, it was provided that they should pay down sufficient to satisfy the appellant's creditors, and then deal with his property in the manner therein prescribed. Now, taking that document alone, it seems to me obvious that the appellant intended, and did in fact contract, to hand over all his property to the respondents, they being under an obligation to pay all his debts in full, and holding the property with a lien to reimburse themselves for all payments they had to make in his affairs. That being so, it seems to me that they took over the particular property involved in these proceedings. That property was a sum of money which at that time was in court. None of the parties to the agreement were aware of the existence of this sum, but subsequently after the bankruptcy had been annulled the appellant became aware of its existence and had it paid out to him. Then, on these proceedings being brought, Kekewich, J., held that the respondents, who by the agreement undertook to find the money to settle with the appellant's creditors and took over all his property, were the persons entitled to this money. Now the appellant says here that, though you have here a scheme which primâ facie embraces this fund in court, still, when you look at the precise terms of the agreement by which the parties intended to be governed in dealing with the property, you find this item is excluded, as no trust is declared as to it in the deed; consequently, the persons to whom the appellant's property was assigned are bare trustees as to this particular fund. It seems to me that that proposition cannot be sustained. You have here a general cessio bonorum for certain purposes. Under that the appellant's property passed to the respondents, not as bare trustees, but as trustees for those particular purposes. Then how is the scheme narrowed so as to exclude one particular part of the property? It is true that this particular fund is not dealt with by the schedule to the agreement, but that is not enough to take it out of the clear cessio bonorum made by the agreement, or the purposes for which such cessio bonorum was made—that is to say, the purpose of reimbursing the respondents all sums paid by them in liquidating the estate. It seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing in the language of the agreement to take out of the cessio bonorum that which was primâ facie included in it. For these reasons I think this appeal must fail.

In re THE LONDON AND NORTHERN BANK. HADDOCK'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Solicitor—Terms on which a solicitor may appear for a witness—Private examination—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 115.

On the examination of a witness under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies is entitled to require from the witness's solicitor, as a condition of his being allowed to be present at the examination, an undertaking to use any knowledge he may acquire from the examination only for the purposes of re-examination, and not to communicate the same to any other person.

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 386), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported ante, p. 386.)

The London and Northern Bank (Limited) was in voluntary liquidation.

An action by the bank against Sir George Newnes (Limited) for libel was pending.

The liquidator in the voluntary winding-up obtained an order for the private examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, of (inter alios) Mr. Haddock, for some time secretary to the bank, and Mr. Hoyle, solicitor to Sir George Newnes (Limited).

Mr. Hoyle also appeared for Mr. Haddock at the private examination.

At Haddock's examination counsel on behalf of the liquidator applied that Mr. Hoyle, being himself a witness, should withdraw.

Mr. Hoyle withdrew accordingly, but his managing clerk, an admitted solicitor, remained to act for Mr. Haddock.

Counsel for the liquidator then asked that the managing clerk should also withdraw; to this counsel for the witness objected, and the registrar ruled that Mr. Hoyle's clerk could only remain on giving an undertaking to treat the whole matter as private, to use the information obtained from the witness's answers for the purposes of re-examination only, and to communicate such information to no other person or persons whatsoever except his counsel.

Haddock's counsel objected to any such limitation being imposed, and advised Haddock to refuse to answer any question in the absence of his solicitor.

The matter was adjourned to Byrne, J., who affirmed the registrar.

Haddock appealed.

Lush, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie.—The witness is entitled to be protected by the presence of his solicitor, and he is also entitled to select the solicitor who can best protect him. The court has power to allow this examination to be public, and this course should be adopted if it is necessary for the proper protection of the witness.

They referred to Heiron's case, 15 Ch. D. 139, 29 W. R. Dig. 45.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Stewart Smith, K.C., for the liquidator, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J., affirming the course taken by the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies upon an examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. A certain witness was directed to be examined under the section that I have just referred to. The witness attended, being accompanied by a solicitor and his managing clerk, and objection was taken by counsel for the liquidator (at whose instance the examination was taking place) to the solicitor being present. That seems to have been upon the ground that the solicitor himself was a person who was going to be examined under the same procedure. That left the witness and the managing clerk present. A question was raised as to the right of the managing clerk to be present, and the registrar imposed certain conditions upon the managing clerk as the terms upon which alone he should be allowed to be present. They were to this effect—I am reading from Byrne, J.'s, judgment—"His managing clerk was left as representing the witness and as instructing counsel. Thereupon the learned registrar, in accordance with what he informs me has been his invariable practice in similar cases, asked to have an undertaking that the matter was to be treated as entirely private, and that the information got from questions put to the witness was only to be used for the purposes of re-examination, and that no part of the information got was to be communicated to any other person or persons except his counsel." That was objected to, and the result was that the examination was suspended, and the matter was adjourned to Byrne, J., to decide whether or not that was a proper condition to impose upon the managing clerk on his being allowed to be present during the examination of the witness. Accordingly the matter came before Byrne, J., and Byrne, J., ordered that George Hardman Hoyle—that was the solicitor himself—was not to be allowed to be present at such further examination; and that on any such further examination the registrar might require the managing or other clerk of George Hardman Hoyle either to withdraw from such examination or to give his undertaking to the registrar to use any information he might acquire at such examination for the purpose only of the re-examination of the said John Daniel Haddock—that was the witness—and not to disclose or allow to be disclosed to anyone without the leave of the court any information he might so acquire and at the close of such examination to forthwith destroy all notes taken by him at such examination; but that the managing or other clerk of George Hardman Hoyle was to be at liberty to disclose such information to George Hardman Hoyle—that is to say, to his principal—upon George Hardman Hoyle first giving a similar undertaking to the registrar. The ground of appeal is that that is a stipulation that ought not to be enforced upon the managing clerk. It is said that it is impossible for the witness to be adequately protected by anybody but this particular solicitor, who is the solicitor acting for Sir George Newnes (Limited) in the litigation between the liquidator and them; that it is practically impossible for any other solicitor to be so conversant with all the facts necessary to protect this witness from the examination; and that therefore, if the witness is to be protected at all, he ought to be protected by the solicitor acting for Sir George Newnes (Limited), and not by a totally independent solicitor. On the other hand, no objection was ever made to the witness being protected and advised by a totally independent solicitor. No doubt it does place this particular solicitor and his managing clerk in a difficulty if they are to carry on at the same time the litigation of Sir George Newnes (Limited) and to protect this witness without allowing what they have heard in the one capacity to affect their conduct in the other. However, the right of the witness to be protected on this inquiry has absolutely no relation to the rights of Sir George Newnes (Limited) in this litigation, and if the two cannot be conciliated when the one solicitor is the chosen representative of the witness, why then the witness must dispense with the assistance of that solicitor. That is the net result of it. This proceeding is a private proceeding which the court sanctions in order that the liquidator may obtain the necessary information to enable him to take his course. It is all under the sanction of the court; it is a private examination. For many reasons it is obviously most undesirable, and quite out of the question, that the opposing party in the litigation contemplated by the liquidator—and to assist him in determining his course as to which litigation this machinery is devised—should be allowed to be present at proceedings which are essentially proceedings for the purpose of informing the officer of the court, and the court, of what steps ought to be taken. It is not as though it were absolutely and finally a sealed book to which the opposing litigant can never get access, because there is machinery whereby the court can allow the result of this examination, if in its discretion it thinks it ought so to do, to be disclosed so far as it deems it necessary that it should be. That is to be found in the rule which is called the Companies (Winding-up) Rule of November, 1895, and this is the effect of it. Notwithstanding anything contained in the Companies (Winding-up) Rule, the notes of the depositions of a person examined under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, or under any order of the court before the court or before any officer of the court or person appointed to take such examination (other than the notes of the depositions of a person examined at a public examination, &c.), shall not be placed on the file of the proceedings or be open to the inspection of any creditor, contributory, or other person, except the official receiver or liquidator, unless and until the court shall so direct, and the court may from time to time give such general or special directions as it shall think expedient as to the custody and inspection of such notes and the furnishing of copies of or extracts therefrom. So that it is not as if Sir George Newnes (Limited) in this case are necessarily for ever shut out from learning anything that they can show might be really material to their litigation, and that they have a right to see. If they can establish those two propositions there is machinery there by which in a proper case they could get at what was disclosed in this examination. The broad question before us here is whether in the circumstances of this case Sir George Newnes (Limited)—because that is really the matter—have any reason whatever to intervene or complain that the registrar has exacted as a condition of the witness being represented by this particular solicitor that the solicitor should undertake to safeguard what is essential to this process, this machinery—namely, the privacy of this examination. As I have already said, it is not a public examination, and it is not intended to be a public examination, and the whole purpose of it might be defeated if the public—in this case an opposing litigant—were allowed to be present. As I have pointed out, there is machinery which lies in the discretion of the court and which is capable of being used to prevent any unfair advantage being taken by information being disclosed to the liquidator which might be very material to the litigant against whom he contemplates, or is actually engaging in, litigation. That difficulty is provided for by the rule that I have referred to. In the proper circumstances, under proper conditions, and with proper safeguards, there is no doubt that access may be had in the words that I have just read. The point here is whether in the proceeding under the 115th section, to which I have referred, the solicitor who attends to protect a witness is entitled, ipso facto, to be present and to disclose to anyone the information which is obtained in a private room at a private hearing before the officer of the court. It seems to me that the order of the registrar affirmed by Byrne, J., was perfectly right, and that we should not be justified in disturbing it. The order itself, which I have just read, meets any difficulty which might arise in the matter, because it says that the managing clerk must give an undertaking to the registrar to use any information that he may acquire at such examination for the purpose only of the re-examination of Haddock, and not to disclose or allow to be disclosed to anyone without the leave of the court any information he may so acquire. So the court retains a discretion over the result of the examination, and if a proper case were made, I have no doubt that the court would see its way to assist the party who had a right to know what took place at an examination. For these reasons I think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Legislature, by section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, has conferred on the court the power of summoning persons before it who can give information concerning "the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company." It was established very many years ago that upon such occasions it was right that the person summoned before the court should have the assistance of counsel and solicitor if he desired it. The examinations which take place under this section have for a long period—in fact, so far as I know, from the very passing of the Act of 1862—been always treated as private in the first place. Of course, a private examination is open to abuse, and the procedure under the section ought to be carefully watched to see that the process is not abused. To ensure that this shall be done before an order is made the sanction of the registrar is required. The liquidator must disclose to the registrar what object he has in seeking this information, and the registrar upon that exercises his discretion whether it is right and proper that an order for such an examination should be made. In the present case, so far as I can see, the registrar has properly exercised his discretion with reference to this examination. There has been nothing produced to show that he has acted in any way improperly or on any improper grounds, and he has satisfied himself that it is desirable that Mr. Haddock should be examined with reference to the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company—what in particular we do not know. Mr. Haddock was a former officer of the company, and presumably he knows something about certain of the matters which are referred to in the section. Upon appearing before the registrar Mr. Haddock was represented by counsel and solicitors who happened to be the counsel and solicitors of the company, Sir George Newnes (Limited), who are at the present moment in litigation with the liquidator. Doubtless one may infer from what has taken place that the object of the examination is in some way connected with that litigation. Here, again, the registrar knows all the facts of the case, and he was of opinion, evidently, that this was a matter as to which it would not be right that Sir George Newnes (Limited) should be parties. They would have no right, according to the rule, to be present, and it might defeat the object of the examination if they were present. Then he is met by this difficulty, that the counsel and solicitors who appear for the witness are the counsel and solicitors of Sir George Newnes (Limited), and that they may disclose the proceedings in the examination to Sir George Newnes (Limited)—that is, they may for the purpose of the litigation use the information which is extracted in the course of the examination. To prevent that, which would bring about exactly the same result as if Sir George Newnes (Limited) were themselves parties in person, he has imposed certain undertakings upon the solicitors and counsel, and the question is whether he is justified in so doing. It seems to me in the present state of our information that he was entirely justified, for the reasons given by Byrne, J., and that we ought not to disturb the order. At the same time I think that it would be the duty of the registrar in further prosecuting this examination to take great care that it is not abused. The abuse which has been suggested is this: It appears that there is a great controversy going on between the liquidator and Sir George Newnes (Limited) with reference to the production of documents, and it is said that many documents have been withheld by the liquidator from discovery in the action which is now going on between the company in winding up and Sir George Newnes (Limited). I should be sorry to suppose that there was any foundation for that on the part of an officer of the court who is conducting this litigation. But no doubt there is the possibility that some difficulty may have occurred. Now it is said on behalf of Sir George Newnes (Limited) that they ought to be enabled, if a document is produced or made use of in this examination, to show that in the future proceedings for discovery, so that in case a document is produced which is not embraced in any affidavit which has hitherto been made, they may be able to make use of it for the purpose of getting a further and better affidavit of documents. If such a thing is possible on the part of the liquidator, I should be willing enough to help them. But are they shut out from that? I cannot see that they are. At the present time we know nothing of what is going to happen in this examination of Mr. Haddock—not a single question has been asked of him, and we do not know to what precisely it is to be directed. The registrar will in the ordinary course takes full notes of the evidence, and that deposition will be preserved. And if it occurs to Sir George Newnes (Limited) or their advisers that they may properly ask for the disclosure of any part of it, or may desire to know what documents were produced or the contents of any documents produced in the course of it for any proper or legitimate purpose, it seems to me that it is open to them, either under the leave reserved by the order itself to the solicitors, or under the jurisdiction conferred by the Winding-up Rule of November, 1895, to make an application to the court for the disclosure of part or the whole, as they may think fit, of this deposition. Upon any such application the court will be far better able to judge of the propriety of acceding to the application than it can be at the present stage. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the order of Byrne, J., ought not to be disturbed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It must be recognized that the Legislature has put the liquidator, after a company has been wound up, in a position in some respects more favourable than that of any other litigant. The court has given him power—not an absolute power, but subject to the control of the court itself—to summon before it any officer of the company or person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the company, or supposed to be indebted to the company, or any person whom the court may deem to be capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company. That is a power which is not an absolute power in the liquidator. An order of the court has first to be obtained, and the examination takes place before the registrar, who himself is an officer of the court. By the rules of 1892 (the 3rd rule) it is expressly enacted that these examinations of persons summoned before the High Court under section 115 shall, unless the judge of the High Court shall otherwise direct, be held before the registrar in chambers; that is to say, they shall be held in a place to which the public have no right of access. Such an examination may be held, not merely with a view to future litigation, but with a view to assisting the liquidator in litigation which has been already commenced. When that is once admitted it seems to me that it would be impossible that the court could allow the very end and object of the order which it has made for the examination of a witness to be defeated by allowing the opposite party to the litigation to be present. This information is information of a confidential nature: it is not to be put on the file, and it is not open to any member of the public, or even to the witness himself, without some order of the court since the rules of 1895. Regarding this application as I do, as in substance an application by Sir George Newnes (Limited), the defendants to the libel action, to be present at the examination of this witness, I think the application is wholly wrong; and that the view taken by the registrar and by Byrne, J., is quite correct.

Appeal dismissed.

HULTHEN v. STEWART & CO. (a.)

Ship — Demurrage — Cargo to be discharged with customary dispatch as fast as steamer can deliver— According to the custom of the port.

A steamer was chartered to load a cargo of timber and to proceed to London and deliver the same, "the cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports." The charter-party contained an exception in the case of strikes or lock-outs. The steamer arrived in the port of London on the 12th of October, and was ordered to the Surrey Commercial Docks to discharge. Owing to the crowded state of the docks she could not enter the docks until the 18th of October, when there was further delay owing to her being unable to get a berth at a quay. The discharge was completed on the 29th of October. There was no other place than the Surrey Commercial Docks where the steamer could have been discharged any sooner. The shipowners claimed demurrage from the 19th of October, contending that the time for commencing the discharge ran from the date of the steamer's arrival in the port of London, that she was bound to discharge "as fast as she could deliver," namely, in six days from that date, and that the charter-party must be read as if the time for discharge was fixed therein at six days.

Held, that the charter-party had not fixed a certain number of days for the discharge, and that, as the charterers had done all they reasonably could to discharge the steamer as soon as possible in the circumstances prevailing at the port, they were not liable for demurrage.

Decision of Phillimore, J. (6 Com. Cas. 65), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J. (reported in 6 Com. Cas. 65).

The action was brought to recover demurrage in respect of the plaintiff's steamship Anton at the port of London.

The defendants were sued as indorsees of the bills of lading which incorporated the terms of a charter-party.

By the charter-party (which was in the form of the Chamber of Shipping White Sea Wood Charter to the United Kingdom, 1899) the plaintiff's steamship Anton was to proceed to Keret (White Sea), and there load a full and complete cargo of mill-sawn deals and/or battens and/or boards and/or ends, and being so loaded should proceed to London and deliver the same. By clause 3, "the cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used), in both loading and discharging excepted. Should the steamer be detained beyond the time stipulated as above for loading or discharging, demurrage shall be paid at thirty pounds per day, and pro rata for any part thereof. The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary. . . ." By clause 5: "If the cargo cannot be loaded and/or discharged by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the loading and/or discharge of the cargo, or by reason of epidemics, the time for loading and/or discharging shall not count during the continuance of such strike or lock-out or epidemic. . . ."

The vessel arrived at Gravesend, which is within the port of London, on the 12th of October. The defendants gave the master notice to discharge at the Surrey Commercial Docks. Owing to the crowded state of the docks the vessel could not enter until the 18th of October, and she remained at Gravesend waiting her turn to enter. When she did enter the docks there was a further delay before she could get a berth at a quay. The actual discharge occupied six days and was completed on the 29th of October. The plaintiff gave evidence to show that six days was sufficient for the discharge of the vessel, and that, allowing six days from the 12th of October, when the vessel arrived within the port of London, the vessel came on demurrage on the 19th of October.

Phillimore, J., held that the vessel was not an "arrived vessel" when it reached Gravesend, because it was not usual to discharge vessels there; and he came to the conclusion upon the evidence that owing to the crowded state of the docks and the impossibility of obtaining lighters owing to a strike of lightermen there was no other place than the Surrey Commercial Docks (where 98 per cent. of timber ships were discharged) where she could have been discharged any sooner, and that according to the custom of the port of London timber ships were discharged either on to the quay or into lighters; and he held that, as owing to no fault or delay on the part of the defendants, there was no quay space and no lighters available until the date when the discharge in fact commenced, the defendants were not liable for demurrage.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and D. C. Leck, for the plaintiff.—When the vessel arrived at Gravesend the defendants were bound to discharge her as fast as she could deliver—that is, within six days. The risk of getting to a berth lay on the defendants. The reference in the charter-party to the custom of the port as to the discharge refers to the mode of and not the time for discharging: Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 28 W. R. 833, 5 App. Cas. 599. Later cases tend to relieve the ship from liability, but they are all cases where there is some appliance of the port by means of which according to the custom of the port the ship must be discharged and which is beyond the control of the charterer: Good v. Isaacs, 40 W. R. 629, [1892] 2 Q. B. 555; Lyle Shipping Co. v. Cardiff Corporation, 49 W. R. 85, [1900] 2 Q. B. 638. That leaves the line of decisions, such as Porteous v. Watney, 27 W. R. 30, 3 Q. B. D. 534, untouched. In Hick v. Raymond, 41 W. R. 384, at p. 386, [1893] A. C. 22, at p. 30, Lord Herschell did not agree with Lord Blackburn's view in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, that a stipulation to discharge the cargo with all dispatch according to the custom of the port is necessarily the same as the implied obligation to discharge within a reasonable time. Where the parties have expressly dealt with the question of discharge they have defined the obligation either by reference to custom or by reference to time. If a charterer has contracted to discharge within a certain time, it is no answer for him to say that he tried to do it but could not. The consignees here had to provide the lighters for the discharge, and there was no customary appliance of the port by means of which the discharge had to be effected. The obligation of the shipowner was not to go to a named berth, or to a berth as ordered, as in Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Morel, 40 W. R. 58, [1891] 2 Q. B. 647, but to the port of London. When the ship arrived at Gravesend she was ready to do her part of the discharge. Pyman v. Dreyfus, 38 W. R. 447, 24 Q. B. D. 152, is in point. The lay-days therefore commenced to run when she arrived at Gravesend, in the port of London. The authorities draw a clear distinction between an obligation to go to a berth and an obligation to go to a port. That being so, the obligation was to discharge as fast as the steamer could deliver from the date of her arrival at Gravesend. "As fast as the steamer can deliver" is six days, and therefore the charter-party must be read as if a specific time of six days were allowed for discharging. Maclay v. Spillers, 6 Com. Cas. 217, is an authority tending to support this proposition. It would be to contradict the charter-party to allow the defendants to relieve themselves from their obligation by showing that they used all reasonable diligence to discharge the ship. The fact that there is an express exception in the charter-party with regard to strikes shows that no other exception to the obligation to discharge as fast as the steamer can deliver is to be allowed. Demurrage therefore became payable from the 19th of October.

Lochnis (W. S. Robson, K.C., with him), for the defendants.—The words "as fast as the steamer can deliver," whether in conjunction with "as customary" or "according to the custom of the port," mean as fast as she can deliver considering the circumstances existing at the port at the time of discharge, and if the charterers do all they reasonably can to discharge the cargo they have fulfilled their obligation. But if, on the other hand, a fixed number of days is named in the charter-party for discharging, the obligation to discharge within that number of days is absolute. That is the result of the decisions from Postlethwaite v. Freeland onwards, and parties have been contracting upon that basis ever since. The insertion of the strike clause cannot alter the settled construction of the charter-party. No doubt upon the above construction the strike clause is unnecessary, because even without it a strike would have to be taken into consideration as one of the circumstances existing at the port at the time of discharge. A charter-party containing the same or similar words has been construed by different judges in the way now contended for—namely, by Barnes, J., in The Jaederen, [1892] P. 351, 41 W. R. Dig. 224; by Mathew, J., in Rodenacker v. May, 6 Com. Cas. 37; by Kennedy, J., in Reid v. Lee, 17 Times L. R. 771; and by Bigham, J., in Wallenberg v. Payne (not reported). Those decisions and the decision in Lyle Shipping Co. v. Cardiff Corporation are in point in favour of the defendants. Next, with reference to the question whether the ship was an arrived ship when she reached Gravesend. The true view is that she was not an arrived ship until she reached a place where she could discharge. She had not completed her voyage until then. The obligation of the ship was not only to go to London, but also to deliver the cargo.

He referred to Nielsen v. Wait, 34 W. R. 33, 16 Q. B. D. 67.

Leck replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., upon a claim for demurrage, and the question turns upon the construction of one clause in a charter-party. By that clause the cargo was to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer could receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, and demurrage was to be payable at the rate of £30 per day if the steamer was detained beyond the time stipulated as above for loading or discharging. The ship arrived in the port of London, and, though she remained at Gravesend as a convenient place to lie at until she could enter the docks, it must be assumed for the purposes of this case that she had arrived at the dock gates and was waiting to enter. The state of business in the Surrey Commercial Docks made it impossible for the ship to get into the docks, and when she did get in she had a difficulty in getting a berth and unloading her cargo owing to the congested state of the shipping in the docks. She might have got water space in another dock, but there would have been a difficulty in getting lighters into which to discharge the cargo, and the learned judge has found as a fact that if she had gone into another dock she could not have discharged her cargo any sooner because lighters could not have been procured by the exercise of any reasonable diligence on the defendants' part. That is a finding that the defendants did all they reasonably could to discharge the ship. The question of law is whether in these circumstances the defendants are liable to pay demurrage. The point made for the plaintiff is that, as the steamer could discharge in six days, the charter-party must be read as if a fixed period of six days was allowed for discharging. There can be no doubt that if a given number of days for discharging must be read into this charter-party, then there is an absolute obligation on the charterers to discharge in that time. The question is whether this charter-party upon its true construction has fixed a certain number of days for discharging the cargo. In my opinion it has not, and there is clear authority to that effect. It has been so laid down in a number of cases. In Hick v. Raymond it was held that where a bill of lading is silent as to the time within which the consignee is to discharge the ship's cargo, his obligation is to discharge within a reasonable time; and that obligation is performed if he discharges the cargo within a time which is reasonable under the existing circumstances, assuming that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, are not caused or contributed to by him. That case merely followed Postlethwaite v. Freeland, the words in the charter-party in that case being "the cargo to be discharged with all dispatch according to the custom of the port." It was held that those words were not equivalent to a fixed number of days being named for discharging, and evidence was admitted to show that the charterer had done all he could reasonably do to discharge the cargo. Rightly or wrongly the court there held that the particular conditions existing at the port fettered the power of the charterer to take delivery. The facts which went to show that the charterer was fettered in the discharge are not material here because they must differ in each case, but the principle of the decision is that the above clause is not equivalent to a number of days being fixed for the discharge, and that therefore another standard must be applied—namely, whether the charterer did all he reasonably could to take delivery. Then I come to the later cases of Lyle Shipping Co. v. Cardiff Corporation, where the words of the charter-party were, the vessel "to be discharged with all dispatch as customary," and Good v. Isaacs, where the words were, "the vessel to be discharged at usual fruit berth as fast as steamer can deliver as customary." In both those cases it was held that the charterers, having done all they reasonably could in the circumstances to effect the discharge, were not liable for the delay. Evidence was admitted to show that the charterers had done all they reasonably could. Naturally the conditions in each particular case vary, but the principle remains, and the learned judge in the present case has found that the defendants used all reasonable means to discharge the ship as quickly as possible. The evidence clearly justified that finding. It is because the defendants were not tied down to a fixed number of days for unloading, that all the circumstances existing at the time must be taken into account. That being so, the defendants are not liable for the delay. Similar clauses have come before various judges in the cases referred to by the learned counsel for the defendants, and they have all taken the same view as we do as to the construction of the clause. It was said, however, that the insertion of the strike clause, making an express exception in the case of a strike, showed that no other exception was intended to be introduced into the charter-party as to the obligation to discharge as fast as the steamer could deliver. In my opinion, once we have arrived at the clear meaning of the prior clause, the insertion of a subsequent clause intended to meet a particular state of affairs cannot affect the construction of that clause. It is true that upon the defendants' construction the strike clause is unnecessary. I do not think, however, that that clause can reasonably be read as throwing a light back with the view of ascertaining the intention of the parties when they framed the earlier clause. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment was right and the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns upon the true construction of clause 3 of the charter-party. In my opinion the material words in that clause cannot be distinguished from the corresponding words in the charter-party in the case of Lyle Shipping Co. v. Cardiff Corporation. All the authorities were considered in that case, and having heard those authorities discussed again, I adhere to what I have said upon them. That being so, this case is governed by Lyle Shipping Co. v. Cardiff Corporation, and the only other point relates to clause 5, the strike clause. No doubt, on our construction of clause 3, the strike clause becomes unnecessary. But it would be wrong for us to say that in this charter-party clause 5 must be held to be a necessary clause, with the result of giving a different construction to clause 3. Such a process of reasoning ought to be avoided in construing a charter-party. It is well known that clauses are at different times added to charter-parties to meet particular circumstances as they arise, and they are added without relation to their effect upon the other clauses of the charter-party. It would be very rash to say that every clause in a charter-party must be taken to be necessary, and starting from that hypothesis to inquire what effect each clause has upon the other clauses in the charter-party. Such a process would lead to some astonishing results. I prefer to hold that the strike clause was introduced for a particular purpose, and that clause, upon the construction we are now giving to the charter-party, turns out to be unnecessary. Phillimore, J., has found that the discharge was effected with all reasonable dispatch, and we cannot differ from that finding of fact. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am the same opinion. I should have thought that by this time the parties would have inserted plain language in the charter-party. But they have not done so. It is said that the words "with customary dispatch, as fast as the steamer can deliver," are equivalent to a period of six days, and that therefore we should read that number of days into the charter-party as the period allowed for unloading. I cannot read the charter-party thus. It must be assumed that the ship had arrived at the dock gates. What is the meaning of the words, "with customary dispatch, as fast as the steamer can deliver, according to the custom of the port"? Light is thrown upon those words by Postlethwaite v. Freeland, Good v. Isaacs, and Lyle Shipping Co. v. Cardiff Corporation, before this court, and The Jaederen, before Barnes, J., Reid v. Lee, before Kennedy, J., and Wallenberg v. Payne, before Bigham, J.; and all place the same construction on these or similar words as we are giving to this charter-party. We should be running contrary to that series of decisions if we adopted the contention put forward on behalf of the shipowner. There was a further argument. There was a strike clause in the charter-party, and it is said that the express inclusion of that clause negatives an exception in other cases being implied, and that therefore the insertion of the strike clause alters the construction of the earlier clause. It is impossible to read a charter-party in that way. The fact that express provision is made in the charter-party as to strikes cannot affect the construction of the other clauses.

Appeal dismissed.

In re THE NATIONAL BANK OF WALES. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Costs—Taxation—Costs of drawing bill of costs and of copy.

The N. Bank was in voluntary liquidation. The M. Bank bought the assets of the N. Bank and agreed to pay the costs, &c., of the liquidators of the N. Bank in the winding up. The liquidators' solicitor prepared bills of costs which were duly paid by the M. Bank. On taxation of the bill of costs presented by the solicitor to the liquidators of the N. Bank, (a) the costs of preparing and copying the bill of costs for payment by the M. Bank and (b) for preparing and copying the bill of costs taxed were disallowed.

On the 21st of February, 1901, an order was obtained by the liquidators in the voluntary winding up of the National Bank of Wales (Limited) for the taxation of the several bills of costs of their solicitor as between solicitor and client.

In 1893 the National Bank had sold its assets to the Metropolitan, Birmingham, and South Wales Bank as on the 31st of December, 1892, and by one of the clauses of one of the agreements for sale it was agreed that the Metropolitan Bank should pay all the charges, costs, disbursements, and expenses of the National Bank and its liquidators of or incidental to its winding up and dissolution and the sale.

The Metropolitan Bank paid the National Bank costs, amounting to £3,754 10s.

The scale fees for drawing these bills of costs and for a copy of them amounted to £301 3s. 3d., and these charges the taxing-master disallowed. The taxing-master also disallowed a sum of £73 11s. for drawing and making copies of the bills of costs taxed.

This was a summons to review the taxation with regard to these two sums.

Christopher James, for the liquidator, referred to the general order of November, 1862, r. 71, and to R. S. C., ord. 65, r. 27 (38).

June 3.—BUCKLEY, J., said that in this case the liquidators, in recovering assets, had incurred costs amounting to £3,754 10s., which were claimed against the Metropolitan Bank and paid by them on the delivery of particulars. The Metropolitan Bank did not pay, and so far as he knew were not asked to pay, the sum of £301 3s. 3d., the scale fees for drawing these bills of costs and for a copy of them. If there had been no sale the expense of drawing these bills would have been borne by the solicitor, and this was not disputed; in his opinion, the fact that there had been a sale made no difference. Further, if payable by anyone else, this sum should have been paid by the Metropolitan Bank and not by the liquidators of the National Bank.

The sum of £73 11s., and also the sum of £301 3s. 3d., should, according to the liquidators' contention, have been allowed by the taxing-master. The costs of drawing a bill are allowed where there has been litigation or quasi-litigation. The order in this case was merely one for taxation between solicitor and client, and there was nothing in a case like this of the taxation of bills of costs not delivered in the course of litigation to make the order and rules referred to by counsel applicable. The taxing-master was right in both cases.

(a.) Reported by L. W. BYRNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As to costs, he must add that he was startled to find that the liquidators who had to pay the bill were there to contend that the amount of the bill ought to be increased, and appeared not by a separate solicitor to attack the bill, but by the solicitor whose bill was being taxed. He was told that this was the practice, and that the taxing-master is the only person who is there to reduce the bill. The applicant was really the solicitor and not the liquidators, and this being so, he could not allow the costs in the liquidation.

RIDD v. THORNE. (a.)

Solicitor—Lien—"Property recovered or preserved"—Charging order—Priority—Notice of solicitor's right to lien—Purchaser for value without notice—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.

Property recovered or preserved in an action by a solicitor employed in that action is in the nature of salvage, and he is entitled to be paid for his services on that basis; and he is also entitled to a charge, not only on the property of a particular client, but also, if property of other persons is recovered or preserved in the action, upon their property or interest, for his costs, charges, and expenses, and his charge takes priority over all rights except those of a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice.

An action was commenced by R. against T. for dissolution of partnership, and a receiver was appointed, and by the action certain of the assets of the partnership were recovered. Whilst the action was proceeding, certain creditors brought actions against the partners, and obtained charging orders or orders following the order made in Kewney v. Attrill, 35 W. R. 191, 34 Ch. D. 345. The solicitor for the plaintiff R. claimed that his charge or lien for costs, charges, and expenses in the action took priority over the charging orders obtained by the creditors.

Held, following Cole v. Eley, 42 W. R. 505, 561, [1894] 2 Q. B. 180, 350, that the creditors, being aware of the existence of the partnership action, must also be taken to have notice of the solicitor's right to a lien on the property recovered, and that consequently they were not purchasers for value without notice, and that the solicitor's lien had priority over the charging orders.

Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28, considered.

Adjourned summons.

This summons was taken out by Mr. Harry Watkins, a solicitor, asking for a declaration that his lien or charge upon the assets of R. Bristowe & Sons for his taxed costs and expenses incurred as solicitor to the plaintiff in an action entitled Ridd v. Thorne, [1901] R. No. 203, took priority over certain charging orders obtained by creditors against the assets of R. Bristowe & Sons.

It appeared that the plaintiff and defendant in the action of Ridd v. Thorne formerly carried on the business of builders and contractors in partnership under the name or style of R. Bristowe & Sons.

In the month of January, 1901, the said action was commenced for dissolution of the partnership, and Mr. Watkins was employed as solicitor to the plaintiff, and it appeared that, as a result of such action, certain assets of the partnership had been recovered, and the proceeds of those assets were partly in the hands of a receiver and partly in court.

Whilst the action was proceeding certain creditors of the partnership firm commenced proceedings against the partners and obtained judgments, and as a result of such proceedings, on the 24th of June, 1901, Messrs. Sandell & Sons and Mr. John Philip Ridd obtained from the master in chambers orders charging the assets of the partnership firm with the payment of their respective judgment debts, and on the 7th of February, 1902, Fergusson Brothers & Co. obtained a similar order.

The applicant claimed that his lien or charge took priority over the three charging orders.

Younger, K.C., and T. Douglas, for the applicant.—Only a bonâ fide purchaser without notice has priority over a solicitor's lien (cf. section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860), but the solicitor must prove that the lien is with reference to property recovered or preserved. The assets would have been lost if this action had not been brought. The court has jurisdiction under section 28 to make an order against the creditors, subject, however, to two conditions—namely, (a) the solicitor must show that there is no other source from which he can get his costs, and (b), one at least of the creditors must be present at the hearing and the case be argued on behalf of the creditors: Jackson v. Smith, 53 L. J. Ch. 972, 32 W. R. Dig. 196. In present case both these conditions were fulfilled. Kewney v. Attrill, 33 W. R. 191, 34 Ch. D. 345, shews that a charging order can be made. A solicitor's lien is in the nature of salvage: Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 545; Scholey v. Peck, 41 W. R. 508, [1893] 1 Ch. 709.

C. E. Bovill, for Henry Sandell & Sons.—The jurisdiction of the court under section 28 of the Solicitors Act is discretionary—Re Humphreys, 46 W. R. 322, [1898] 1 Q. B. 520, at p. 526—and the court ought not to exercise it in this case. If Sandell had levied execution before the receiver was appointed, he would have obtained priority over the solicitor's lien: Kewney v. Attrill; Fowler v. Roberts, 2 Giff. 226. The charging order made here is the same as the order in Kewney v. Attrill, and has a stronger effect than an ordinary charging order: Jackson v. Smith.

Clayton, for other creditors.—My clients say that the solicitor did not recover the property, and that they could have done so themselves by putting in a bailiff. Jackson v. Smith is distinguishable.

He also referred to Emden v. Carte, 30 W. R. 17, 19 Ch. D. 311.

JOYCE, J.—In this case there was a dispute between two partners and an action was commenced by one partner against the other. The action was going on with vigour when certain creditors of the partnership commenced actions against the partners, and having got judgment, they obtained in chambers from the master, orders which have been called charging orders, but which are not technically charging orders at all, but orders following the case of Kewney v. Attrill, and by those orders the applicants undertook to deal with the charge hereinafter mentioned according to the order of the court, and it was ordered that the assets of the firm should stand charged with the payment of such judgment debts. Now at that time, certainly at the date of the last order, various assets had been got in and the proceeds of those assets were either in the hands of the receiver or in court. Now my opinion is that the effect of that order, so far as the assets were concerned, was to give a charge, or rather not to give a charge otherwise than subject to any existing lien or existing prior charge. For myself I very much doubt if Kay, J., ever intended in the original case of Kewney v. Attrill, or whether it has ever been intended when such orders as these have since been made, to give any charge except as amongst the creditors of the partnership themselves or as against the separate partners of the firm. Then the statute gives the court power to charge property recovered or preserved with the payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of that preservation, and all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat such charge or right shall, unless made to a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void and of no effect as against such charging right. Now it is quite settled, and it has been said over and over again that this section must receive a liberal construction, and I think the decision of Romer, L.J., in Scholey v. Peck, is really in accordance with the general line of authorities. In that case Romer, L.J., said: "I have considered the cases cited in the course of the arguments, and others bearing on charging orders obtained under the Solicitors Act, 1860. These authorities show that what is recovered by the action of the solicitor is to be treated as if he had earned salvage, and that he is to be paid for his services on the theory that salvage services had been rendered. The 28th section of the Act is very general in its terms. It authorizes a charge not on the mere interest of the plaintiff, but on all the property recovered in the action, whether for the plaintiff only or for him in connection with others. It is not necessary that the property charged should belong to the same person as employed the solicitor; but it must be by reason of the employment that the property is preserved. . . . In my judgment the case is governed by the principle of Greer v. Young. I hold, therefore, that the solicitors are entitled to the charge for which they ask, not only against the plaintiff, but also against the mortgagee, who is taking the benefit of the action, and over whose mortgage they must have priority. The charge will include their taxed costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in preserving the property."

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As I say, and as it appears there, it is quite settled that this a charge which may be imposed not only on the property of the particular client, but, if the property of other persons be preserved or recovered, it is imposed upon their property or interest.

That it may be made as against creditors of a partnership appears clear from the case of Jackson v. Smith. What the statute says is that all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right shall, unless made to a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void, and so on. Now, it may reasonably be doubted whether judgment creditors are purchasers or not; certainly they were not before the orders, and if they are purchasers at all, it is only by virtue of the orders. But they are not purchasers without notice, because the action was in existence, and in the case of Cole v. Eley, 42 W. R. 505, [1894] 2 Q. B. 180, which was confirmed in the Court of Appeal, 42 W. R. 561, [1894] 2 Q. B. 350, it was held that the provision of section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, avoiding conveyances to defeat a charging order unless made to a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice, means without notice of the solicitor's right to a lien, and not without notice of the existence of a charging order, and that an assignee of a judgment creditor, being aware of the existence of an action in which the solicitor had acted for the plaintiff, must be taken to have notice of the solicitor's right to a lien on the property recovered, and therefore was not a purchaser for value without notice. I hold most distinctly, therefore, that the persons who had these orders were not purchasers for value without notice, and that the right of the solicitor takes priority over all the creditors, and he must take a common order.

Bankruptcy—Property of bankrupt—Money paid to settle bankruptcy petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

The debtor gave his solicitors a charge to secure inter alia a sum to be paid by them in settlement of a bankruptcy petition presented by the respondents. The solicitors paid that sum to the respondents, who withdrew their petition. The debtor was subsequently made bankrupt upon a petition presented within three months of the act of bankruptcy, of which the respondents had notice.

Held, that the trustee in the bankruptcy was not entitled to recover from the respondents the sum paid to them in settlement of their petition, as it never was the debtor's money.

In re Snyder, Ex parte Pixley, 8 Morr. 127, distinguished.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy of Drucker for a declaration that the sum of £300 paid to the respondents, the Birmingham and District Banking Co., upon the 15th of February, 1901, formed part of the property of the bankrupt and was received by the respondents with notice of an available act of bankruptcy; and for an order requiring the respondents to pay the said sum of £300 to the trustee.

Upon the 24th of January, 1901, the respondents presented a petition against Drucker, the amount of the debt being £1,000, and the act of bankruptcy alleged therein being noncompliance with a bankruptcy notice which had been issued by another creditor. The petition was ordered to be heard upon the 15th of February.

Upon the 14th of February Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus, solicitors to Drucker, proposed to the solicitors to the bank that if £300 were paid the petition should be withdrawn.

Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus told the solicitors to the bank that the debtor had wealthy relatives but no money of his own, and added that they themselves would have to find the money.

The solicitors to the bank accepted the offer, believing that the £300 to be provided was not the debtor's money.

Upon the same day Drucker, who already owed Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus £328, gave them a charge upon certain property to secure the sum of £628, with the understanding that the additional sum of £300 so secured was to be used in settling the bank's petition.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Accordingly, on the 15th of February, Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus gave the bank their own cheque for £300, and the petition was withdrawn.

A receiving order was subsequently made against Drucker upon a petition presented within three months of the act of bankruptcy of which the bank had notice.

He was adjudged bankrupt, and a trustee was appointed, who launched the present motion.

Reed, K.C., and A. H. Carrington, for the trustees, relied upon In re Snyder, Ex parte Pixley, 8 Morr. 127.

Muir Mackenzie and J. G. Joseph, for the respondents, contended that the money in question never formed part of the property of the bankrupt, and that the decision in In re Snyder had been questioned in In re Rogers, Ex parte Holland, 8 Morr. 243.

WRIGHT, J.—I have not to consider to-day whether the charge which Mr. Drucker gave to Messrs. Beyfus can be sustained or whether that might not be attacked by the trustee. All that I have to consider is whether this money which was paid to the respondents, the Birmingham bank, was the money of Drucker or not. Now it is not a very easy matter, either in point of law or in point of fact, to decide, but if the £300 over became Mr. Drucker's money, it is plain that Mr. Drucker might have spent it or done whatever he pleased with it; as Mr. Mackenzie points out, he might have speculated with it or done what he liked with it. But what I find is, that it never came into Mr. Drucker's hands at all, and I am clearly of opinion that it was never intended to come into Mr. Drucker's hands at all. It is quite clear that Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus would never have consented to that money going out of their hands into those of Drucker's or being applied for any other purpose whatever except the settlement of the petition by the Birmingham bank. Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus themselves could not have applied it to any other purpose after the arrangement which they had made with the respondents' solicitor on the one hand and Mr. Drucker on the other. Nor, as I have said, could Mr. Drucker have applied it to any other purpose. The charge is contemporaneous with the arrangement that is made with the respondents' solicitor, and although the charge on the face of it treats this as a loan by Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus to Mr. Drucker, that cannot alter the real character of the transaction if the real character was inconsistent with the way in which it is described in the charge. I cannot help thinking that this money was never free and never became part of the general assets of Drucker at all. He never had any right to receive it, or use it, or apply it to any purpose except this one particular purpose. Under these circumstances it seems to me it was impressed with a trust. Not in the strict sense of the word trust, but in substance with a trust that it should be applied by Messrs. Beyfus & Beyfus out of their own money for the discharge pro tanto of the claim of the bank. That being so the present application of the trustee Drucker's bankruptcy fails. I say nothing about any possible application to get rid of the charge. I do not know whether it would succeed or not.

Admiralty—Ship—Action in rem—Misdescription of plaintiffs in writ—Practice.

Where there is a misdescription on a writ in an action in rem, without real substance in it,

The Court will allow such writ to be amended.

Motion.

This was a motion to set aside a writ in an action in rem on the ground of the misdescription of the plaintiff.

The writ was issued in the name of Louis Dreyfus & Co., as owners of the cargo ex steamship Assunta.

The firm of Louis Dreyfus & Co. carry on business in London, but the sole partner in the firm is M. Leopold Louis Dreyfus, of Paris.

The ship had been arrested, but released on bail.

Leck, in support, cited Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494; ord. 48A, r. 1.

Nelson.—The misdescription is a mere technical irregularity, and leave should be given to amend. Ord. 48A, r. 1, is not applicable to actions in rem.

He cited The Maréchal Suchet, 45 W. R. 141, [1896] P. 233; The Longford, 37 W. R. 372, 14 P. D. 34; The Freedom, L. R. 3 A. & E. 495, 20 W. R. Adm. Dig. 16; Dickson v. Law & Davidson, 43 W. R. 596, [1895] 2 Ch. 62; Petty v Daniel, 35 W. R. 151, 34 Ch. D. 172; St. Gobain Co. v. Hoyermann's Agency, 41 W. R. 563, [1893] 2 Q. B. 96.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said the question was whether this writ was wrong. It was an important case, because if the writ was set aside the plaintiff might lose his remedy, as the steamship Assunta had been released and had sailed, and the plaintiff might not be able to arrest her again. It was not necessary to decide the question whether ord. 48A, r. 1, was applicable to actions in rem or not, for by the old-established rule of the Admiralty Court the owners of a cargo laden on board a ship were entitled to sue in rem as such. It was a practice peculiar to the Admiralty Court, and could never have been followed at common law, and therefore he could not hold that the rule referred to was intended to or did abrogate the old and valuable practice of the Admiralty Court. If in this case the plaintiffs had been described as "The owners of the cargo of the Assunta" the writ would have been good, and as the plaintiff was so described in the indorsement of the writ, he did not think that under the circumstances the misdescription on the face of the writ was more than a mere irregularity with no real substance in it, and therefore he should give leave to the plaintiff to amend.

MORRIS v. NORTHERN EMPLOYERS' MUTUAL INDEMNITY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Appeal—Insurance moneys—Order for payment to workman—"Action or matter"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 5.

An appeal lies to the High Court from an order made by a county court judge for the payment of insurance moneys under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Kniveton v. Northern Employers' Mutual Indemnity Co., [1902] 1 K B. 880, approved.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) reversing an order of the judge of the Bolton County Court.

The appellant, Morris, was a collier in the employment of the Darcy Lever Coal Co. (Limited), and he was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. An award was made against his employers under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for payment to him during incapacity of the weekly sum of 19s. The Darcy Lever Coal Co. was being wound up, and no payments were made under the award. The appellant thereupon applied for an order under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for payment direct to him of the weekly sums by the Northern Employers' Mutual Indemnity Co., as insurers, on the ground that the coal company were entitled to be paid those sums by the indemnity company.

The county court judge made the order asked for.

The indemnity company appealed to the Divisional Court, which held, following their own decision in Kniveton v. Northern Mutual Indemnity Co., [1902] 1 K. B. 880, that an appeal lay to the High Court from the order of the county court judge, and they reversed the order appealed against.

Morris appealed.

Ruegg, K.C., and Chester Jones, for the appellant.—No appeal lies to the High Court from an order of a county court judge made under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. There is no appeal from any order made under the Act except where given by the Act itself. Schedule II., clause 4, to the Act gives an appeal to the Court of Appeal from the decision of the county court judge upon a question of law arising in an arbitration under the Act. This court held in Leech v. Life and Health Assurance Association, 49 W. R. 482, [1901] 1 K. B 707, that no appeal lies direct to the Court of Appeal from an order of a county court judge under section 5 of the Act. The consequence is that no appeal lies to any court from the order of the county court judge. The order is in truth a mere aid to execution, and no appeal was intended to lie. Nor is this an order in a "matter" within section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as that section does not apply to the Act of 1897. The decision of the Divisional Court in Kniveton v. Northern Employers' Mutual Indemnity Co., was wrong, and ought to be overruled.

They also referred to rule 51 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898.

Haldane, K.C., and F. E. Smith, for the indemnity company, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court discharging an order made by the county court judge under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That section gives a workman, who has been injured by an accident, and in whose favour an award of compensation has been made, in the event of the bankruptcy of his employer or if his employers are a company in the event of their being wound up, a charge upon any moneys which his employer is entitled to receive from insurers in respect of the amount due to the workman, and to payment of the moneys as therein prescribed. The county court judge in the present case made an order under section 5, on the workman's application, for payment by the insurers, the indemnity company, direct to him of the weekly sums. From that order the indemnity company appealed to the Divisional Court, this court having held, in Leech v. Life and Health Assurance Association, that no appeal lies in such a case direct to the Court of Appeal.

In the Divisional Court the point was taken that no appeal lay to that court. The Divisional Court overruled that objection, holding that they had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and they accordingly heard it and reversed the order of the county court judge. From that decision an appeal has been brought to this court, and the question has been raised here whether the Divisional Court had any jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. In Leech v. Life and Health Assurance Association we held that this was not a matter which was part of an arbitration under the Act, but was a matter subsequent and ancillary thereto, and therefore did not come within the appellate jurisdiction conferred by the Act upon this court; but we did not hold that no appeal lay at all. Therefore the position is this: There is an order of a county court judge acting within his jurisdiction as such and dealing with what may be described as a "matter" within the meaning of section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The words of section 120 are "action or matter," and it seems to me that the word "matter" is amply wide enough to cover such a case as the present. There was, therefore, primâ facie jurisdiction in the Divisional Court to entertain the appeal in the ordinary course of their appellate jurisdiction, unless there is some provision in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, ousting that jurisdiction. The appellant's counsel has been unable to point out anything in the Act which, while creating this matter, at the same time withdraws it from the ordinary appellate jurisdiction of the High Court in county court cases. The Divisional Court had therefore jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

The appeal was then heard on the merits, and dismissed.

GATES v. R. BILL & SON. (a.)

Metropolis—Hackney carriage—Negligence of driver—Liability of proprietor—Licence taken out in name of one partner—London Hackney Carriages Acts, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22) and 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 86).

The proprietor of a hackney carriage is liable, as a master, under the London Hackney Carriages Act, 1843, so far as regards the members of the public, for the acts of the driver, though the licence for the carriage is not taken out in his name.

Application for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Ridley, J., and a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by a collision between a carriage which the plaintiff was driving and a hansom cab, the property of the defendants, which was a licensed hackney carriage within the Metropolitan district, the collision being caused by the negligence of the licensed driver of the cab.

The cab was licensed at Scotland Yard in the name of Harry Bill, the son of Rebecca Bill, and was hired out with a horse by the day to the driver for a fixed sum per day, the driver retaining for himself any sum he received beyond that fixed sum. An appearance to the action was entered by Rebecca Bill, "trading and sued as R. Bill & Son, defendant in this action." The jury found that Rebecca Bill was carrying on business as R Bill & Son in partnership with her son, Harry Bill, and they returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £55 damages.

H. Avory, K. C., and Moresby, for the defendant, Rebecca Bill.—The person in whose name the cab is licensed is alone liable for the acts of the driver. At common law the relation between the proprietor and the driver of a cab hired out by the day was that of a bailor and bailee, and the bailor would not be liable for the acts of the driver. The London Hackney Carriages Acts, 1831 and 1843, have altered that relation, and have placed the licensed proprietor in the position of master to the licensed driver so far as regards the members of the public. But that liability of master for the acts of his servant is not extended beyond the licensed proprietor. It does not extend to a proprietor who is not licensed. The object of the Acts is to enable the licensed person to be summoned for an offence against the Act, and to avoid any objection there might be as to the omission to summon all the partners. The object was to make the licensed proprietor alone liable. Therefore the relation of master and servant created by the Acts extends only to the licensed proprietor of the hackney carriage. The defendant, Rebecca Bill, is therefore not liable. [They referred to Powles v. Hider, 4 W. R. 492, 6 E. & B. 207; Venables v. Smith, 25 W. R. 584, 2 Q B. D. 279; King v. London Improved Cab Co., 37 W. R. 737, 23 Q. B. D. 281; Keen v. Henry, 42 W. R. 214, [1894] 1 Q. B. 292. They also contended that there was no evidence of partnership between Rebecca Bill and Harry Bill.]

Hammond Chambers, K.C, and Woodfin, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is clear that there was evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find as they did upon the question of partnership. The only other question is one of law. With regard to it, I cannot for myself consider the decisions as entirely satisfactory. In Fowler v. Lock, 20 W. R. 672, L. R 7 C. P. 272, the action was brought by the cab driver against the cab proprietor, and therefore no question arose between the cab proprietor and a member of the public. Speaking for myself, in spite of the great authority of Willes, J, who did not agree with the other members of the court, I think, as Cockburn, C.J., thought in Venables v. Smith, that the decision of the majority of the court in that case was right, and that the relation at common law between the cab proprietor and the cab driver was not that of master and servant, but that of bailor and bailee. That, in my opinion, was their true relation apart from London Hackney Carriages Acts. In the earlier case of Powles v. Hider it seems to me that Lord Campbell went upon the assumption that the relation between the cab proprietor and the driver who hired the cab was that of master and servant. It is true that in his judgment he referred to the London Hackney Carriages Acts, but, as it seems to me, only for the purpose of seeing whether the defendant, by having his cab licensed under the Acts, to which is annexed the condition that his name is put on the cab, did not hold himself out to the public as the proprietor, and did not incur the liabilities of proprietor. Those cases were followed by King v. London Improved Cab Co. and Keen v. Henry. In the former of these two cases I do not think that Lord Esher was prepared to accept the view that the relation at common law between the proprietor and the driver who hired the cab was that of master and servant. He based his judgment entirely on the Acts. In the second of the two cases one finds the same view adopted, Lord Esher and Lopes, L.J., being parties to both decisions. In those circumstances I do not think it can be said that the grounds of the decisions in all the cases are the same. If this question had been entirely free from authority, and we had to look at the Acts alone, I for my part should hesitate to draw the inference that the Legislature meant to impose on the cab proprietor any new liability in respect of matters other than those dealt with in sections 28 and 35 of the London Hackney Carriages Act, 1843. But I am not at liberty to deal with this question apart from authority. We have two lines of decisions, one based upon the inference of fact as to the relation between the cab proprietor and the driver, and the other upon the Acts, and in both the cab proprietor has been held liable to members of the public for the acts of the driver. Therefore the only question is whether the present case comes within the decisions on the Acts. Is Rebecca Bill liable under the Acts as the proprietor? Once it is found as a fact that she was a partner in the business, and therefore was one of the proprietors, it seems to me that the question is at an end. I do not accept the contention that the licensed proprietor is the only person liable as the proprietor. There seems to me to be no such limitation of the word proprietor in the Act. But even if we assume that that contention is a good one, it does not assist the defendant in the present case, because in my opinion the registration adopted here was intended to include Mrs. Bill as one of the partners in the business. The verdict and judgment must therefore stand.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I do not see my way to upset the verdict of the jury on the question of fact. That being so, the only question is one of law—namely, assuming that Mrs. Bill is a partner in the business, is she liable in this action? It is true that at common law where the proprietor hires out the cab to the driver on the terms on which it was hired out here, the relation between them at common law was not that of master and servant, but of bailor and bailee. But since the London Hackney Carriages Act, 1843, there has been a long series of decisions, and the law is now well settled that a proprietor of a London cab who hires out his cab to a driver on the terms upon which the cab was hired out in the present case stands towards the driver, so far as the members of the public are concerned, in the relation of master to servant. It is true that under the Act the proprietor must obtain a licence for his cab, but I fail to see how the liability of the cab proprietor towards the public can depend upon his having obtained a licence. It would be strange if the proprietor, whose duty it is to obtain a licence, could say that by disregarding his duty he could escape liability, whereas by fulfilling his duty he would render himself liable. In the present case I prefer to assume in favour of Mrs. Bill that she has not committed any breach of duty in not obtaining a licence in her own name. I think that the son by obtaining the licence in his own name must be taken to have obtained it on behalf of himself and Mrs. Bill. In either case Mrs. Bill is liable.

BLOOD v. BLOOD. (a.)

Divorce—Variation of settlement—Vested interest of child—Settled property—Extinguishment of rights of guilty party—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.

By a marriage settlement property of the wife was settled upon trusts for the wife for life, then for her husband if he survived her, with remainder to the children of the marriage. There was one child of the marriage, who attained twenty-one, and died a bachelor and intestate, the beneficial interest which he had acquired in the property on attaining twenty-one passing to his father as sole next-of-kin. Subsequently to the death of this child the wife obtained a divorce from her husband.

Held, that the property was settled property within section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, and that the court would, under the jurisdiction conferred by that section, vary the settlement by extinguishing all the rights, powers, and interests of the husband thereunder, including any beneficial derivative interest which he took as next-of-kin of his deceased son.

Decision of Barnes, J. (ante, p. 138), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Barnes, J. (reported ante, p. 138), upon a motion for the variation of the settlement made upon the marriage of Constance Rebecca Blood with Neptune William Blood.

On the 14th of January, 1901, a decree absolute for the dissolution of the marriage was made on the wife's petition, on the ground of the husband's adultery and desertion.

An ante-nuptial settlement was executed on the 25th of July, 1877, by which a sum of £4,000 Great Western Railway Stock, the property of the wife, was settled in trust for the wife for her life, then to the husband for his life, if he should survive her, with remainder to the children of the marriage, with a proviso that, if the wife should survive the husband and marry again after his death, and there should be only one child of the first marriage, the wife should be at liberty to appoint a moiety of the income of the trust fund to her second husband for his life, and a moiety of the trust funds to the children of the second marriage. There had been only one child of the first marriage, a son, who attained twenty-one on the 13th of July, 1899, and died on the 16th of July, 1900, a bachelor and intestate. He had on attaining twenty-one acquired a vested interest in the settled fund, the beneficial interest in which passed on his death to his father as his sole next-of-kin.

After the dissolution of the marriage the father married again, and he then executed a settlement of the previously settled property which had come to him as the representative of his son, but "subject to any variation in the terms of the (original) settlement which may be made by the court."

The first wife applied under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, for a variation of her settlement, and she asked that the whole fund might be reassigned to her free from any interest of her late husband.

Section 5 provides that "the court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents, as to the court shall seem fit."

The learned judge held that under this section the court had power to make an order varying the settlements, notwithstanding that the son had attained a vested interest, and his lordship ordered that the fund should be retransferred to the wife, free from any interest of her former husband.

The husband appealed.

Inderwick, K.C., and Barnard, for the husband.—We first of all submit that this is not settled property at all within the meaning of section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859. Even if it is, the section gives the court no power to affect the interest of a child of the marriage, during the child's life, and we submit that the court's jurisdiction cannot be increased by the child's death. That there is no jurisdiction is shown by Crisp v. Crisp, 21 W. R. 79, L. R. 2 P. & D. 426.

Hon. F. Russell (Priestley with him), for the wife.—All that the court refused to do in Crisp v. Crisp was to extinguish the settlement altogether. None of the cases throw any doubt on the jurisdiction of the court to make such an order as has been made in the present case.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of my brother Barnes affecting the interest of the husband, against whom a decree for divorce had gone; and the learned judge acted under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, which is in these terms: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Now the circumstances were these: By the marriage settlement the only fund that we have to deal with in this case, which was that of the wife, was settled upon the wife for life, then upon the husband for life, and then upon the child, and this fund therefore (after the death of the second tenant for life, the husband) would, in the absence of anything intervening, go to the child or children. In this case there was only one child—a son—and he would take the whole of that fund subject to a condition which empowered the wife, upon second marriage, to appoint half of it for the benefit of the children of the second marriage. That was the condition of affairs at the time when application was made to Barnes, J., to act under the section that I have read, the decree having then gone against the husband. What Barnes, J., has done is to extinguish the life interest of the father in the settlement, and there is an appeal against that order, on these grounds. The husband says that that order ought not to extend to the share which passed to the son, or would have passed to the son, who died before the date of the decree in question. The son died without a will, and the father, as next-of-kin, takes whatever the son's interest was.

Now as to the order—which extends not only to the father's life interest, but to the fund which he takes as next-of-kin to his son—it is said that it was made without jurisdiction—that there was no power to deal with that fund at all, inasmuch as the power of the judge is limited by the section which I have read to a settlement and to property settled; and that, this father coming as next-of-kin of his son, there was no property settled, and that, therefore, there is no jurisdiction to deal with it at all. That is one objection, and I will deal with that at once. The answer to that objection is this: The wording of the section is this, "may make such order with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled." The question therefore is, Is this property with respect to which you may make the order settled or not settled? At the time when the application was made there were two outstanding life interests in the fund, and obviously the fund was in the custody of the trustees for the purpose of the settlement and of giving the two successive life tenants the benefit of the life interest to which they were entitled before the estate in remainder came into existence at all. One of those life estates had been extinguished under this order. That was an order dealing with settled property. There was no mistake about that. Therefore there was clearly jurisdiction to make it.

Then it is said also that that is not an order which the court has jurisdiction to make, even dealing with the property as settled, because it affects the interests of the children, and that, rightly understood, the words that I have read in this section, though they do enable the court to annihilate, or diminish, or vary the interest of the delinquent parent in the subject-matter of the settlement, do not allow the court to diminish or annul the interest of the children. It is not necessary to decide that point here. I cannot say that I have been much influenced by the argument upon which it was based, nor do I think that the authority that was most relied upon as supporting it—namely, Crisp v. Crisp, when fairly construed, goes to that extent, or anything like it. But I do not think it necessary to deal with that point on the decision of this case, because I think the order here certainly ought to be to vary the settlement by extinguishing the life interest of the father and any beneficial interest of the father as next-of-kin of his deceased son. That order, which will give effect to all that is really necessary to carry out the intention of the learned judge, gets rid of any difficulty or any possible difficulty as to want of jurisdiction to deal with the interest of the son.

There were two points relied upon—namely, that there was no jurisdiction at all, because this was not settled property, and that if there was jurisdiction to deal with it as settled property, there was, nevertheless, a want of jurisdiction to in any way affect or diminish the interest of a child. It seems to me that both those points fail, and that the order that I have stated, and which my brother Stirling first suggested, is the proper order that ought to be made, and gets rid of any possible difficulty in this matter.

Therefore, in my judgment, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The section gives the court power "to make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled, either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents, as the court shall think fit." The first question which is to be considered is whether there is here property settled within the meaning of the section. Prior to the making of this order which is appealed from the property stood limited thus: Upon trust for the wife during her life, then for the husband during his life, and then for the only child of the marriage, who had died intestate. In point of fact, no representation has yet been taken out to the son; he has no legal personal representative; but the sole next-of-kin was his father, the husband, in this particular case.

Now, in that state of things, it seems to me that there was property settled. There were two subsisting life interests before you come to the reversion which belonged to the legal personal representative of the son; and the words of the section seem to me ample to give the court power to deal with it as settled property. But then this is also said, that the court in dealing with property settled will not so deal with it as to deprive any person of a vested interest under the settlement, not being, of course, either the husband or wife, one of whom must necessarily be a guilty party. It certainly is a very strong thing to confer a power on any court to alter vested interests in property; and there appears from the reported cases to have been a strong objection on the part of the judges of this court to deal with property in such a way as to disturb vested interests. But none of the cases which have been cited go to the length, as it appears to me, of saying that there is no jurisdiction to do it. The case which was most relied upon is that of Crisp v. Crisp, but what the learned judge held there as being beyond the power of the court was not to modify the interests under the settlement, but to extinguish it altogether; and, if I may respectfully say so, I entirely agree. It appears to me, that except so far as the court, in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon it, sees fit to alter the provisions of the settlement for the benefit either of of children of the marriage or for one or other of the parents, the settlement must remain, and that the court has no power to extinguish it. The result of the cases appears to me to be correctly summed up by the President in the case to which we have been referred of Whitton v. Whitton. There the President says: "I am clear I have jurisdiction to do so"—that is, to alter a vested interest—"and I think no case has ever thrown doubt on that; the case of Pollard v. Pollard certainly does not throw doubt on the jurisdiction, but one has in those cases to consider what is really for the benefit of the children, because I think the authorities show that nothing must be done that on the whole would be for the disadvantage of the children. This does not so much turn on the words of the Act of Parliament, but generally on the principle that the children being innocent parties ought not to have their interests injuriously affected by the conduct of either of their parents." Here we are not prejudicing a child. The order which has been made does not affect the child. The child is dead. The beneficial interest has, by reason of the death of the child, become vested in the husband, and it is only that interest so derived from the child that is proposed to be affected as the order has been modified. It seems to me that that is not open to the objection which is pointed out by the President in Whitton v. Whitton, but is within the powers of the court.

I think that the order ought to be modified so as to provide that the settlement be varied by extinguishing all the rights, powers, and interests of the appellant, including any beneficial derivative interest as next-of-kin of his son, in, concerning, or over the whole or any part of the capital and income of the settled funds; so that when the legal personal representative is appointed to the son such application may be made to the trustees as to the parties may seem right; but nothing ought to prejudice the rights of any persons deriving title from the son, whether they be mortgagees, or assigns, or creditors, or any other person except the father.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree. It was argued here, although it was not argued in the court below, that this was not settled property. It seems to me that a property is none the less settled because all the persons beneficially interested may be sui juris and capable together of dealing with it. Then, assuming it to be settled property, I desire to express my entire agreement with the view of Barnes, J., and Collins, M.R., and Stirling, L.J., as to the jurisdiction of the court to extinguish, in a proper case, an interest, although vested, of a child. In the present case, I do not think it is necessary for us, really, to consider that, because the order, as proposed to be altered, merely affects the interest of the husband, the guilty party. It affects his own original life interest, and it affects such interest as he has beneficially as sole next-of-kin of the deceased son. Administration, of course, will have to be taken out, and then one other possible difficulty may very easily be got over—that, if the wife should marry again, she has, according to the settlement, a certain power of appointing a life interest in favour of a second husband and appointing half of the fund in favour of the children of the second marriage; but that is a power which she can release, and when that is done and administration is taken out, there will be no difficulty.

NEAVERSON v. PETERBOROUGH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Inclosure—Private road—Pasturage—Ownership of soil—User in excess of award—Prescription—Presumption of lost grant.

By an award made under an Inclosure Act of 1812, which was passed for the draining, inclosing, and improving of a district of fen country, it was provided that all the herbage which should from time to time grow upon all the private roads therein set out should belong to and be the property of the surveyor of highways for the time being, to be by him let annually for the depasturing of sound and healthy sheep, but of no other cattle or stock whatever.

The plaintiff was the occupier of a farm, allotted under the award, adjoining a private road. Since 1846 the pasturage of this private road, along with other roads, had been let annually, pursuant to directions given at public vestry meetings, without any restriction providing for depasturing sheep only. In an action by the plaintiff against the rural district council (the successors of the surveyor of highways) complaining of their having let the road for the depasturing of cattle and horses,

Held, that, inasmuch as the restriction of pasturage to sheep was part of a permanent scheme for the drainage of a large area of land, and was intended for the benefit of the public and not only of the owners of land adjoining the road, any grant of a right to depasture cattle or horses on the road would have been illegal; and, therefore, the court ought not to presume a lost grant of any such right.

Judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J. (49 W. R. 154, [1901] 1 Ch. 22), reversed.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J. (49 W. R. 154, [1901] 1 Ch. 22).

The action was brought for an injunction to restrain the defendants from grazing or depasturing horses, cattle, or stock other than sound and healthy sheep in or upon a private road called Moor-road, in the parish of Newborough, contrary to the provisions of the Newborough Inclosure Act, 1812, and an award made thereunder, and for damages.

By the Newborough Inclosure Act (52 Geo. 3, c. cxliii.), which was intituled "An Act for draining, inclosing, and improving the lands called Borough Fen Common and the Four Hundred Acre Common, in the county of Northampton, and for forming the same into a parish to be called Newborough, and for building and endowing a church for such parish," the Borough Fen Common and the Four Hundred Acre Common were dealt with substantially in the manner usually adopted in Inclosure Acts. Commissioners were appointed, who were directed (inter alia) to set out certain roads, and it was enacted by section 21 that the herbage of the public and private roads should belong to and be the property of the person or persons to whom the commissioners should allot and award the same. By section 24 one-twentieth part of the land was to be allotted to the lord of the manor in respect of his right to the soil, and by section 27 such allotment was to be had and taken in lieu full bar and compensation for all right of soil in the said open common or waste land therein directed to be divided and inclosed. The award under this Act was made in 1822. It set out a large number of roads, public and private, amongst others "one private carriage, bridle, and drift road and footpath distinguished by the name of Moor-road of the breadth of 40ft."

By the award all private roads were to be kept in repair by and at the expense of the owners and proprietors of lands and estates on the Borough Fen Common and the Four Hundred Acre Common in such shares and proportions as they by law were or thereafter would be liable to contribute to the repair of the public roads.

The award provided that all the grass and herbage which should from time to time grow and arise upon all the private roads set out and thereinbefore awarded should belong to and be the property of the surveyor for the time being of the highways to be appointed for the said common and waste land called the Borough Fen Common and the Four Hundred Acre Common, to be by him let annually for the depasturing of sound and healthy sheep, but of no other cattle or stock whatever, at and for the best rent or rents that could be reasonably obtained for the same; and that such rent or rents should be annually paid and applied towards defraying the charges and expenses of maintaining and keeping in repair the said public and private roads.

The plaintiff was the occupier of a farm, allotted under the award, on one side of Moor-road, from which it was separated by a ditch, with a low hedge on the farm side of the ditch.

In 1899 the defendants, the Rural District Council of Peterborough, who were the successors of the surveyor of the highways, let Moor-road by auction to the defendant Vergette upon conditions of which the following alone are material: "4. That not more than six horses nor more than twelve beasts shall be allowed to graze on any road at one time, under a penalty of 5s. for every head of stock above the number, and if any stock be found on any of the roads without a tender, such stock shall be deemed trespassers, and be impounded accordingly. 5. That no swine or geese shall be allowed to graze on any of the said roads. 6. That if any scabbed sheep or diseased or entire cattle be found grazing upon any of the said roads or highways, the owner thereof shall forfeit and pay to the District Council of Peterborough the sum of 10s. for every such animal."

The defendant Vergette turned horses and cattle in excess of the prescribed number into Moor-road, and without a tender.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction and damages on the ground that he was by the award bound to maintain the ditch and fence between his farm and the road, and that by reason of cattle and horses being allowed to graze on the road, the banks of the ditch were broken down, and the flow of water in the ditch obstructed, and the cost of cleaning the same increased, and that damage had been caused by horses and cattle breaking through the plaintiff's hedge and eating grass and corn in the fields adjacent to the road.

The defendant Vergette paid 40s. damages, and the action was discontinued against him.

The defendant council paid 40s. into court with a denial of liability.

The evidence showed that at least since 1846 the roads, including Moor-road, had been let by public auction year by year pursuant to directions given at public vestry meetings without any restriction providing for depasturing sheep only. On the contrary, the conditions generally provided a limit as to the number of cattle or horses which might be grazed upon Moor-road.

Cozens-Hardy, J., was of opinion that he might presume a lost grant by the owners of the soil of the road, by virtue of which the surveyors of highways were released from the restrictions imposed by the award as to the mode of grazing, and on that ground he gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from depasturing horses, cattle, or stock other than sound and healthy sheep on a private road, on which the plaintiff's farm fronts, and for damages. The defence is that the road in question was and is a private road which was laid out under an Inclosure Act and an award, and that the herbage on all the private roads so laid out became by virtue of the Act and the award the property of the surveyor of highways, and that the defendants, the Rural District Council of Peterborough, as the successors to the surveyor of highways, have by themselves or their tenants enjoyed the right to depasture upon the said herbage sheep, stock, horses, and cattle of all kinds for a period of over sixty years or alternatively for a period over twenty years. The defence must be taken to mean that it must be presumed that a grant of the right of grazing the herbage was made by someone to the surveyor, and that under that grant the surveyor had let the herbage for the purpose of depasturing cattle and horses as well as sheep.

The question shortly is this. The Act of Parliament, which provides for the inclosure and drainage of a district, contains provisions limiting the pasturage on roads laid out under the Act in an area called the Foreland to sheep, and it also contained a provision that the herbage on the public and private roads should belong to and be the property of the person or persons to whom the commissioners should allot and award the same. By the award made by the commissioners it was provided that the herbage on all the private roads should belong to and be the property of the surveyor of highways, to be by him let annually for the depasturing of sound and healthy sheep, but of no other cattle or stock whatever. The question is whether, in view of the provisions of the Act of Parliament and the award, it would have been legally possible for anyone to grant to the surveyor the right to let the herbage on the private road in question freed from that limitation. Evidence has been given to show that for a long period the herbage on the private roads has been let for the pasturage of cattle and horses. Can proof of that be evidence of a grant which could have a legal origin? If such a grant could not have a legal origin, then it is not for us to presume its existence. If, on the other hand, there could be a legal origin for such a grant as that which is suggested, then, no doubt, according to a well-established principle, we ought to presume it when there is evidence of user for a long period. Such a presumption, however, is more difficult to make where the number of persons who are supposed to have given the grant is large and the period within which it is supposed to have been given is short.

The Act is called "an act for draining, inclosing, and improving the lands called Borough Fen Common and the Four Hundred Acre Common, in the county of Northampton; and for forming the same into a parish to be called Newborough; and for building and endowing a church for such parish." It does not, like ordinary Inclosure Acts, merely deal with the rights of persons having an interest in common land, and provide for dividing those lands among such persons in severalty, but it is primarily a scheme for the drainage of a large area of land which was then fen land. Both the recitals and the sections of the Act show that it was intended by Parliament to be a permanent scheme for the drainage of a large area of land, and of that as part of a much larger area—viz., the area called the North Level, which is part of the Great Level of the Fens called the Bedford Level. The object was the complete and systematic drainage of a district right down to the sea. The Act, after providing for the setting out and allotting of a certain foreland and the setting out of roads across it, and after providing that sheep only should be allowed to pasture on those roads, proceeded to provide for the setting out of other public and private roads, and by section 21 it said that the herbage of those public and private roads should belong to and be the property of the person or persons to whom the commissioners should allot and award the same. And in connection with this it is important to notice that the provisions of the Act for the preservation of the drainage system are in the interest of the public, and not only of the allottees. The award, which was made in 1822, provided that the herbage of certain of the public and private roads, including the road in question, should belong to and be the property of the surveyor of highways, but he was only to use it for definite purposes—viz., to let it annually for the depasturing of sound and healthy sheep, and of no other cattle or stock whatever. The reason that some parts were to be depastured by sheep only was, no doubt, because cattle might become a serious nuisance to the maintenance of the drainage by trampling down the dykes.

It appears from the award that at the time when it was made the fences between this road and the allotments had been already made; and I think the provision which excluded stock other than sheep was intended to be ancillary to the main object of the Act, and not a mere temporary provision relating only to a time while the fences were growing up. I do not think that, in the face of that provision in the award, it would have been competent for the owners of the soil of this road or for anyone to grant the right of depasturing cattle or horses on it; for such a grant would have been contrary to the purpose of the Act as being an interference with the drainage of the district. It was argued that the provision limiting the right of pasturage was meant to be for the benefit of the persons who owned the land adjoining the particular road, and that, as it was for their benefit, they could waive it. And, secondly, it was said that it was a temporary provision intended only to apply during the time that the fences were growing, and that it did not really negative the right to put horses and cattle on the road. For the reasons already stated, I think that the limitation was intended to be for the public benefit, and was not intended to be merely temporary, and I think we cannot infer from the Act that it was introduced merely for the purpose of benefiting the adjoining owners. We were pressed with the case of Haigh v. West, 41 W. R. 87, [1893] 2 Q. B. 19. In that case, however, the Act and the award were very special and did not deal with fen country at all, and the provision in question was construed as limited to the time before the general scheme came into operation. Here the limitation came after the general scheme had been carried out. In my opinion, the provision for excluding cattle from the herbage of the roads was intended to be one of the principal matters of the scheme. I think therefore that the suggested grant would have been illegal, and we cannot, when we are seeking to find a legal origin to justify an existing practice, rely on an illegal origin.

It is difficult to say who could have been the grantors or the grantee. It is suggested that a grant to the surveyor of highways may be inferred. There is a difficulty as to that, as the surveyor of highways is not a corporation. But the difficulty as to the grantors is greater. It is suggested that the grantors were the owners of the soil adjoining the road. But the condition limiting the right of pasturage was not introduced for their benefit, and they could not waive it. If they enlarged the right, they did what was illegal. Then it is suggested that the grantors were the inhabitants of the parish. But neither could they, even if they were all of one mind, rightly assent to an illegal act. The presumption of a lost grant, therefore, cannot avail the defendants. If we were to presume anything it must be a lost Act of Parliament. The award, however, did not come into operation till 1822, and it seems to me to be impossible to infer that an Act of Parliament passed after 1822 has been lost since then. In my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the damages which have been agreed to be sufficient, though it does not seem to be a case for an injunction. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

DUDER v. AMSTERDAMSCH TRUSTEES KANTOOR. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of jurisdiction—Debenture deed—Foreign assets—Necessary or proper party to an action—R. S. C., ord. 11, r. 1 (g).

In an action where the court has jurisdiction to grant the relief asked, service of the writ on persons outside the jurisdiction who are necessary and proper parties to the action will be allowed.

Motions.

These were two cross-motions in an action brought by a foreign firm, of which one of the partners, a Mr. George H. Duder, was resident in England, for a declaration that under two deeds, dated the 13th of July, 1899, and the 21st of August, 1900, they, or some of them, were entitled to a charge upon certain freehold hereditaments and other property situate in Brazil comprised in a debenture trust deed bearing date the 25th of September, 1894, and upon the undertaking of the Bahia Central Sugar Factories (Limited) and all its assets present and future for securing moneys due, for an account, for enforcement of the charge by foreclosure or sale, and a receiver. The defendants to the action were the Amsterdamsch Trustees Kantoor (a Dutch company having no place of business nor assets in England), who were sued as trustees under the above-mentioned deed of the 25th of September, 1894, Swales and Campbell as receivers under the same deed, and the Bahia Co. (Limited) an English company having property and a business in Brazil.

The facts of the case were as follow: By the debenture deed of the 25th of September, 1894, aforesaid, a deed made in English form, the defendants, the Amsterdamsch Trustees Kantoor, purported to convey certain freehold hereditaments in the state of Bahia, in Brazil, to the use of trustees in fee simple and to assign to them the benefit of a Brazilian Government guarantee.

The deed contained provisions whereby the company agreed to do all such things as would be necessary to give effect to the deed according to Brazilian law. The deed also provided that the mortgage debentures should constitute a first fixed charge on all the property. It enabled the trustees in certain events (one or more of which had taken place) to enter into possession of and to sell and convert the premises, and until sale to carry on the whole or any part of the business, and for such purpose to procure advances at a rate not exceeding 10 per cent. by mortgage or charge in priority to or subsequent to the debentures or otherwise. The trustees were empowered to appoint receivers with large powers, including the power to sell and other powers above mentioned. All moneys to arise under these powers were by the deed, so far as Brazilian law allowed, to be held by the trustees or the receivers subject to the repayment made or arranged by the trustees on the trusts therein mentioned, and the deed further provided that the deed was intended to operate as an English contract to be construed according to English law. The debentures purported to charge all the undertaking of the company, and all its assets both present and future as a first charge.

The defendants Swale and Campbell who were resident in England, were appointed receivers under the trust deed, and by an indenture bearing date the 13th of July, 1899, made between the trustees of the first part, the receivers of the second part, and G. H. Duder the elder, since deceased, a member of the plaintiff's firm, being supplemental to the indenture of the 25th of September, 1894, after reciting that for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company the trustees and receivers had entered into the agreement therein contained, it was agreed that the said G. H. Duder would provide £2,000 as thereinafter mentioned, and pay it to the credit of the receivers at a named bank.

There were also provisions for interest, for G. H. Duder financing the company for the crops of 1899 and 1900, advancing the necessary amounts for working expenses and payments, to include the £2,000.

By clause 5 of this indenture G. H. Duder was appointed agent of the receivers for the management of the crops and to have the sole privilege of selling produce and receiving the net proceeds, and at the end of the crop to pay to the receivers or to their order the profits that might be made, or should there be a loss such loss was to be a charge upon the factories and other assets of the company in favour of the said G. H. Duder in priority to the first or other debenture-holders, and interest was to be calculated and settled quarterly at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.

By clause 9 it was provided as follows: "All moneys payable or due hereunder to or on account of the said G. H. Duder shall be and are hereby charged upon all the mortgaged premises as defined by the principal indenture, and all the undertaking of the company and all its assets both present and future, such charge to rank in priority to the principal moneys and interest secured by principal indenture or the mortgagee's debentures as defined by the same indenture."

By deed dated the 21st of August, 1900, made between the defendants, the said trustees of the first part, the defendant and the receiver of the second part, and G. H. Duder, described as a partner of and for the purposes of that deed, representing the plaintiff firm of the third part, such deed being described as supplemental to the deed of the 25th of September, 1894, after reciting that for the purpose of carrying on the business of the defendant company the trustees and receivers had entered into the agreements with the plaintiff firm thereinafter contained, it was agreed that the plaintiff firm undertook to continue to finance the company for the crop 1900 and 1901, advancing the further necessary amounts for working expenses and in payment of sugar canes. All such advances to be placed to the debit of the receivers. The deed contained other provisions similar to those contained in the last-mentioned deed, and by clause 5 it was agreed that all moneys payable or due hereunder to or on account of the said G. H. Duder in respect of advances made by them for account of the company since they took over the business of the said G. H. Duder, deceased; and advances to be made by them should be, and the same were thereby charged upon all the mortgaged premises as defined by and all the undertaking of the company and all its assets both present and future, such a charge to rank in priority to the principal moneys and interest secured by the principal indenture or the mortgage debenture as defined by the same indenture, but subject to the claims, if any, of the said G. H. Duder, deceased, under the said indenture of the 13th of July, 1899.

The plaintiffs moved for the appointment of a receiver of the assets comprised in the debenture deed. The first defendants, the said trustees, moved to set aside the writ, to which they had appeared under protest, by consent, as if leave had been given to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction.

Levett, K.C., and Stokes, for the defendant trustees.—There is no authority for the court to allow service of the writ against the first defendants, or to act in personam against them. They have no property or place of business within the jurisdiction, and the subject-matter of the action relates only to property situate in Brazil, and can only be dealt with by a court in that country.

Rowden, K.C., and M. Romer, for the plaintiffs.—As the indenture creating the charge has been made between persons in this country in respect of land abroad the court has the same jurisdiction as if the land were situate in England. These defendants were proper parties to an action properly brought against other persons within the jurisdiction.

Levett, K.C., replied.

The arguments will be found further summarized, with the authorities, in the judgment.

BYRNE, J.—In this case there are cross-motions, one by the defendants, the Amsterdamsch Trustees Kantoor, a Dutch company incorporated according to the laws of Holland, having no place of business or assets in England, to set aside the writ to which they have appeared, saving their rights; and the other by the plaintiffs for the appointment of a receiver.

It was agreed that the defendants' motion ought to be dealt with as though leave had been given to serve notice of the writ abroad (which would have been the ordinary method of procedure), and as if this was an application to discharge such an order. I think that the case falls within the terms of ord. 11, r. 1 (g), as the defendants, the applicants in the first motion, are necessary or proper parties to an action properly brought against other parties properly served within the jurisdiction; but, nevertheless, the applicants on the second motion—i.e., the plaintiffs, ought not to succeed, if, as is contended, the court has no jurisdiction to grant the relief asked for in the action. The substantial points taken on behalf of the defendant applicants are that they are a Dutch company having no place of business or assets in England, that the action relates exclusively to immovable and movable property in the Republic of Brazil or elsewhere out of the jurisdiction, and that the rights sought to be enforced can only be determined and enforced by the courts of Brazil. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] If the defendants, the Amsterdamsch Trustees Kantoor, were resident in England I should entertain no doubt that the plaintiffs would be entitled to enforce their equitable charge against them, although the security were proved to have no operation in Brazil. The case of Ex parte Pollard, Mont. & Ch. 239, is in point.

In that case an equitable mortgage was given in English form of lands in Scotland by memorandum and deposit of Scotch title deeds. The mortgagors were partners, who carried on a business in England and Scotland, and they subsequently became bankrupts. It was proved that by the law of Scotland no lien or equitable charge was created by the deposit or memorandum in question. The creditor sought to establish his right to be treated as having a charge in the bankruptcy, and Lord Cottenham, L.C., upon appeal, upheld his contention.

In The British South Africa Co. v. The Companhia de Moçambique, [1893] A. C. 602 (a case having reference to an action to recover damages for a trespass to land situate abroad, where it was decided that no jurisdiction exists), Lord Herschell says, at p. 626, "Whilst courts of equity have never claimed to act directly upon lands situate abroad they have purported to act upon the conscience of persons living here." In Cranstoun v. Johnston, 3 Ves. 170, at p. 182, Sir R. P. Arden, M.R., said, "Archer v. Preston, Lord Arglasse v. Muschamp and Lord Kildare v. Eustace, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 133, 1 Vern. 75, 135, 419, clearly show that with regard to any contract made or executed between persons in this country respecting lands in a foreign country, particularly in the British dominions, the court will hold the same jurisdiction as if they were situate in England." The case of Norris v. Chambres, 9 W. R. 259, 29 Beav. 246, affirmed on appeal 9 W. R. 794, 3 De G. F. & J. 584, which was relied upon on behalf of the applicant defendants, appears to me to fall within another class of authorities, being the case of an attempt to sue when the relief sought was not founded upon any contract or privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant.

But it is argued that there is no precedent or authority for the exercise of the jurisdiction in personam unless against persons actually within this country, and that to allow service of notice of the writ upon a foreigner resident abroad, and thus to act in personam against him, would in effect be to enlarge or extend the jurisdiction of the court in a manner not authorized by principle or authority. It has been several times laid down that the rules under the Judicature Acts are rules of procedure only, not affecting and not intended to affect the rights of parties. [His lordship referred to the observations of Lord Herschell in British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Moçambique, [1893] A. C., at p. 628.] In Drummond v. Drummond, 15 W. R. 267, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 32, it was held that the court had power under the old consolidated orders to order service of the copy of a bill on the defendant, who was an English subject resident in Germany, although the nature of the suit was not such as to bring it within the provisions of the Acts 2 Will. 4, c. 33, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 82. Turner, L.J., says at L. R. 2 Ch. App., at p. 46: "The question in this case, as I view it, is not against whom or under what circumstances or in relation to what property, the Legislature of a country may be justified in authorizing the process of its courts to be served out of the jurisdiction of those courts, but whether the Legislature of this country has not in fact authorized the process of this court to be so served." The nature of the action in that case was, as appears from the report of the case in the court below, 14 W. R. 829, L. R. 2 Eq. 335, one having no relation to any property in England, but was to enforce a claim depending on Scotch law and to obtain a release of the Scotch lands from a charge. In the present case the service is authorized by the terms of the rule I have referred to, and I consider that to allow service in accordance with that rule is not to extend the jurisdiction, but to enable the old jurisdiction to be exercised in a case where at one time it could not have been exercised owing to the defective rules of procedure.

The important case of Bawtree v. Great North-West Central Railway Co. (which I am surprised to find reported only in 14 Times L. R. 448) is, I think, in point, and I do not consider the suggested distinction between that case and the present—viz., that there the validity of a charge on land in Canada was sub judice in Canada, while in the present case it is admitted that there is no subsisting charge by Brazilian law on the land in Brazil, is sufficient to differentiate the cases; as I understand the evidence about the Brazilian law, the plaintiffs, if they can so far establish their claim in England upon the contract, hope to be able to complete their title in Brazil also, and I see no reason why they should be prevented from endeavouring so to complete it.

One singular circumstance about the case is that the Amsterdamsch Trustees Kantoor are parties to an action brought by the first debenture-holders in which judgment was given directing amongst other inquiries an inquiry what other circumstances affect the property comprised in or charged by the deed of the 25th of September, 1894, and by another deed dated the 8th of June, 1897; and which directed an account of what was due to other incumbrancers, and an inquiry what were the priorities of such other incumbrances under the said indentures of the 25th of September, 1894, and the 8th of June, 1897, and the first and second mortgage debentures respectively; and what property other than that comprised in the said indentures and debentures respectively was comprised in such other incumbrances. That judgment has been or will be in due course served upon the plaintiffs in the present action, who can either come in and attend the inquiries, or stand loof from those proceedings altogether, relying on their claim to a prior charge and to their remedies in respect of it. At present they consider it more to their interest, and perhaps rightly, to insist on their rights outside the debenture-holders' action, and they ask for the appointment of a receiver. I think that they have made out a primâ facie right to a prior charge as against the defendants by virtue of their English contract, although there may be reasonable controversy, both as to the extent of property to which it relates and as to the amount due upon it. Under these circumstances I think that they are entitled to the appointment of a receiver as to so much of the property as is clearly within their contract; but it would probably be so inconvenient and detrimental to the property to appoint a separate receiver that I think it will be right to appoint the defendants Swale and Campbell to act as receivers for the plaintiffs in this action if they are willing to do so.

The motion of the defendants must be dismissed with costs and the costs of the plaintiffs' motion will be costs in the action.

STOKES (Appellant) v. MITCHESON (Respondent). (a.)

Mine — Coal mine — Rules — Enforcement by agent — Breach—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Vict. c. 58), s. 49, r. 1; s. 50—Inspector of mines—Dismissal of information—"Person aggrieved"—"Either party"—Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2) and 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33).

An information laid by an inspector of coal mines against the agent of a certain coal mine for an offence against the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, was dismissed, and on his application the justices stated a case, which purported to be stated under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

When the case came up for argument a preliminary objection was taken by the respondent that the inspector was not a "person aggrieved" within the meaning of section 33.

Held, that the case must be taken to have been stated under section 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and under section 33 of the Act of 1879, read together, the earlier of which Acts provides that "either party" may apply to have a case stated.

Held, also, that the justices were right in refusing to convict the agent of the mine for failing to cause adequate ventilation to be provided in the mine.

This was an appeal from the dismissal of the justices of Tamworth of an information under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, s 49, r. 1, for failing to cause an adequate amount of ventilation to be constantly produced in the mine, contrary to section 50 of that Act, which provides that in the event of contravention of the general rules in the Act by any person the owner, agent, or manager shall each be guilty of an offence against the Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the rules to prevent such contravention. Before the justices the evidence for the prosecution consisted only of the evidence of Hewitt, the assistant inspector, and was to the effect that he had found, when visiting the mine on the 1st of November, 1901, an accumulation of gas in a certain heading, and no sufficient ventilation, and that no entry of the gas was made in the report-book. He also proved admissions by the manager and the under-manager, which showed that the non-ventilation had been going on for several days previously, during which period the heading had been fenced off, but not so as to prevent the escape of gas.

The justices considered that such admissions were not evidence against the respondent, and with regard to him they only considered the state of things on the 1st of November.

With that limitation they considered that there was evidence of want of ventilation on that day amounting to a violation of the general rules for which the manager and under-manager were responsible, but the respondent, who was the agent of the mine, they thought was not proved to have committed an offence under the Act. They accordingly convicted the manager and the under-manager, but dismissed the information preferred against the respondent.

The inspector of mines thereupon asked the justices to state a case, which they did under powers given by section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

B. C. Brough, for the respondent, raised the preliminary objection to the appeal being heard that the appellant being one of his Majesty's inspectors of mines was not a "person aggrieved" within the meaning of those words in section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. The point had been taken but not decided in Stokes v. Checkland, 68 L. T. Rep. 457, 41 W. R. Dig. 141, and the decision in Reg. v. Justices of London, 39 W. R. 11, 25 Q.B. D. 357, was in his favour.

Sutton, for the appellant.—Whether the objection raised by the respondent be well founded or not is really immaterial because the justices could have stated the case equally well under the powers given them by section 2 of the Act of 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), which provided that "either party" might apply to the justices. The two Acts must be read together. "Person aggrieved" in the later Act was only a general term including those who in the previous Act had been given a right to appeal and also possibly covering cases where this court might be willing to hear a person who though not a party to the proceedings before the justices was able to show that he was adversely affected by the order.

B. C. Brough, in reply, relied on the fact that the case was expressly said to have been stated under the Act of 1879. If it had been stated under the Act of 1857 his objection would not have applied.

THE COURT decided to hear the appeal argued on its merits.

The case, after setting forth the facts already mentioned, stated that the justices, considered that the charge was not proved against the respondent on the following grounds: (a) The manager was primarily responsible for the conduct of the mine; (b) no evidence was given of the personal negligence of the respondent. The evidence showed that the violation of the rules took place by the negligence of the manager and under-manager. (c) No evidence was given of the publication of the rules; but the justices considered that the respondent had taken the proper steps to enforce the rules by appointing a duly-qualified manager and under-manager who knew the rules, and whose duty it was to carry them out without further interference from him. The violation of the rules was therefore in no way caused by the respondent omitting to enforce the rules. (d) As against the respondent only an occasional irregularity had been proved and not one which had been continuous. The question for the court was whether in view of sections 50 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, the justices were justified in dismissing the charge against the respondent.

Sutton, for the appellant.—The justices ought to have convicted the respondent because there is no evidence that he brought himself within the saving clause at the end of section 50. All the prosecution has to do is to show a primâ facie case of negligence, and the onus is then cast on the respondent: Wynne v. Forrester, 27 W. R. 820, 5 C. P. D. 361.

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., in giving judgment, said: In my opinion the preliminary objection taken to the hearing of this appeal by us is one of no substance, because I do not think that the Act of 1879 was ever intended to cut down the rights of the parties to apply for a case to be stated. Mr. Brough, for the respondent, suggested—I do not think it can be said that he put it higher than that—that as the justices had headed the case to the effect that it was stated by them under the Act of 1879, and as the "person aggrieved" in that Act did not include an unsuccessful prosecutor, the appeal could not lie. It seems to me that the point taken by the learned counsel might possibly, had it been taken before the justices, have raised the question whether the inspector had the right here to ask for a case under section 33 of that Act to be stated, and the justices might have submitted the point for the decision of the High Court. But clearly the inspector is a person who was a party within the Act of 1857, and although this case could not have been stated by the justices under the later Act, it could clearly have been stated by them under the former Act. As I have said during the argument, it is clear that the two Acts must be read together, and therefore the justices had power to state the case, and the omission to include the earlier Act in the head-line is one that really does not affect the question. Having, therefore, decided that the inspector had a right to have a case stated, this court is entitled to entertain the appeal.

On its merits Mr. Sutton contended that the respondent had not discharged the onus that was upon him, and he said that whenever a prosecution made a primâ facie case of negligence against an inspector of mines, he must show that he came within the saving clause of section 50, and to do that he ought to have gone into the box and given evidence to clear himself. Now that section enacts that in the event of contravention of the general rules in the Act by any person, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against the Act unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the rules to prevent such contravention. Now what was the evidence. It was said that informations for a similar offence had been laid against the manager and under-manager, who were to be certified. For the prosecution it was said by Hewitt, the assistant inspector, that he found an accumulation of gas in a certain heading and no sufficient ventilation, and that no entry of the gas was found in the report-book. He also proved admissions by the manager and the under-manager which showed that the non-ventilation had been going on for days, but the justices considered that such admissions were not evidence against the report. With that limitation they considered that there was evidence of want of ventilation amounting to a violation of the general rules. The justices convicted the manager and the under-manager. The respondent was personally present at the hearing, but his advocate called no witnesses and there was no evidence of any visits to the mine by him. In my opinion it could not be contended by Mr. Sutton with success that the respondent here had not met the onus which he said the information cast on him merely because he had not given evidence. It cannot be said that the person charged must be called. Such a suggestion is negatived in Baker v. Carter, 26 W.R. 497, 3 Ex. D.132. Counsel for the prosecution had not pressed the point as to the rules not being published. But it was said that there was a different rule as to onus of proof in the case of a mine agent from that of a mine owner. It seems to me that there are agents and agents; and there might be an owner who had taken such a part that he had some duties cast upon him usually cast upon agents or managers. For us to hold that the justices must convict the agent in respect of an offence found to be due to the negligence on a single occasion of the manager seems to me to be going a great deal further than the court ought to go. Here we have only to say whether the justices could have come to the conclusion they did on the facts before them, and in my judgment the court would be wrong if it interfered with the justices' decision, as there is ample evidence to support it.

REX v. FRENCH AND OTHERS.
Ex parte ROBERTS. (a.)

Justices—Jurisdiction—Summary conviction on charge of assault—Question as to title to land—Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 46.

By section 46 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, it is provided that nothing therein contained "shall authorize any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title to any land, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom."

Where one commoner commits an assault upon another commoner for an alleged improper use by the latter of his right of common, and no question arises as to title to the common or any interest therein or accruing therefrom, the jurisdiction to hear and determine the case of assault is not ousted by the above proviso.

The words "title to" govern not only the words "lands, tenements, or hereditaments," but also the words "any interest therein or accruing therefrom."

In this case a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari had been obtained to bring up and quash a conviction by justices of Suffolk of W. M. Roberts for an assault committed by him on one Freeman.

The following facts appear from the affidavits on which the rule nisi was granted:

Both Freeman and Roberts enjoyed common rights over Aspall Green, and before the magistrates it was stated in evidence that Freeman had for forty years carted produce to his farm over the green in question, and up to the time the assault was committed no dispute had arisen as to who enjoyed the common rights as between the parties.

It appeared that Freeman was leading a horse and tumbril laden with turnips across the green when Roberts came riding up, shouting, "Get off the grass." That was the first intimation that Freeman received that Roberts objected to his using the green for carting. Freeman did not get off the grass, but continued leading his horse and tumbril towards his farm. Roberts then rode right up to Freeman and hit him across the back and head with a hunting whip.

Prior to the assault no dispute had ever taken place between Freeman and Roberts as to their common rights, and previous to the day of the assault, the 16th of November, he (Freeman) had used the common without let or hindrance for a great number of years.

During the hearing of the case, before the bench, the point was taken by counsel for the defendant that the jurisdiction of the magistrates was ousted by reason of the fact that there was a claim of right set up by Roberts, and further, that it was in relation to that claim of right that the assault complained of was committed.

After hearing counsel's argument on both sides, and after retiring to consider the evidence and the arguments of counsel, the justices decided there was no evidence before them that the assault, if any, had been committed in connection with any bonâ fide assertion by Roberts of his claim of right. Their reasons for so deciding were that it was not disputed by the complainant in the assault case that both he and the accused enjoyed common rights, but no evidence was tendered by the accused, or at all, to show that prior to the actual time at which the assault was committed any complaint had been made by him of any alleged nuisance caused by the complainant or of any notice addressed to the complainant. As to the use of Aspall Green, evidence was given that both Freeman and Roberts during the two months prior to the assault had taken tumbrils laden with products across the green without complaint being addressed by either. The justices added that, although Roberts had alleged that the green was cut up and damaged, there was no confirmation of that, and there was no evidence that damage had been previously done in this way. Further, that there was no evidence that any notice of complaint had ever been addressed by Roberts to Freeman.

The justices therefore disallowed the objection and convicted the defendant.

This rule was thereupon obtained on behalf of the defendant.

Walter Stewart, for the complainant, showed cause against the rule.—The decision of the justices on the evidence before them was right. Both the complainant and defendant enjoyed rights of common over Aspall Green, and therefore the complainant was not a trespasser. Moreover, prior to the assault, no complaint had ever been made by the defendant of any improper use of the common by the complainant. No real question of title arose in this case. A mere frivolous claim of right does not take away the right of justices to deal with a case like this.

Horace Avory, K.C. (W. Rowley Ellaston with him), in support of the rule.—Section 46 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, contains as follows: "Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall authorize any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom. . . ." In the present case a question was raised as to title in land or as to an interest therein, and therefore the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted whether or not they think a bonâ fide claim was not raised. The justification set up for the assault was that the complainant was exceeding his rights as a commoner and was thereby causing damage to the defendant's interest in the land in respect of his right of pasture. On a claim as to title arising the justices cannot proceed to inquire into and determine by summary conviction any excess of force alleged to have been used in the assertion of title: Reg. v. Pearson, L. R 5 Q. B. 237, 18 W. R. Dig. 58. A commoner may remove by force anything that obstructs his enjoyment of the common: Perry v. FitzHowe, 8 Q. B. 757; Davies v. Williams. 16 Q. B. 546; and Hall v. Harding, 4 Burr. 2426. [DARLING, J., here referred to Jones v. Jones, 1 H. & C. 1, 11 W. R. Dig. 156, and Reg. v. Cridland, 5 W. R. 679, 7 E. & B. 853.] [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Does not the proviso to section 46 mean that there must be a question as to the title to the land or a question as to the title to any interest in the land accruing therefrom?] The meaning is that where there is a dispute as to land the jurisdiction is ousted.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 17.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This was a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash a conviction for assault, and the question was raised whether the justices had jurisdiction to entertain the matter on the ground that the proceedings came within the proviso of section 46 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861. Before I deal with that section it may be as well that I should state the facts. The complainant was J. G. Freeman, and Roberts was the defendant. Freeman and Roberts both had rights over a green at Aspall, and it appeared that, two or three days before the assault complained of took place, Freeman had been carting across this common in a way which Roberts objected to. It did not appear that Roberts had given Freeman any notice or raised any question against what he was doing until the day of the occurrence. On the day in question, Freeman was carting swedes across the green, and defendant, after some remonstrance—it did not appear what—assaulted the complainant by striking him with a riding-whip. The justices convicted the defendant, and came to the conclusion that the objection raised on behalf of the defendant, that the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted on the ground that the case raised a question as to an interest in land, was frivolous. Mr. Avory has argued that the question that had arisen was a bonâ fide claim of right, and I do not suggest that Mr. Avory was not right to a certain extent in contending the magistrates did not perfectly and clearly appreciate the difference between a question arising under the proviso to section 46 and a bonâ fide claim of right. It was not denied that the defendant might have been indicted for what happened, but it was argued by Mr. Avory that because the question as to the rights of common was connected with the assault the justices had no jurisdiction. I am of opinion the justices were quite right, and the point raised by Mr. Avory is not a good one. I do not think that section 46 can be construed as providing that any question of interest in land whenever raised, and however raised, is sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the justices. I think the justices' jurisdiction is ousted when the question as to the title to land or interest accruing therefrom arises in the proceedings. A question of title does not arise in the proceedings because the defendant says he owned the land upon which the plaintiff was when the assault took place. It seems to me that in the present case no question of title arose at all and no question of interest in land arose either. Both parties upon the affidavit were admitted to be commoners, and both were admitted to have rights there. No question arose as to their rights or title.

Mr. Avory argued that there was a right for commoners to remove an obstruction, and he cited authorities which are certainly binding upon us. In my opinion, however, to show that a question of right might arise in some proceedings in which commoners might have a right in law to remove an obstruction, in no way solves the question as to the true meaning of the proviso in section 46, or as to the conditions necessary for the application of that proviso. Mr. Avory also relied on the case of Reg. v. Pearson. It was held in that case that if it was shown a bonâ fide question as to the title of land is involved, the jurisdiction of the magistrates is ousted. If that case was really an authority upon the question raised in this case we should be bound by it; but in my opinion the facts in that case were different in substance from the facts in the present case so far as the proviso is concerned. It was uncontradicted in the case of Reg. v. Pearson that the assault was committed in the assertion of title, and it was not denied that the defendant was raising a claim of title. The reason why in such cases the justices' jurisdiction is ousted is that, unless it were ousted, the justices would indirectly decide a question of right and title between the parties. It is quite plain that no question of right arises in the case now before us, both parties being where they had a right to be when the assault took place. The justices came to a right conclusion when they considered that the defence in urging that a claim of title had arisen was frivolous, and in that sense the justices were right in considering the bona fides of the claim. I am of opinion that no question of title did arise, and therefore the rule must be discharged.

DARLING, J.—I agree. It seems to me that to hold otherwise would be to determine that magistrates could not convict a person of assault if it were committed in the course of a quarrel regarding land, and that irrespective of whether the assault was committed on the land or not. By his contention, Mr. Avory would say that if a mortgagor or mortgagee of land in Yorkshire were to fight, say in Birmingham, as to whether the equity of redemption was gone or not, the magistrates could not convict either of them of assault. The statute cannot mean that, and the construction the Lord Chief Justice has put upon the section is, in my opinion, the right one.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I only wish to add that our judgment proceeds on the footing that the words of the proviso in section 46 must be read so that the word "title" governs the words "lands, tenements, or hereditaments," and also the words "any interest therein or accruing therefrom." In the present case no question arose as to the title to any interest in land or accruing therefrom. It was argued that it is not easy to give a meaning to the words "any interest therein or accruing therefrom," but in my opinion they apply exactly to a right such as this, a profit à prendre arising out of land. If any question had arisen in this case as to the title to any interest in land, or as to the title to any interest therein or accruing therefrom, such as a right of common, the statute would have applied; but no such questions arise. The right of common was admittedly in both parties.

Rule discharged.

FEYERICKS AND OTHERS v. HUBBARD. (a.)

Practice—Foreign judgment, action to enforce—Claim founded on alleged breach of agreement—Judgment signed in default of appearance against a British subject not resident in the country—Condition of agreement that all disputes should be submitted to foreign jurisdiction.

By a contract made in Belgium between the plaintiffs and the defendant, who was a British subject neither domiciled nor resident in Belgium it was agreed that all disputes should be submitted to Belgian jurisdiction. Disputes having arisen, the plaintiffs sued the defendant in the Tribunal of Commerce, Ghent, the citation or summons being duly sent by registered post to the defendant's address in England, and recovered judgment in default of appearance.

Held, that, as the defendant had agreed to submit disputes arising out of the contract to Belgian jurisdiction, he was bound by the judgment of the foreign court.

Held, also, that whether in fact he received the citation by post was immaterial, as the proceedings were regular, and even if by some accident the citation did not reach the defendant, as he alleged was the case, it would be no answer to the action.

Copin v. Adamson, 22 W. R. 658, L. R. 9 Ex. 345, and Rousillon v. Rousillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351, considered and followed.

Action set down for hearing under order 14.

The action was brought by Albert Feyericks and two other gentlemen, Belgian subjects, against C. F. Hubbard to recover £1,280 alleged to be due under a Belgian judgment entered for the plaintiffs in default of appearance by the defendant in certain proceedings before the Tribunal of Commerce, Ghent.

Montague Shearman, for the plaintiffs.—The cause of action is the breach of a contract entered into at Ghent, dated the 7th of September, 1895, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to purchase from the defendant the Belgian patent for improved ovens for £1,000 down and the balance as therein agreed. The plaintiffs' case was that the defendant had failed to complete his contract "inasmuch as he did not instruct their workmen to make the ovens satisfactorily," and the company promoted to make and sell the ovens in Belgium was consequently a failure. The action to recover the £1,000 they had paid was brought in the Belgian courts, the plaintiffs alleging that as the agreement provided that all disputes between the parties should be submitted to Belgian jurisdiction the judgment of that tribunal was binding on the defendant. A judgment by default in a foreign court is not binding on the defendant unless he has submitted to the jurisdiction. If the defendant had entered an appearance, there could have been no question raised of his submission, and the agreement here to submit disputes to Belgian jurisdiction is equivalent to entering an appearance. Moreover, four months were allowed for appealing, and have now expired. There was no question here that the proceedings were regular according to Belgian law.

Daniel Warde, for the defendant.—The judgment obtained by default against the defendant cannot be enforced against him here, for he was not a subject of or resident in the country in which the judgment was obtained: Schibsby v. Westenholz, 19 W. R. 587, L. R. 6 Q. B. 155. Nor can the rule laid down by that case be got over by the plaintiffs showing merely that the defendant had agreed that all disputes relating to the agreement should be submitted to Belgian jurisdiction. At the time proceedings were taken in the Belgian court there was no dispute between them, and the defendant denies that he received notice that these proceedings were being instituted.

Montague Shearman, in reply, referred to Copin v. Adamson, 22 W. R. 658, L. R. 9 Ex. 345, and Bank of Australasia v. Harding, 9 C. B. 661.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 1.—WALTON, J., in giving judgment, said: This is a case in which the plaintiffs are suing the defendant for the sum of £1,208 19*s.* 1d., being money due, as they allege, from the defendant to the plaintiffs under the final judgment in the Tribunal of Commerce of Ghent, in Belgium, bearing date the 15th of November, 1900. The question I have to decide is whether the judgment, first, is properly proved, and secondly, is binding on the defendant, who is not a Belgian subject; nor was he at the time of the judgment or, so far as I can see, ever been, domiciled in Belgium, and was not served with any process within the jurisdiction of the Belgian court. It has, however, been proved that the judgment was delivered regularly by the Belgian tribunal; that it is a final judgment, and that all the requirements of Belgian law with regard to citation, service of process or otherwise, have been complied with. The question is whether that judgment is binding on the defendant. It is said to be binding because by the terms of the contract upon which the action was brought in Belgium it was provided (inter alia) that "all disputes relating to this present agreement and to its fulfilment shall be submitted to the Belgian jurisdiction." The contract was made on the 7th of September, 1895, and appears to have been executed in Ghent in Belgium by the defendant on that date.

Now it is said that inasmuch as by the terms of the contract upon which the claim in Belgium was made and for a breach of which the plaintiffs seek to recover the sum which has been found to be due to them by the Belgian tribunal, the defendant Hubbard agreed to submit all disputes under the agreement to the Belgian jurisdiction; and therefore that Hubbard is bound by the decision of the Belgian court. At the trial the question arose whether Hubbard was properly served with a Belgian citation, which, as required by Belgian law, was sent him by registered letter. A receipt was, however, produced, purporting to have been signed by Hubbard. The defendant was called before me and he denied that the signature was his, and he denied also that he ever received the summons by post.

Now it does not appear to me to be necessary to decide the question; for indeed it is irrelevant. If the defendant is bound by the decision of the Belgian court, then, providing the proceedings there were regular, and providing the service is given in accordance with the regulations of the Belgian court, the fact that, by some accident, the particular document did not reach the defendant would not be any answer by him to this action. On the other hand, if the defendant is not bound by the jurisdiction of the Belgian tribunal, it is immaterial whether he had notice of the proceedings or not—whether the summons was served or not. Therefore it does not appear to me to be necessary to determine whether the defendant did in point of fact sign the receipt—whether in fact he received the summons or did not.

Now the general question raises the point upon which I took time to consider the law, of whether the defendant is bound by a foreign judgment, whether he contracted to submit himself to the forum in which that judgment has been obtained or not. I do not think there is any case directly in point, for there is no case which appears to decide that the mere fact of the contract on which the proceedings arose contained a stipulation that the parties would submit to the foreign tribunal has been held to be sufficient itself to make the decision of the foreign tribunal binding in itself. But I find that in the case of Rousillon v. Rousillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351, Fry, J., reviewed all the cases on this subject very fully and states the conclusion at which he arrives. At p. 371 he says, "What are the circumstances which have been held to impose upon the defendant the duty of obeying the decision of a foreign court? Having regard to the cases of Schibsby v. Westenholz and Copin v. Adamson, they may, I think, be stated thus. The courts of this country consider the defendant bound where he is a subject of a foreign country in which the judgment has been obtained; where he was a resident in the foreign country when the action began; where the defendant in the character of plaintiff has selected the forum in which he is afterwards sued; where he has voluntarily appeared; where he has contracted to submit himself to the forum in which the judgment was obtained, and possibly, if Becquet v. MacCarthy, 2 B & Ad. 951, be right, where the defendant has real estate within the foreign jurisdiction, in respect of which the cause of action arose whilst he was within that jurisdiction."

Now that is the classification by Fry, J., of the several cases in which a defendant is bound by the judgment of a foreign tribunal, and one of them covers this case—namely, where he has contracted to submit himself to the forum in which the judgment was obtained. If that is the law, then the judgment in this case is binding upon the defendant, and the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment here. It was not absolutely necessary for Fry, J., to decide that point in his judgment in the case of Rousillon v. Rousillon. He refers there to the case of Copin v. Adamson. I think the facts in that case might possibly be distinguished from the facts in the present case. It apparently was decided by Amphlett and Pigott, BB. (and the Chief Baron, Kelly, did not disagree with them), on the ground that a man may contract with others that his rights shall be determined, not only by foreign law, but by a foreign tribunal—and by reason of such a contract, not of any allegiance, absolute or qualified, he would become bound by the tribunal's decision. Therefore Copin v. Adamson is practically a decision that a defendant who has made a contract to be bound by the jurisdiction of a foreign tribunal upon any question arising under the contract is bound by a subsequent decision of the tribunal, although he is not domiciled within the jurisdiction of the tribunal, was not served within the jurisdiction of the tribunal, and was not resident within the jurisdiction of the tribunal at the time the proceedings commenced. I feel that I am bound by the decision of Copin v. Adamson as it was interpreted by Fry, J., in Rousillon v. Rousillon. Here the defendant did contract that he would submit all disputes relating to the agreement in question to the Belgian jurisdiction; that means not merely that he will submit, but that he is bound by the decision of the Belgian tribunal. On that ground, on the cases I have referred to, the judgment which has been obtained is binding on the defendant, and inasmuch as the proceedings in the Belgian court were perfectly regular, and the service required by the Belgian law was sufficient, I do not think that it is open to him even to raise the question that by some accident or mistake the summons did not really reach him in England. It cannot be said that there is anything in the nature of the Belgian proceedings or in their law of procedure, with regard to service, which is contrary to natural justice.

For these reasons I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover judgment for the amount which they claim, with costs.

Feb. 1.—JELF, J.—This was an action tried before me without a jury on the 13th of January last, whereby the plaintiff sought to recover the sum of £8,515 5s. 4d. balance alleged to be due for principal and interest on a judgment obtained by the plaintiff against the defendant in the Queen's Bench Division dated the 28th of June, 1884, for £15,067 9s. 11d., including costs. Three defences were relied upon by the defendant: (1) That the Statute of Limitations—the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8—was a bar to the action as more than twelve years had elapsed between the date of the judgment, 21st of June, 1884, and the date of the issue of the writ in this action, August, 1901; (2) that on the 12th of May, 1886, the plaintiff obtained judgment in the courts of the South African Republic (the Transvaal) against the defendant for £7,000 and interest thereon at 8 per cent. and costs for the same cause of action as that now sued upon, and recovered from the defendant's trustees in insolvency £9,635 4s. 6d. in respect thereof, and thereby the judgment now sued upon was merged or satisfied; (3) that the defendant was released from the cause of action now sued upon by the sequestration and insolvency proceedings in the Transvaal. As to the plea of the Statute of Limitations, the plaintiff's counsel formally contended that the case was governed not by 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 8, which makes the period twelve years, but by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, which makes the period twenty years. But they admitted that since the case of Jay v. Johnstone, 41 W. R. 161, [1893] 1 Q. B. 189, they would only rely on this point in the House of Lords. It was further argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the case was taken out of the statute by a part payment within twelve years of £9,635 4s. 6d. on account of the debt under the circumstances hereinafter appearing.

The defendant was formerly an official in the Transvaal for the then South African Republic, and was domiciled there, but, being temporarily in England, he borrowed money from the plaintiff, contracting to repay the loan with a very heavy bonus recoverable in England, where there were no usury laws in force. On his failure to pay he was sued in the Queen's Bench Division by the plaintiff, who recovered against him the judgment sued upon in this action. In 1886 the plaintiff sought to enforce the judgment against the defendant, who had then returned to the Transvaal, in the courts of the South African Republic. The action was brought to recover the £15,067 9s. 11d. and interest upon the English judgment. The Transvaal court, presided over by Kotzé, C.J., instead of either giving judgment for the amount of the English judgment, or refusing to enforce it at all, took a middle course. They inquired into the merits of the original cause of action to the extent of finding that only £7,000 had been actually lent by the plaintiff to the defendant, and that the rest of the £15,067 7s. 11d. had substantially consisted of a bonus by way of interest on the loan, and refused, whether rightly or wrongly it is not for me to say, to give judgment for the whole amount, holding such bonus to be usurious and unreasonable and not enforceable by the law of the South African Republic, but gave judgment for £7,000 and interest at 8 per cent. from the date of the English judgment (instead of 4 per cent., which would be recoverable in this country), making a total of £9,635 4s. 6d. The plaintiff thereupon took proceedings in the courts of the South African Republic for sequestration, and executors or trustees were appointed by the Transvaal courts. The estate would not pay all the claims of the creditors against the defendant, amounting to £12,000. The defendant then availed himself of a payment made on his behalf by another person (Mr. Sivewright) to the executors of £12,350 15s. 11d., and undertook to be responsible for any further liabilities. The £9,635 4s. 6d. was then paid in full by the executors to the plaintiff's agents, and ultimately the sequestration and insolvency were annulled and the defendant was rehabilitated and released from all debts claimable against his estate. It was contended for the plaintiff that this payment took the case out of the statute. The defendant's counsel, on the contrary, contended, first, that payment was not on account of the English judgment, but on account of the South African judgment; secondly, that it was not made by the defendant or his agents; and thirdly, that it was not such a payment as is contemplated by the statute, not being one from which an acknowledgment of liability and a promise to pay the residue of the the English judgment could be inferred. I am of opinion that the defendant's contention is correct on all these grounds. The payment was not made on account of the English judgment, which, in my opinion, was necessary to take the case out of the statute, but in satisfaction of the Transvaal judgment, and if this is a question of fact I so find. Taking the other two grounds together, as they are very closely connected with one another, I find that the payment, although the defendant took advantage of it, and obtained his release by means of it, and spoke of it as made by him, was not in fact made by him or by any agent of his, but by the curators under his sequestration out of the money found by Mr. Sivewright, and it was not in fact made voluntarily, but by way of execution of a hostile judgment obtained against the defendant in invitum. Under these circumstances it is, I think, impossible to infer from the payment of the £9,635 4s. 6d. an acknowledgment by the defendant or any agent of his to pay the residue of the English judgment. This being so, I am of opinion that there was no part payment of such a kind as to take the case out of the statute. The old case of Jackson v. Fairbank, 2 H. Bl. 340, was relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel to show that a payment by the trustee in bankruptcy may be sufficient. But I consider that that case has been practically overruled by Davies v. Edwards, 7 Ex. Ch. 22, and Ex parte Topping, 13 W. R. 1025, 4 De G. J. & S. 551, and is, I think, inconsistent with other modern decisions. An attempt was made on behalf of the plaintiff to establish a distinction between 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 8, and to show that the latter statute made the fact of a part payment ipso facto sufficient, without the necessity of showing that it was made under circumstances from which an admission of a liability and a promise to pay would be inferred. The only difference, however, in the wording of the two statutes is the substitution of the period of twelve years for twenty, and Lord Esher (then Brett, L.J.) in Harlock v. Ashberry, 30 W. R. 327, 19 Ch. D. 539, says: "In all Statutes of Limitations the principle on which they proceed is that, in those cases in which a payment is allowed to take the case out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations it must be such a payment as amounts to an acknowledgment of liability." And Sir G. Jessel emphasises the same propositions. For these reasons I hold that the Statute of Limitations is a complete bar to this action. I am further of opinion that the second defence relied on by the defendant is established. If the plaintiff had merely obtained judgment in the Transvaal, and finding it was for £9,635 4s. 6d. instead of £15,067 9s. 11d., had not taken any steps to realize that judgment, he could, I think, have sued afterwards in this country for the original debt. But, in my opinion, when he accepted the judgment with its distinct incidents (i.e., the bonus struck off, but 8 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. put on) and proceeded to sequestration and ultimately obtained the £9,635 4s. 6d. in full, I think he had elected to take the judgment of the foreign country to which he had appealed in discharge of the whole cause of action, and could not afterwards sue for the residue of the debt in England. What he wants to do is to take from the foreign court the judgment which that court gave for the whole cause of action, and sue for the residue here. To do this would be to approbate and reprobate, or in more homely language to blow hot and cold, which neither law nor common sense will allow: see Barber v. Lamb, 8 W. R. 461, 8 C. B. N. S. 95, where Earle, C.J., says: "It would be contrary to all principle for the party who has chosen such tribunal, and got what was awarded, to seek a better judgment in respect of the same matter from another tribunal." In my opinion the third defence fails, as the release in a foreign country could not per se get rid of a cause of action arising out of a contract to be performed in this: see Dicey's Conflict of Laws, [1896] R. 113, p. 451; Gibbs v. La Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Métaux, 25 Q. B. D. 399, 39 W. R. Dig. 57. But for the reasons above set forth I think the other two defences are sound, and I give judgment for the defendant with costs.

Bankruptcy—Fraudulent conveyance—Transfer of whole of debtor's property for a past debt—Protected transaction—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (b); s. 49.

A transfer of the whole of a debtor's property for a past debt is not protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, though a similar transfer for a present consideration may be protected by that section.

Shears v. Goddard, 44 W. R. 402, [1896] 1 Q. B. 406, distinguished.

Application by the official receiver acting as trustee in the bankruptcy for an order setting aside a transfer of property by the bankrupt as fraudulent and void.

Upon the 9th of August, 1901, the bankrupt, a cab proprietor, transferred seventeen cabs, sixteen horses, and sixteen sets in harness to the respondent, Christopher Whitfield, in payment of a past debt of £150.

At that date the bankrupt was heavily indebted to his corn merchants, who were pressing for payment and had refused to supply any more corn unless their account was paid.

The stock-in-trade transferred by the bankrupt was practically all the property he possessed.

A receiving order was made against the bankrupt on the 4th of October, 1901. His debts were returned at £296, and his assets at £10, but as a matter of fact they realized nothing.

He was adjudicated bankrupt, and the official receiver, who was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy, launched the present motion.

A. H. Carrington, for the official receiver, having proved the facts, submitted that the transfer to Whitfield was void against the trustee in bankruptcy as being an assignment of the whole of the debtor's property for a past debt, and consequently an act of bankruptcy.

G. A. Scott, for the respondent, relied upon Shears v. Goddard, 44 W. R. 402, [1896] 1 Q. B. 406, where a transfer of the whole of a debtor's property for a present consideration was upheld.

Carrington, in reply, referred to In re Sharp, Ex parte Gundry v. Johnston, 83 L. T. Rep. 416, 49 W. R. Dig. 8.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that this case is not quite within the decision is Shears v. Goddard. I think it is quite clear that here the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy by parting with the whole of his property to satisfy a past debt. I do not think that I shall be deciding anything contrary to what was held to be the law in Shears v. Goddard in holding that section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, does not protect a person who in satisfaction of a past debt takes over the whole of the debtor's property, knowing that there are other creditors. In Shears v. Goddard it did not appear that the purchaser knew that he was taking the whole of the debtor's property, or that any fraud on the Bankrupty Acts was contemplated. I think that a person who takes over the whole of the debtor's property under the circumstances of the present case cannot be held to be acting in good faith, and the transaction is not protected by the provisions of section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

BRADSHAW v. WIDDRINGTON. (a.)

Limitation, Statutes of—Mortgage—Payment of interest by person liable to the mortgagor to pay—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8—Solicitor's books—Entry against interest—Admissibility in evidence.

Payment to a mortgagee of interest due upon the mortgage by a person who is liable to make the payment as between himself and the mortgagor is a sufficient payment within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, to prevent time running against the mortgagee under the statute.

Decision of Buckley, J. (49 W. R. 698), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. (reported 49 W. R. 698).

The facts were as follow: On the 1st of August, 1879, James E. Bradshaw mortgaged the "Fair Oak" estate to J. J. Moss to secure the repayment of a sum of £5,171 14s. 6d. and interest at 4 per cent.

Moss was the surviving trustee of the will of Sir Edward Cust, of whose estate the mortgage money formed part. The defendants succeeded Moss as trustees, and he and they were referred to in the case as the Cust trustees.

James E. Bradshaw borrowed the money for his son, William Bradshaw, to whom it was immediately paid over. On the same day William Bradshaw executed a bond to secure the repayment to his father of the amount lent—that is to say, the principal money due under the mortgage and interest at 4 per cent.

Cartmell Harrison, of the firm of Birch, Ingram, & Harrison, acted as solicitor for all parties, and the deeds were left in his keeping. He also paid the interest on the mortgage to the Cust trustees. In the books of the firm till 1885 William Bradshaw was treated as paying the interest on the mortgage to his father, James E. Bradshaw, and the Cust trustees as receiving it, although James E. Bradshaw in his account was not treated as receiving it from his son. After 1885 and down to 1892 in his account William Bradshaw was treated as paying the interest direct to the Cust trustees.

In September, 1887, James E. Bradshaw died, leaving William Bradshaw and Harrison his executors.

In October, 1892, William Bradshaw paid Harrison the mortgage money of £5.171 14s. 6d. This money appeared in the books of Harrison's firm as a credit on the account of William Bradshaw. In the account of the Cust trustees in the firm books there was the extraordinary position of affairs that the trustees were treated as having received this money, and they continued also to be treated as receiving from time to time the interest due upon it. As a matter of fact Harrison misappropriated the mortgage money and never paid it to the Cust trustees, to whom he continued to pay interest down to 1898 or 1899. In 1899 Harrison committed suicide.

At this time the plaintiff, Colonel J. C. Bradshaw, was the owner of Fair Oak. He had had part of it conveyed to him by his father in 1884 in exchange for other land which he gave his father, and he had purchased the remainder from the trustees of his father's estate in November, 1887.

In both cases he bought without knowing of the Cust mortgage, and in both cases the property was expressed to be conveyed free from incumbrances. Consequently, as between himself and his father and his father's trustees, the latter were bound to discharge the sum due under the mortgage and the interest.

Harrison acted as solicitor for all parties in these purchases, and the deeds remained in his hands. Upon the death of Harrison the existence of the Cust mortgage was discovered. The Cust trustees, no longer receiving their interest, gave notice to Colonel Bradshaw to pay off the mortgage, and that in default they would sell the property.

Thereupon Colonel Bradshaw brought the present against them, asking for a declaration that their right to the mortgage was extinguished, and for an injunction to prevent them selling the property.

The trustees counterclaimed for payment of the mortgage money, or in the alternative for foreclosure or sale.

At the trial of the action before Buckley, J., William Bradshaw was not called as a witness. The books of Birch, Ingram, & Harrison were produced, and upon the evidence before him his lordship concluded that as between his father and himself William Bradshaw was liable for the principal and interest of the mortgage money, and that there was a special arrangement between them that the son, having had the money, should keep down the interest upon it.

His lordship dismissed the action against the trustees, and gave judgment in their favour upon the counterclaim.

Colonel Bradshaw appealed.

H. Terrell, K.C., and G. Henderson, for the plaintiff.—To prevent time running under the statute there must be either payment or acknowledgment by a person who is capable of representing the person in possession of the land. William Bradshaw, even during his father's lifetime, was not in any way his father's agent for the purpose of making these payments. At any rate, after 1885, when the property was conveyed to the plaintiff free from incumbrances, you can infer no authority to William Bradshaw to make these payments, as the father believed that the debt had ceased to exist. In any case the agency was determined on the father's death. Nor was William Bradshaw a person bound to pay the interest. He was only bound to pay interest on the bond, not on the mortgage. Even assuming that the books kept by Harrison are admissible, they only show that after 1885 payments were made by William Bradshaw, who was not the mortgagor or his agent, or bound to him by privity of estate. You cannot infer from them any agreement in 1879 by William Bradshaw to pay this interest. But it is submitted that these books are not admissible at all. They were not kept in pursuance of a duty, and even if they were there is no evidence to show that the entries in them were made at the time of the transactions to which they refer.

Astbury, K.C., and Farrer, for the Cust trustees.—An action brought by a mortgagee within twelve years after the last payment of interest can succeed even against a person who has acquired a good title against the mortgagor by reason of the Statute of Limitations. Here the payment by a person who was liable as between himself and the mortgagor is sufficient to prevent the statute running against us. Harrison's books are admissible in evidence on two grounds—first, they contain entries of payments received by him which are clearly admissible as entries against interest; secondly, an agent in receipt of money from a client is under a duty to keep an account, and all the authorities show that where there is a duty to keep an account such an account is admissible in evidence.

Terrell, K.C., replied.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the argument: Loveless v. Richardson, 4 W. R. 617, 2 Jur. N. S. 716; Bright v. Legerton, 9 W. R. 239, 2 De G. COLLINS, M.R.—This action arises in a somewhat curious fashion. It is an action brought by Mr. John Charles Bradshaw, who is now the owner of the Fair Oak estate, against the Cust trustees, to have it declared that the estate is free from a certain mortgage if it ever existed. If it ever did exist he wants a declaration that it does not now bind the estate.

That is met by the trustees by saying that there has been a payment of interest within the period of twelve years before action, which takes it out of the Statute of Limitations, and they claim that the mortgage is binding, and counterclaim against the executors of the mortgagor for payment of the principal sum and foreclosure against the plaintiff.
